PUBLISHER'S FOREWORD

Main Menu

As may be seen in the partially annotated bibliography at the end of this volume, Carl Ketcherside wrote 32 books over a period of 36 years, from 1944 through 1981, in addition to the 16 bound volumes of Mission Messenger from 1957–1975.

The last of his books, his autobiography, was published in installments by Restoration Review, from January 1976 through December of 1981. It was later published posthumously in a single volume as Pilgrimage of Joy by College Press in 1991 and by SCM e-prints in 2010 in Kindle format.

Ketcherside's books published before 1956 consist of collections of radio sermons (13), a book on church discipline, one concerning Christians colleges, another on carnal warfare, and his public debates (4). Those published from 1956 forward (12)— which he wrote from a renewed perspective that began in 1951 and continued to develop through 1957— make up the content of this volume.

Except for minor changes to format, this publication is a reasonable facsimile of the original publications it reproduces, although it includes the foreword to the Diversity Press edition of The Twisted Scriptures (1992) by Leroy Garrett.

What It Is All About

Contents

Every child of God is a priest! Every man and woman who is a Christian has entered "the priesthood." The only high priest in God's system today is in heaven. That is the theme of this book. It is just that simple. If the Bible teaches that, this book is in harmony with the will of God; if the Bible authorizes a special priesthood composed of a clerical class, in this age, then this book is wrong in its presentation, and its author must stand condemned as one who opposes the plan of God.

I have no intent or desire to defend modern religious institutions, nor to champion the societies which have been spawned in the fertile brains of fallible men. It is my firm conviction that the community of saints planted by the holy apostles in the first generation of the Christian era constituted the divine pattern for the entire dispensation. My humble efforts will be bent, not toward the refinement, amendment, or reformation of any existing sect, but toward restoration of the primitive "colony of heaven" as representing God's ideal to which we must conform if we would meet his approval.

No careful student of the early congregation of believers can fail to be impressed with the simplicity of its worship and functioning. Imbued with a fervent zeal, motivated by a common purpose, possessed of a deep love for each other, "all the believers kept together" and "among all those who had embraced the faith there was but one heart and one soul" (Acts 2:44; 5:32). In such a company each felt under compulsion of spirit to do all he could to edify his fellows. None served for gain. Those who had personal property and real estate sold their possessions and distributed to all who had need; no one thought of threatening the needy with eternal destruction if they did not support a privileged class.

In the original church of God there was no distinction between clergy and laity. God's clergy (portion or lot) consisted of God's laity (people). Every member of the "laity" was a member of the "clergy" and vice versa. Every person in the divine arrangement was a minister of God. One "entered the ministry" by coming into the Christ. The holy and unblemished church can never be restored until those who love the Lord recapture in the fullest sense the picture of a "priesthood of all believers" free from the taint of a special caste.

The religious world in general has lost the pattern of the corporate worship of the original community of baptized believers. The early church gathered around a table; the modern church sits before a pulpit. The Lord placed the table in the church so it could remember its debt to him; the clergy placed the pulpit in the church to bring it in debt to them. In the early church they all spoke one by one; today all the speaking is done by one. Then the spirit was kindled; now it is quenched. Then they claimed to love each other and talked about Jesus; now they claim to love Jesus and talk about each other. In those days all exerted an effort to exhort; now all must be exhorted to exert an effort.

The primitive disciples did not ask the world to come and get the gospel, they took it to them. They gathered to eat the Lord's Supper, then scattered to preach the Word. Wherever there was a Christian and a sinner, there was a gospel meeting. They announced the glad tidings to masters and mistresses, friends and neighbors. They did it simply but fervently. They told about Jesus, his death and resurrection. They testified of their faith in him. They preached him in chariots along the road, in prison cells, by river brinks, in private homes, in halls and in synagogues. The whole earth was their auditorium, the thing at hand their pulpit.

Much of the irreverence, formality and cold ritual of these days is the result of a loss of significance of a priesthood of all believers. The sense of individual relationship to God with its attendant responsibilities has disappeared in the modern sectarian strife for supremacy of party. To restore the primitive community of saints a great reformation of thought is essential. This book has been written to help the good and honest heart properly evaluate our present status in the light of God's revelation.

PLAN OF THE BOOK

You will find the book divided into two parts. The first section is a study of the whole subject of priesthood as taught in the Bible. It deals with the reason for religion and the necessity of the priesthood in an approach unto God. It traces the history of priesthood through the Patriarchal, and Jewish dispensations, and points out the culmination of God's ideal in the Christian era which is designated as "the end of the ages."

The second division considers the arguments for a special priesthood to officiate for men "in things pertaining unto God." The case for the clergy can best be presented by that great institution which resulted from its creation, and then did the most to perpetuate and justify it. If the Roman Church cannot successfully defend the right of a special clergy to exist, no other religious organization need assume the task. That church postulates her own right to exist and to command attention of religious seekers upon the very basis of her priesthood. Destroy that foundation and the whole superstructure tumbles in disorder.

Accordingly, we chose what we believe to be the most outstanding presentation of the subject by a modern scholar. Dr. John A. O'Brien, of Notre Dame University, is universally recognized as a scholar, philosopher, and expositor. His reputation as a writer in his particular field is unexcelled. It was our good fortune, during our research, to discover in popular booklet form, his treatise entitled: "The Priesthood— A Divine Institution." In correspondence with the author we learned that this presentation had subsequently been incorporated as a chapter in a book which was protected by copyright. Dr. O'Brien consented to release the copyright restrictions for inclusion of the material in this book, if I would pay for the privilege of using his treatise. He suggested the sum of twenty-five dollars to be paid by me to Notre Dame. His final letter in the correspondence follows:

Dear Mr. Ketcherside:

Having received no reply to my letter of several years ago, I naturally assumed that the proposition made therein was unacceptable, and hence I am surprised by your letter.

Upon reflecting on the matter and before entering into a definite contract, I would want the assurance that various paragraphs from my writing "The Priesthood: A Divine Institution" are not to be taken out of the context in such a way as to create a misleading impression. It is with the understanding that this is not done that I am granting the requested permission in consideration of the payment of $25 to the University of Notre Dame.

The credit line to be printed should run as follows: From "The Priesthood: A Divine Institution," a chapter in The Faith of Millions, John A. O'Brien, Our Sunday Visitor, Huntington, Indiana, copyright 1938 by John A. O'Brien.

Looking forward to seeing a copy of your book as soon as it is published, I am,

Sincerely yours,

John A. O'Brien

The eminent theologian and Doctor of Philosophy is certainly justified in his request for proper treatment of his manuscript in any attempt at analysis and replication. For that reason we are publishing his article in its entirety, and while we are presenting it in paragraph form to make our refutation meet his argument more directly, the treatise by Dr. O'Brien will be set in distinctive type so that the interested reader by merely turning a few pages of the book between paragraphs, to the next occurrence of such type face, can read the entire article written to uphold the opinion that the special priesthood is of divine origin.

If it seems that our language is too harsh in this final section of the book, we assure you that it was not meant thus to be. The author entertains a wholesome respect for the sincere religious convictions of every man on earth, regardless of how divergent from his own views they may be. Coupled with that respect is a deep conviction of his own which makes him an implacable foe of every form of clericalism, whether exemplified in the lowliest professional preacher who serves for hire, or the pope who is looked upon as a spiritual father by millions. With such fervent feeling it is to be expected that in condemnation of a system which it is believed robs the saints of their rights and liberties, the language of exposure may sometimes be pointed, pungent and plain.

OTHER ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The reader will observe that we have used the Revised Standard Version of the holy scriptures more than any other version. There are numerous reasons for this, not the least of which is the personal view that this scholarly work is generally superior to most of the commonly used versions. Inasmuch as this version is copyrighted we insert herewith the authorization to use the quotations found in this book.

Credits for brief historical quotations will generally be given in conjunction with such quotations in the body of the book. It is extremely difficult after years of study to recall the many sources to which one is indebted for the formulation or crystallization of his own views, but the author desires especially to mention the following: History of Priestcraft in All Ages and Nations, by William Howitt (1833); Christianity Restored by Alexander Campbell (1835); History of the Planting and Training of the Christian Church, by Dr. Augustus Neander (1844); Ministry in the Church of Christ, by David King (1870); The Early Church, by David Duff, M.A., D.D., LL.D. Scott, D.D., (1926); The Faith and Life of the Early Church, by W. R. Slater, M.A. (1892); Christian Worship in the Primitive Church, by A. B. McDonald,

Ph.D. (1934).

It is our sincere hope that this little volume may be a contributing factor in the stimulation of thought among those whose honest hearts make them unwilling to remain in camp halfway between Babylon and Jerusalem. This book is not exhaustive in its treatment of the subject, but suggestive in nature, and is intended to arouse God's children to think for themselves. We can never restore the primitive church until we recapture the spirit which dominated the lives of the early saints, all of whom were impelled by an unconquerable passion to know that truth which makes men free. If we can aid in any degree to a restoration of that liberty and freedom to think, speak and act, which is the divinely given heritage of every Christian, we will be satisfied.

The Dawn of Religion

Contents

In the beginning man had no religion. In the Garden of Eden he respected God, reverenced His being, and served without it. Religion belongs to sinful man. The word is formed from re, "back"; and lego, "to bind." It is that which binds man back to God. In his primeval innocence man was not separated from God, and needed nothing to bind him back. In this state the Creator freely conversed with the being made in His own image, and there was no fear in the heart of the creature, nor was there any sense of shame (Gen. 2:22).

The advent of sin changed this happy condition. When man and his counterpart transgressed God's law, "they heard the sound of the Lord walking up and down in the garden at the breeze of the day, and the man and his wife hid themselves from the face of the Lord in the midst of the trees of the garden." When God called unto the man and asked his whereabouts, the reply was, "I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, for I was naked, and I hid myself" (Gen. 3:8, 9). Sin produces guilt, shame and a desire for concealment. It also produced a need for religion if man is to be reconciled to God, and restored to his former condition, for iniquity makes for separation between a man and his God (Isa. 59:2).

Inasmuch as sin is an offense against the dignity and majesty of God, the terms of reconciliation must be dictated by the offended and not by the offender. The religion which binds man back to God must be one which originates in the divine, and not the human mind. God proposes the conditions, man must accept or reject them. Since man cannot ascertain the thoughts of God, except as He reveals them, the acceptable system of religion must be a revelation. It represents, then, not the groping, climbing, or struggling toward heaven upon a ladder erected by the trial-and-error method of human experience, but a bold approach through "a new and living way" provided by a kind and beneficent Father.

GRADUAL PROCESS OF REVELATION

Every man passes through three stages of development. He is first an infant, then a child or youth, and finally attains maturity. Responsibility increases correspondingly as man's ability enables him to grasp more knowledge. What is true of each individual is also true of the body (or world) of mankind, which is composed of individuals. The social structure of humanity had its infancy, childhood and maturity. Knowledge must be gained on an ascending scale, so revelation which conveys knowledge must be bestowed on the same basis. In God's dealings with mankind, that system of religion which He endorsed, was always best adapted to man in his condition at the time, but it was also intended to fit and prepare him for reception of a fuller revelation to follow.

In fitting the world for the crowning act in which His judgment and mercy would meet, and the kingdom of heaven with its reconciling grace become a reality, God permitted the world to pass successively into three great dispensations: the Patriarchal, Jewish and Christian. Sometimes these are called, not inappropriately, the starlight, moonlight and sunlight ages, because in each succeeding one the light of truth gleamed a great deal brighter. Another age may be inserted between the second and third, and designated the twilight age. It would cover the preparatory period beginning with the announcement, by John the Immerser, of the impending kingdom, and close with the accession to the throne and coronation of our Lord. However, as the twilight is not in itself an official time of the day, but a blending of two conditions, so the world was made ready to transfer from the receding glory to the full effulgence of grace.

A word of caution needs to be inserted at this juncture. Any such designations as given above are arbitrary and serve only as matters of convenience. The great majority of mankind were not under the second, or Jewish Dispensation, at all. This pertained to the descendants of but one man, Abraham. The rest of the world remained under the Patriarchal Dispensation from its inception until the gospel was proclaimed at the house of Cornelius, by Simon Peter. It is for this reason the word "age" is not so appropriate as the word "dispensation." Since age signifies "duration" it would be impossible for two ages to run concurrently, although two dispensations may do so. Thus for 1500 years the Israelites were under the Jewish Dispensation, the while the rest of humanity continued under the Patriarchal form.

The plan of God was gradually unfolded to the world as man was able to grasp it. It was "precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little, there a little" (Isa. 28:13). "The Kingdom of heaven is as if a man should scatter seed upon the ground, and should sleep and rise night and day, and the seed should sprout and grow, he knows not how. The earth produces of itself, first the blade, then the ear, then the full grain in the ear. But when the grain is ripe, at once he puts in the sickle, because the harvest is come" (Mark 4:26-29). In such progressive steps man was made increasingly aware of "the eternal purpose of God" (Eph. 3:11). But even when Christ came, he was forced to say to the apostles, "I have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now" (John 16:12). Nothing is a mystery unto God, for "known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts 15:18). But it was not until the Christian Dispensation that He made known "the mystery of His will, according to the purpose which He set forth in Christ, as a plan for the fulness of time" (Eph. 1:9, 10).

SCHOOLS OF THE AGES

All instruction must be dispensed in proportion to the ability of the student to absorb it. We first send our children to the primary school, next to the elementary, and then to the high school. But each of these prepares the student for the next, and all prepare him for a better and more wholesome life. The principles gleaned in the primary school govern the child through high school and later existence. Responsibility increases as the student learns. We hold a high school student accountable for much more than one who is in the kindergarten.

In like manner God's educational process for the world involves three schools. From Adam to Moses, mankind was enrolled in the primary department, then certain chosen students were given elementary training, and now all are admissible to the high school over which Jesus is superintendent, and in which the textbook has been perfected by heaven. Our responsibility is greater now than that of the Jews who studied in the elementary school (Cp. Heb. 10:28, 29; 12:25).

But the principles established in former dispensations remain the same. Laws change and requirements are altered. But these are only enabling acts by which we are made more keenly aware of existing principles, and are better equipped to adapt them to our own wellbeing. The return to God of sinful man, the reconciliation to Him who made us and gave us being, these depend upon a disclosure of the divine will to man, an intelligent perception by man of that revelation, and humble submission unto its demands. Fortunately for those of us who now live, the things which happened in prior days, "were written down for our instruction, upon whom the end of the ages has come" (1 Cor. 10:11). Thus, as we investigate the nature of religion which restores man to the grace of God, we cannot ignore "the first principles of God's Word" given to bring the world to the state of spiritual maturity which it should now occupy.

NATURE OF RELIGION

Just as "the sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2:27), so religion was made for man, and not man for religion. Religion is to cure and heal a diseased condition, and just as a remedy is not needed where there is no disease, no system for restoration to God's grace was required while man existed in the divine favor. Religion manifests itself in two departments; what God has done for us, and what God requires that we do for ourselves. The first provides proper motives to stimulate the second.

Inasmuch as sin offends God as our king, by dishonoring and insulting his majestic laws, no religion can be acceptable which does not propitiate or atone for guilt. The mere atonement for sins committed would not, however, in and of itself establish reunion, so it must have the added value of reconciliation for the offender to the offended. And since this could not be fully accomplished so long as the effect of sin, or sense of guilt remained in the conscience, there must be a feature of provision for the expiation of sin, which gives a full realization of pardon and restoration, so the sinner need not longer fear or hide himself in shame.

Sin alienates man from God. And just as a foreigner cannot dictate to a sovereign state the grounds upon which he will accept citizenship, but as the sovereign proposes the terms upon which the foreigner will be accepted for citizenship, so it is in the kingdom of heaven. Man, alienated from God, is not left to specify the terms by which he will come to God, nor are the conditions revealed by heaven the result of mere caprice or opinion. They are part of a divine system, which is the result of an eternal purpose. Man cannot dictate the laws by which he shall return to God. "There is one lawgiver and judge, He who is able to save and to destroy" (James 4:12).

Absolute justice demands satisfaction for every sin. Sin must be expiated, or the guilty sinner must die. Expiation implies sacrifice, and this is the basis of all religion. This is true whether the religion be pagan or Christian, superstitious or rational. Sacrifice for sins constitutes a scarlet line running through God's entire revelation, from the expulsion of the first man Adam from the Edenic paradise to the death of the second man Adam upon the cross. But sacrifice demands an altar, and an altar demands a priest. Sacrifice, altar and priest— these three are the fundamental requirements of religion, and the entire word of God is given over to a revelation concerning these three items in three Dispensations. It is true that with each change of dispensation there came also a change in the priesthood (or should we state it in reverse order?) "When there is a change in the priesthood, there is necessarily a change in the law as well" (Heb. 7:12). But changing priesthoods and changing laws did not abrogate these three essentials in either. Thus, even though we are more vitally concerned in a study of priesthood, we cannot divorce it from its basic relationship to sacrifice.

The Element of Sacrifice

Contents

If no man had ever sinned, no sacrifice would ever have been offered. If no sacrifice had been required no priest would ever have served. "For every high priest is appointed to offer gifts and sacrifices" (Heb. 8:3). "Every high priest chosen from among men is appointed to act on behalf of a man in relation to God, to offer gifts and sacrifices for sins" (Heb. 5:1). The study of priesthood is inextricably interwoven with that of sacrifice. One cannot ignore the foundation and erect a proper structure. Yet he cannot spend so much time on the foundation as to neglect the remainder of the structure. Our consideration of the element of sacrifice in religion as revealed by our Father, will be limited to a necessary survey as a basis for further study of the priesthood of God.

The idea of sacrifice in religion is as universal as religion itself, and thus indicates the universality of the recognition of sin and the need for expiation of it. From what source did this universal idea spring, which pervaded the thought of the cultured and untutored, the civilized man and savage alike? We believe that this universal idea is a convincing proof of the common origin of all nations of mankind, and of the revelation of God to the original parent stock from which all men came. That religion is a universal part of man's existence is undenied; that sacrifice is an element in this universal concept must be admitted. What was its origin?

We have but two alternatives. It was either revealed to man or he arrived at the concept by a process of his own reasoning. This last is assumed by the learned skeptics, who are divided into two groups, those who affirm that the idea of sacrifice originated in superstition and is an invention of credulous men; and those who assert that it is an offspring of the natural sentiments of the heart.

To the believer in God neither of these can come as a satisfactory explanation. That sacrifice was not a product of man's philosophy based upon superstition is evident from the fact that God never approves as an act of worship directed unto him, that which he designates as will-worship. He instructs as follows: "See to it that no one makes a prey of you by philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits of the universe, and not according to Christ" (Col. 2:8). He condemns as of no value those things which "have indeed an appearance of wisdom in promoting rigor of devotion and self-abasement" (Col. 2:23). But God did approve religious sacrifices offered unto him. With reference to the first such sacrifice recorded, it is stated, "And the Lord had regard for Abel and his offering" (Gen. 4:4). Since God never accepted as an act of devotion to himself that which originated in the superstition of men, it is obvious that the offering of sacrifice was not a product or device of superstitious ignorance.

That the idea of sacrifice did not proceed from the natural emotions and sentiments is demonstrable by the fact that no one can conceive of a connected chain of ideas by which man could arrive at the notion that slitting the throat and burning the body of an innocent animal would expiate the sin of the one who did the killing. By what inductive or deductive reasoning could man arrive at such a conclusion? Reasoning consists of the act of combining two known facts in such a manner as to produce a third and new fact, called a conclusion. What would be the established major and minor premises by which mankind universally, and in diverse circumstances, would unanimously arrive at such a conclusion? Would not primitive man, guided solely by reason, be more likely to feel that one who sinned and then slew an innocent victim only added to his guilt by such action?

The ancient Greek philosophers who soared to the heights of logic confessed their utter astonishment at the prevalence of animal sacrifice and freely admitted they could not account for it upon any rational grounds. They agreed that man could not by any chain of thinking conclude that the practice would be pleasing to the Deity. If then, the idea of killing an innocent victim could not be discovered by the light of nature or arrived at by logical thought processes, and since God would not accept what originated as mere superstition, but did accept, acknowledge and approve animal sacrifices, such sacrifices must have been by revelation of the divine mind.

The universality of sacrifice can be accounted for in the fact that all nations proceeded from the sons of Noah. "These are the families of the sons of Noah according to their genealogies, in their nations; and from these the nations spread abroad on the earth after the flood" (Gen. 10:32). Sacrifice was taught by their common ancestor. "Then Noah built an altar to the Lord, and took of every clean animal and of every clean bird, and offered burnt offerings on the altar" (Gen. 8:20). But Noah only followed the practice of his antediluvian fathers.

The institution of sacrifice is not mentioned by Moses in his account of man's history. Abel was the first man of whom it is recorded that he offered a blood sacrifice. However, there may be an intimation that God taught Adam and Eve to slay animals in sacrifice for we read that "the Lord God made for Adam and his wife garments of skins, and clothed them" (Gen. 3:21). Animals were not used for food until after the flood (Gen. 9:3), yet they were divided into clean and unclean categories before this (Gen. 7:2). That this division was based upon use in sacrifices is shown by Genesis 8:20. It is possible then that God showed Adam how to inflict death upon the animal victims and clothed the original pair with the skins of these animals. The Hebrew term for "atonement" is copher and it means "to cover." Did God cover the nakedness and shame of Adam and his wife to indicate the purpose of sacrifice or atonement?

In Hebrews 11:4, we learn that "By faith Abel offered unto God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain through which he received approval as righteous, God bearing witness by accepting his gifts." There are four important facts revealed here relating to Abel's sacrifice. (1) It was offered by faith, (2) It was acceptable to God, (3) Through it he received approval as righteous, (4) God accepted his gift, thus bearing witness of his approval in the divine favor. Would God accept as an act of religious exercise, approve as righteous one who performed the act, and bear witness to such righteousness by acceptance of gifts, in a matter which he had not authorized? Is it not an undeniable principle that divine authority is always essential to any acceptable worship?

Moreover, faith is the belief of testimony. Where there is no testimony there can be no faith. If Abel offered an acceptable sacrifice by faith, he must have acted upon testimony. But only the testimony of God could define what is acceptable as worship to God. "Faith comes by hearing the word of God" (Rom. 10:17). We are forced to the conclusion that the idea of sacrifice emanated from God, and was revealed to fallen man as a means of expiation for his sin, and a propitiation of God.

DEFINITION OF SACRIFICE

Alexander Campbell defined sacrifice thus: "In its literal and primary acceptance, it is the solemn and religious infliction of death upon an innocent and unoffending victim, usually by shedding its blood! Figuratively, it means the offering of anything, living or dead, person, or animal, or property to God." This definition meets our present requirements, and is therefore adopted for this volume.

Sin produces death. That which expiates sin must be that which produces life. "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement, by reason of the life" (Lev. 17:11). For this reason, "under the law almost everything is purified with blood, and without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness of sins" (Heb. 9:22). But an inferior cannot atone for a superior, so "it is impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins" (Heb. 10:4). The sacrifices of ages past were but types and shadows of the one great sacrifice, of which it is written, "But when Christ had offered for all times a single sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God" (Heb. 10:12).

It was by virtue of this sacrifice that our Lord is frequently referred to as "the lamb of God." It was not because of his patience or humility, nor because of His life. He is called a lamb in respect to His death. His example of humility and his teaching could not expiate sin. Only by the shedding of blood could this be accomplished. When John the Immerser introduced Him it was as "the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (John 1:29). In Revelation, the writer says "I saw a Lamb standing as though it had been slain" (Rev. 5:6). In Him, priest and sacrifice met as one. "As it is, He has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb. 9:26). As we study the priesthood and sacrifices of yesteryear, let us do so with but one objective, a better understanding of the priesthood and sacrifice of Him who has introduced us to "a better hope by which we draw nigh to God." The former priests were many in number, because they were prevented by death from continuing in office; but he holds his priesthood permanently, because he continues forever (Heb. 7:23, 24).

Patriarchal Priests

Contents

In the revelation of God pertaining to the first age of the world, we have no lengthy theological discussions as to the nature of God, or the basis of his requirements for acceptable homage. Rather we have a rehearsal of events, of acts and facts. From these we gain our first lessons as to the character of God and His expectations of men. We learn about God by what He did. "In the beginning God created the heaven and earth." We learn about acceptable worship by observing the practice of those who engage in it. Nowhere are we given elaborate instruction concerning the introduction of sacrifice. No formal dedication, no grand presentation, marked its beginning. Had God not desired to inform us of the first murder, we would have perused the brief history of centuries without knowing that men were ministering at altars.

And we must depend for our knowledge of the priesthood of the patriarchal dispensation chiefly upon those bits of information directly connected with deeds performed. Of one thing we can be sure and that is that the principles governing intercourse with God are the same in all ages. Man must believe and obey to be acceptable with God. He may not be required to believe the same things, nor do the same things in all ages, but whatever God testifies he must believe and acting upon that faith he must obey whatever God requires of him. The eye can only respond to the light that is available, but it must respond to that if in a healthy state. A good man in every age is the same. He is one who fulfills his obligations to God and his fellowmen as God requires of him.

Originally every man was his own priest. Incongruous though this may seem, each was his own mediator. As he stood at the altar he represented one approaching unto God in behalf of his other self— his sinful being. Such a course was essential in the infancy of the world, for as it was once right for a man to marry his own sister to establish the race, it was right for him to act as his own priest to inaugurate the spiritual system. Abel was his own priest, and so was Noah, Abraham and Isaac.

As men multiplied and families expanded, the oldest male member approached God in behalf of the others. In this simple age of time, when the world was new and men had to learn much by experience, age was the chief qualification, for it provided opportunity for greater wisdom. When children married, and lived adjacent to the father's holdings, he still sacrificed in behalf of their increasing progeny. Of such a character was the patriarch Job, for while his sons all had houses of their own, "Job would send and sanctify them, and he would rise early in the morning and offer burnt offerings according to the number of them all" (Job 1:5). In this manner the patriarchs served in behalf of tribes or clans composed of their own descendants.

Upon the death of the father, by right of primogeniture, the firstborn son succeeded to his office as priestly mediator at the altar. It was on this basis that Esau was designated not only immoral, but irreligious, when he sold his birthright for a single meal (Heb. 12:16). To despise the birthright was to despise the solemn and sacred obligation toward God, which was enjoined by it. This also enjoined upon the father a responsibility of handing on to his children the sacred traditions of God, for which cause God said of Abraham "I have chosen him, that he may charge his children and his household after him to keep the way of the Lord by doing righteousness and justice." (Gen. 18:19). Righteousness pertains to our responsibility to God; justice to our responsibility toward our fellowmen. These two constitute the basis of all "religion that is pure and undefiled before God and the Father . . ."

Despite the dimness of the Starlight Age, it is possible to detect the pattern for future service unto God of a more elaborate nature. The occasions of the ministrations of the patriarchs in their priestly role are very informative. Let us glance briefly at some of the types of sacrifices.

(1) Thank offerings. In this category was the sacrifice of Noah when he came forth unto a world purged from sin by baptism in water. "And when the Lord smelled the pleasing odor, the Lord said in his heart, I will never again curse the ground because of man" (Gen. 8:21).

(2) Sin offerings. That the sacrifices of Job were of this nature is evidenced by his own expression as to his reason for making the burnt offerings. "For Job said, 'It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts'" (Job 1:5).

When God became incensed at the three "friends" of Job and declared they had not told the truth about Him, he instructed them, "Now therefore take seven bulls and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job will pray for you, for I will accept his prayer not to deal with you according to your folly; for you have not spoken of me what is right, as my servant Job has" (Job 42:7, 8). In this the role of expiatory sacrifice and mediatorship are clearly portrayed.

(3) Vow or dedication offerings. When Jacob was enroute to Haran, and slept all night at Luz, using a stone for a pillow, he was enabled to see a vision of God. The next morning "he took the stone which he had put under his head and set it up for a pillar and poured oil upon the top of it . . . Then Jacob made a vow" (Gen. 28:18). Years later Jacob came to the same place and set up a pillar of stone "and poured out a drink offering on it, and poured oil on it" (Gen. 35:14). In conjunction with this incident, it is worth observing that Jacob commanded his household and all who were with him, "Put away the foreign gods that are among you, and purify yourselves, and change your garments" (Gen. 35:2). It is quite generally agreed among scholars that the purification was by washing. Is this the forerunner of the ceremonial ablutions which were later practiced? If so, did it stem from a belief that God had cleansed the earth by water at the time of the flood? Some celebrated scholars believe this to be the case.

No study of the patriarchal sacrifices would be complete without special reference to God's confirmation of His promise to Abram. Upon the momentous occasion when it is said that Abram believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness, Abram asked assurance that his seed should possess the land of Canaan. God told him to bring a heifer, a goat, a ram, a turtledove and a pigeon. Abram cut the animals in two and laid each half over against the other, but he did not cut the birds in two. Through the day Abram kept the birds of prey from the carcasses. After sunset, when it was dark, a smoking fire pot and flaming torch passed between the pieces, and God made a solemn covenant to give the land to the descendants of Abram, even defining the boundaries of their inheritance (Gen. 15:7-21).

It will be noted that the animals and birds mentioned were the only ones which were later appointed for sacrifices by Abram's posterity, therefore God confirmed His covenant in the blood of every clean beast and fowl appointed for sacrifice. This very solemn method of ratification is alluded to in Jeremiah 34:18, where the Lord declares, "And the men who transgressed my covenant and did not keep the terms of the covenant which they made before me, I will make like the calf which they cut in two and passed between its parts." The covenanting parties shed the blood of an animal, then split its body in two, placing the parts opposite to each other with a sufficient distance between that they could walk in the space, whereupon they met and joined hands in the middle of the passageway. The significance of the symbol was that each said, in effect, "May I become like this animal if I break this covenant which we have made." That is why God said, "I will make them like the calf which they cut in two."

In the case of Abram, God was the party of the first part. He was represented by the visible symbols of a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch. Abram was the party of the second part. As the patriarchal priest, representing his entire posterity, he prepared the sacrifices, and unto him God certified the covenant. By such impressive methods did God reveal his promises and wishes unto the fathers.

But the priesthood in the Patriarchal Dispensation was not limited to the descendants of Abraham, nor to the blood line of the Messiah. Every ancient nation had its chosen priests long before the tribe of Levi was selected to minister in behalf of Israel. Melchizedek, who was king of Salem, was also priest of the Most High God, among the Jebusites (Gen. 14:18). Joseph married Asenath, daughter of the priest of On (Gen. 41:45). Moses married Zipporah, daughter of the priest of Midian (Ex. 3:1). The priests of Egypt were a recognized group supported from the king's treasury, for when Joseph was buying up the land of the famine-stricken inhabitants, "the land of the priests he did not buy, for the priests had a fixed allowance which Pharaoh gave them; therefore they did not sell their land" (Gen. 47:22).

Many of the nations, even as idolatry crept in among them, retained a fear of God as a heritage from the period before the days of Peleg, in whose generation the earth was divided (Gen. 10:25). Abraham was surprised to find a reverence for God in the heart of Abimelech, the Philistine king (Gen. 20:11). Pharaoh said of Joseph, "Can we find such a man as this in whom is the Spirit of God?" (Gen. 41:37). Jethro, the Midianite priest offered a burnt offering and sacrifices to God, and engaged in fellowship with Aaron and all of the elders of Israel (Exodus 18:12). But when God separated and segregated the nation which he brought from the loins of Abraham, and committed his oracles unto them, the rest of the world without this advantage (Rom. 3:1, 2) became dependent upon tradition and conscience.

Summarizing what we have learned about the Patriarchal Dispensation, we mention the following facts: (1) God revealed a system of religion with sacrifice, altar and priest, which was family wide in its inception; (2) Burnt offerings and sin offerings in conjunction with vows and dedication of memorable places gave hint of the type of service acceptable unto God; (3) An intimation of the need of ceremonial purification by the offerer of sacrifice is seen; (4) The selection of priestly mediators was universal among the nations; (5) The principle of atonement by blood was firmly established; (6) The death of an innocent victim for guilty sinners was clearly recognized. Such lessons aptly pointed forward to the time when the nations universally would acknowledge the need of a perfect mediator, a perfect priest and a perfect sacrifice for sins. They gave portent of an event in which the blood of an innocent being would be shed for the sins of the world. Thus did God in the Patriarchal Dispensation lay a groundwork for future revelation, and the simple lessons in the primary department of the world became a shadow of good things to come.

There remains, before we close our investigation of the priesthood in the first age of humanity, an investigation of a being of special significance, who combined within himself the offices of king and priest. We shall turn our attention briefly to this unique character in the history of religion and mankind.

PRIESTHOOD OF MELCHIZEDEK

Abram and Lot, his nephew, who had been traveling together, agreed to separate in order to avoid strife over the pasturage, so essential to their immense herds of livestock. Lot chose to dwell in the fertile plains of Jordan, and removed his family to Sodom, one of five cities in the Vale of Siddim. These cities were attacked by four kings who formed a confederacy, and who were successful in carrying off as captives, the inhabitants of the five cities, including Lot. When Abram heard of this, he pursued after the marauders, rescued their captives and retrieved the spoils. Returning from the foray, Abram passed by Salem, and thus the stage was set for meeting Melchizedek.

"And Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought out bread and wine; he was a priest of God Most High. And he blessed him and said, 'Blessed be Abram by God Most High, who has delivered your enemies into your hand!' And Abram gave him a tenth of everything" (Gen. 14:18-20).

These three small verses of Scripture give us virtually all of the information we have in the Old Testament, relating to this patriarch. He is mentioned but once more, by David in Psalm 110:4, where God decrees that his Son shall be made a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek. If it were not for the pointed allusions to him by the author of the New Testament book of Hebrews, we would be left to wonder at this Canaanite priest who pronounced a blessing upon the father of the Israelites, and to whom tithes were so respectfully paid.

WHO WAS MELCHIZEDEK?

A large volume could be written on the multitude of speculations concerning the identity of Melchizedek. Jewish tradition has always advanced the idea that he was Shem, who unquestionably was alive in the days of Abraham. The Targum of Jonathan says, "But Melchizedek, he is Shem, son of Noah, king of Jerusalem." With this the Jerusalem Targum agrees. There are a great many valid objections to this Jewish speculation. (1) What reason could be assigned for not calling him Shem? Moses calls him Shem in every other place. Would he be likely to make such a radical departure from his regular procedure, without proper explanation accompanying the same? (2) It is hardly probable that Shem would be reigning as king in Canaan, for Abraham was "a sojourner in a strange land," in that area. Moreover, he was told to leave his father's house, and his kindred, a thing he could hardly do if he came into a region over which an illustrious ancestor was a recognized monarch. (3) The apostle in Hebrews affirms that Melchizedek had no recorded father, mother or posterity. This was certainly not the case with Shem, whose lineage is easily traceable.

Another prevalent conjecture is that Melchizedek was actually the Son of God. Those who dislike to make "the father of the faithful" subservient to any tribal king of his day, advance this idea. But this would make the Son of God a type of himself, for the apostle says, "Resembling the Son of God he continues a priest forever" (Heb. 7:3). It would hardly be logical to say that one resembled himself. Again we read, "Another priest arises in the likeness of Melchizedek." Such expressions preclude the idea that Melchizedek was the Son of God, for he would not be said to be in his own likeness, or after his own order. Moreover, the theory would make Jesus both a king and priest before His death, contrary to all Scriptural teaching on the subject.

We hold the conviction that Melchizedek was a man who was invested with both the offices of king and priest, and as such was a divinely used instrument, introduced into the sacred history of the first age that he might be re-introduced into the history of the last age, to demonstrate the superiority of an enduring priesthood over a temporary one. For this very reason, the Holy Spirit, shrouded his life in mystery, giving no clue as to his progenitors or posterity, allowing no insight into predecessors or successors. He appears on the sacred page in his full glory as monarch and mediator, he pronounces a blessing upon the father of the faithful and receives from him a tenth of the spoils he has taken. And since "it is beyond dispute that the inferior is blessed by the superior" (Heb. 7:7) it is evident that the priest who is made after the order of Melchizedek will be superior in office and dignity to one who proceeds from the loins of Abraham.

In the primary age of the world God introduces us to a brief preview of a priesthood more glorious than that authorized from Sinai. Melchizedek met Abraham with bread and wine to provide physical sustenance. Our great high priest made after the same order met the children of faithful Abram with the same elements but consecrated them to a constant reminder of His sacrificial death. Abram paid tithes to Melchizedek because of his priestly relationship to God. "One might even say that Levi himself, who receives tithes, paid his ancestor when Melchizedek met him" (Heb. 7:9, 10). But here we must bid farewell to Melchizedek and the patriarchal dispensation in which he lived, to revert to a more thorough study of his priesthood when we have completed our investigation of that of Levi, or Aaron.

The Nation of Israel

Contents

The Patriarchal religion was adapted to the spiritual needs of men at a time when the world was divided into families, tribes or clans. But when tribes multiplied, and came together to live a composite existence, something new was required. All of the provisions of God were made for the ultimate benefit of the whole earth. This required the coming of the Savior to offer the Supreme sacrifice once for all. However, to preserve the world until that time, it was necessary to preserve the belief in the one true God. This could be a difficult task when the whole world was creating gods of every description. It could best be achieved by the selection of one people, their separation from others, and their continued segregation. Such a people would need a definite constitution, the basic law of which would be "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," in order that they could be called back to their original purpose when they wandered from it.

Accordingly when every nation had chosen its gods, the God of heaven chose a nation. As a preparatory step He went to the land of Chaldea, and called a man whose father and grandfather were already idolaters (Josh. 24:2). Demanding that this man separate himself from his father's house and all of his relatives, God promised to make him a great nation. Abraham "sojourned in the land of promise, as in a foreign land, living in tents with Isaac and Jacob" (Heb. 11:9). But nomadic life is poor training for a secure national existence, for nomads want to be ever on the move. They know but little about construction of permanent cities, and resent any attempt to confine them for any length of time to a sedentary life.

Thus as a preparation for a strong national existence, the providence of God, removed the posterity of Abraham temporarily from the promised land. Making them slaves so they could not escape, He burnt out of their hearts the wanderlust which had been so much a part of their tribal existence, so that even when turned loose, they repeatedly tried to go back, choosing to endure slavery with its regular provisions of the fleshpots than a life in tents pitched in the wilderness. For several hundred years God allowed them to be confined in the most civilized nation of that day, and they were forced to learn the art of brickmaking, and labored in the construction of such storage cities as Pithom and Raamses (Exo. 1:11). Little did the Egyptian taskmasters realize that they were schooling unwilling apprentices whose posterity would erect some of the most beautiful structures ever constructed by human hands on the hills of Zion.

When the proper time had arrived, God directed Moses to go as his ambassador to the proud and haughty court of Pharaoh. The message was, "Thus says the Lord, the God of Israel, Let my people go!" Moses enforced his demands with a sufficient demonstration of power that the freed captives stood upon the other side of the Red Sea. Now began the tremendous task of welding this fearful, discouraged, murmuring host of once hopeless slaves into a cohesive nation which would preserve the greatest trust ever committed to any people thus far in history.

The first essential was a constitution which would act as a rallying point. The multitude was led to the foot of a high mountain which would serve as a speaker's platform for God. Here was given one of the most startling promises ever made. First God cited what He had done for them. "You have seen what I did to the Egyptians and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself" (Exo. 19:4). Then He declared, "Now therefore, if you will obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my own possession among all peoples, for all the earth is mine, and you shall be to me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation." (Exo. 19:5, 6). This implies God's intention of making them a nation of sanctified people, each of whom might serve as a priest in his own right. Citizenship in the kingdom would constitute admission to priesthood. Observe that this was contingent upon obeying God's voice and keeping His covenant. God proposed that this people who were "His own possession" should be so holy that He could speak and commune with each of them without an earthly mediator or intervening priest.

When God's proposition was placed before the people they gave unanimous consent to it. "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." Moses was instructed to consecrate the people for two days, so that on the third day God could address them all in a body. The people were required to wash their garments. They were to abstain from all sexual congress. Nothing that would render them unclean or act as a distracting element was to be countenanced. Bounds were placed about the mountain and the instruction was issued, "Do not go up into the mountain, or touch the border of it. Whoever touches the mountain shall be put to death; no hand shall touch him, but he shall be stoned or shot, whether beast or man, he shall not live."

On the morning of the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud settled upon the mountain. A loud trumpet blast caused the people to tremble. Suddenly the whole mountain quaked. The trumpet grew louder and louder. Then the voice of God came, giving the basic constitution of ten commandments. So frightened were the people that they stood afar off and shook. Then they appealed to Moses "You speak to us, and we will hear; but let not God speak to us, lest we die." Moses explained to them "God has come to test you, that the fear of Him may be before your eyes." But the people had enough. The heads of their tribes and their elders came to Moses and pleaded with him, "Go near, and hear all that the Lord our God will say; and speak to us all that the Lord our God will speak to you; and we will hear and do it" (Deut. 5:27). They were not ready to dispense with an earthly mediator. God said to Moses, "I have heard the words of this people, which they have spoken to you, they have rightly said all that they have spoken. . . . Go, and say to them, 'Return to your tents!' But you, stand here by me, and I will tell you all the commandments and the statutes and the ordinances which you shall teach them."

While Moses was upon the mount to receive the sacred constitution the people demonstrated their unworthiness to act as a kingdom of priests. They gathered themselves together to Aaron, and said, "Up, make us gods, who shall go before us." At the instigation of Aaron they took off their golden ornaments, and from the precious metal he formed a calf. An altar was erected before the image, "and they rose up early on the morrow, and offered burnt offerings and brought peace offerings; and the people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play" (Exo. 32:6). When Moses returned with the national constitution on two tables of stone, and saw the calf and the dancing, he threw the tables out of his hands and broke them at the foot of the mountain. He took the calf, burnt it, ground it to powder, scattered it upon the water, and made the people of Israel drink it. For once, they literally had a bellyful of idolatry!

Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said "Who is on the Lord's side? Come to me." The sons of Levi gathered themselves unto him. Moses instructed them to take their swords and go through the camp slaying everyone they met. Three thousand men fell that day. (With the introduction of the law three thousand died; with the introduction of the gospel three thousand were saved. Truly the first brought death, while the second is "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus.") Moses said to the tribe of Levi, "Today you have ordained yourselves for the service of the Lord, each one at the cost of his son and of his brother; that He may bestow a blessing upon you this day"

(Exo. 32:29). The holy nation and the kingdom of priests had failed in two great crises. They could not stand to hear God speak directly, when He tested them; and they had rebelled against the cornerstone of their constitution— the first and second commandments. They must have an earthly mediator and a special priesthood. The ideal of God would reach its fruition in another and a better age.

The Priesthood of Levi

Contents

Prior to the formal appointment of the tribe of Levi to offer sacrifices in behalf of Israel, there were men among them recognized as priests by the congregation. When the people were gathered at Sinai to receive the law, the Lord said, "And also let the priests who come near to the Lord consecrate themselves, lest the Lord break out upon them" (Exo. 19:22). These special priests may have been the firstborn sons of the Israelites, for they had been told previously to consecrate all of these unto the Lord (Exo. 13:2, 15). In any event they were young men who served in this capacity, for Moses "sent young men of the people of Israel, who offered burnt offerings, and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen to the Lord" (Exo. 24:5). They corresponded to "the young men" who were specially ordained in the church to minister in temporal matters (Acts 5:6, 10).

In the instructions given to Moses for the construction of the tabernacle, God said, "Then bring near to you Aaron your brother, and his sons with him, from among the people of Israel, to serve me as priests— Aaron and Aaron's sons, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar" (Exo. 28:1). The priesthood being changed, there was made of necessity a change of the law (Heb. 7:12). No longer could an Israelite offer sacrifices as in the previous dispensation. The tribe of Levi was consecrated to God in behalf of the entire congregation. The Lord killed the firstborn of every home in Egypt to purchase redemption for Israel. For this reason he demanded in return the firstborn of every family in Israel. Then he adopted the tribe of Levi instead of the firstborn of all the tribes, thus guaranteeing the separation of the tribes until the Messiah came. God said "Behold, I have taken the Levites from among the people of Israel instead of every firstborn that opens the womb among the people of Israel. The Levites shall be mine, for all the firstborn are mine; and the day that I slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, I consecrated for my own all the firstborn in Israel" (Num. 3:11-13).

Levi had three sons: Gershon, Kohath and Merari. Aaron was of the family of Kohath. Only Aaron and his direct descendants could be priests (Num. 3:3). The rest of the descendants of Gershon, Kohath and Merari constituted the Levites. God said, "Bring the tribe of Levi near, and set them before Aaron the priest that they may minister to him. They shall perform duties for him and for the whole congregation before the tent of meeting, as they minister at the tabernacle; they shall have charge of all the furnishings of the tent of meeting, and attend to the duties for the people of Israel as they minister at the tabernacle. And you shall give the Levites to Aaron and his sons; they are wholly given to him from among the people of Israel. And you shall appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall attend unto their priesthood; but if anyone else comes near, he shall be put to death" (Num. 3:5, 10). All priests were Levites, but not all Levites were priests. We are especially interested in the service of the priests.

QUALIFICATIONS OF PRIESTS

1. Genealogical. The priest had to be a lineal descendant of Aaron, and be able to establish the fact from the official records. After the Babylonian captivity there were certain claimants to the honor who "sought their registration among those enrolled in the genealogies, but they were not found there, and so they were excluded from the priesthood as unclean; the governor told them that they were not to partake of the holy food, until there should be a priest to consult Urim and Thummim" (Ezra 2:62, 63). The Urim and Thummim were set in the breastplate of judgment which the high priest wore.

By looking into them he could determine God's judgment on any matter. The words mean "lights" and "perfections" and signified the perfect light by which the high priest could ascertain God's will in any matter of dispute.

2. Physical. A priest had to be physically perfect, that is, possessed of all members of the body, with each properly proportioned. One who was blind, lame, mutilated or blemished in any fashion could not minister at the altar. Such a person could be sustained by the priest's ration, but was not allowed to participate in the services (Lev. 21:16-23). No priest was permitted to shave off the edges of his beard or to make any cuttings in his flesh (Lev. 21:5). At the same time, the high priest was not to let the hair of his head hang loose (Lev. 21:10).

3. Marital. A priest was not permitted to marry a widow, a divorcee or a prostitute. He could marry a virgin provided she was not a foreigner (Lev. 21:7, 13, 14). It appears that a later provision permitted him to marry the widow of another priest (Ezek. 44:22).

4. Social. When Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, offered unholy fire before the Lord, they were killed (Lev. 10:1, 2). At this time God said to Aaron, "Drink no wine nor strong drink, you nor your sons with you, when you shall go into the tent of meeting, lest you die; it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations. You are to distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean" (Lev. 10:8-11). Were Nadab and Abihu under the influence of liquor when they took the wrong kind of fire for the incense? Such drinking was forever afterward barred to those who officiated at the sacred rites.

The high priest could not go in to any dead body nor come in contact with any corpse (Lev. 21:10). One of the common priests could assist in the preparation and burial of the body of his father, mother, son, daughter, brother or virgin sister (Lev. 21:1-3). Even so, he became ceremonially unclean and was not permitted to minister in any of the holy things for seven days (Ezek. 44:26).

ORDINATION OF PRIESTS

Even though men possessed the qualifications they could not serve in the priestly office until formally ordained. Moses was told with reference to Aaron and his sons to "anoint them and ordain them and consecrate them, that they may serve me as priests" (Exo. 28:41). The consecration ceremony is fully described in Exodus 29 and Leviticus 8. We cannot here give a detailed description. Every such ceremony should have a dual purpose. It should deeply impress the incumbents with the sacredness, dignity and seriousness of the office, and at the same time lead the people to a deep respect for a ministration authorized of God and affecting so minutely their welfare and interests. Some of the outstanding items connected with the consecration follow.

1. A sin offering was provided to enforce the need for expiation of guilt (Exo. 29:1). Thus is illustrated the declaration that "the law appoints men in their weakness as high priests," and such men must offer sacrifices, first for their own sins and then for those of the people (Heb. 7:27, 28).

2. The appointee was then stripped of his old garments and his whole body washed with water (Lev. 29:4).

3. The robes of office were then placed upon him after which there was an anointing with oil. In the case of the high priest the oil was poured on so copiously that it ran down upon his beard, even "running down on the collar of his robes!" The common priests had the oil sprinkled upon them. Truly, he who was high priest was "anointed with oil above his fellows."

4. Blood was applied to the tip of the right ear, and upon the thumb of the right hand, and the great toe of the right foot of each priest. From henceforth the priest was to belong wholly to God, from head to foot. He was to hear nothing except what God wanted him to hear, do nothing God did not want him to do, and go nowhere God did not want him to walk. He was sealed with the blood of the sacrifice and as such was "God's man."

5. The period of consecration lasted for seven days. Among the Jews, the number seven indicated perfection or completeness. Thus the priests were to be wholly dedicated unto the service of God, fully consecrated before they began their ministration in behalf of others.

While Aaron and his sons were in the process of being consecrated, the altar was likewise being sanctified. "Seven days you shall make atonement for the altar and consecrate it, and the altar shall be most holy; whatever touches the altar shall become holy" (Exo. 29:37). The word for atonement, when applied to persons means "to expiate or atone for," but with regard to things, it has the significance of "purging, cleansing, purifying." After this solemn initiation into divine service the altar not only was sanctified to God's use, but possessed the divine warrant to impart sanctity unto any offering placed upon it. To this our Lord alluded when he said to the Pharisees and scribes, "You blind men! Which is greater, the gift or the altar that makes the gift sacred?" (Matt. 23:19).

FUNCTIONS OF LEVITICAL PRIESTHOOD

"At that time the Lord set apart the tribe of Levi to carry the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister to him and bless in his name, to this day" (Deut. 10:8). This indicates a three-fold responsibility: (1) The care of the tabernacle and sacred furniture; (2) Ministration in service pertaining unto God; (3) Pronouncing the divine blessing upon the congregation. This agrees with the statement of the Lord to Aaron, "You shall attend to the duties of the sanctuary, and the duties of the altar, that there be wrath no more upon the people of Israel . . . and you and your sons with you shall attend to your priesthood for all that concerns the altar and that is within the veil, and you shall serve. I give your priesthood as a gift, and any one else who comes near shall be put to death" (Num. 18:5, 7). To this also the New Covenant in its references to the Levitical priesthood gives assent. "Every high priest chosen from among men is appointed to act on behalf of men in relation to God, to offer gifts and sacrifices for sins" (Heb. 5:1). "These preparations having thus been made the priests go continually into the outer tent, performing their ritual duties" (Heb. 9:6).

RITUAL DUTIES

So multitudinous were these duties, and of such a variety, that a large volume could be filled with their enumeration and description. Time would fail us to speak of all of them, so we must content ourselves with but a small number.

1. At the consecration of Aaron "fire came forth from before the Lord and consumed the burnt offering and fat upon the altar, and when all the people saw it, they shouted and fell on their faces" (Lev. 9:24). The expression "from before the Lord" means from the Most Holy Place, where the Shekinah, or glory of God dwelt and was manifest. This fire divinely kindled was to be kept alive by refueling. "The fire on the altar shall not go out" (Lev. 6:12, 13). It was coals of this fire which had to be used in burning incense (Lev. 16:12), so when Nadab and Abihu "offered unholy fire before the Lord, such as he had not commanded them" (Lev. 10:1), fire came out from before the Lord and struck them dead.

2. Each day the priests were to offer two male lambs. In this daily sacrifice one lamb was offered at the third hour of the morning, that is 9 o'clock; the other at the ninth hour of the afternoon, that is 3 o'clock (Num. 28:3-6). It became traditional for the congregation to assemble for prayer at the time of these sacrifices (Acts 3:1) and they abstained from eating and drinking until after the morning sacrifice was offered (Acts 2:15). On the sabbath these sacrifices were doubled, two lambs being offered each time (Num. 28:9, 10). The servile work necessary in presenting these sabbatical sacrifices gave occasion for our Lord's remarks as recorded in Matthew 12:5.

The Israelites based their religious observances on the lunar calendar. Accordingly, the priests were to offer special sacrifices to inaugurate each month. As soon as the silver trumpet sounded the appearance of the new moon, the month was officially opened with burnt offerings (Num. 28:11-16). These are the "new moons" mentioned in Colossians 2:16. Other regular sacrifices were made in conjunction with the three great annual festival occasions. In every case of sin, the guilty person was required to present a sacrifice before the priest, who then slew it in conformity with the ordinance.

3. The priest also acted as a judge in many instances. This was true in cases involving homicide, legal rights, or assault, where the testimony was not clear. The Israelites were instructed that, "in any case within your towns which is too difficult for you, arise and go up to the place which the Lord your God will choose, coming to the Levitical priests and the judge who is in office in those days, you shall consult them, and they shall declare to you the decision" (Deut. 17:8, 9). Such a decision was final and could not be altered. "You shall be careful to do according to all that they direct you; according to the instructions which they give you, and according to the decision which they pronounce to you, you shall not turn aside from the verdict which they declare to you, either to the right hand or to the left" (Deut. 17:10, 11).

False accusers were to receive summary discipline. "If a malicious witness arises against any man to accuse him of wrongdoing, then both parties shall appear before the Lord, before the priests and the judges who are in office in those days; the judges shall enquire diligently, and if the witness is a false witness, and has accused his brother falsely, then you shall do to him as he had meant to do to his brother; so you shall purge the evil from the midst of you."

One of the most interesting and peculiar decisions in which the priest assisted pertained to a woman whose husband suspected she was guilty of carnal relationship with another man. The priest took holy water in an earthen vessel, and mixed it with dust scraped off the tabernacle floor. The woman was forced to drink the water, and if she was guilty of unconfessed crime, the water caused intense abdominal pain which was accompanied by bodily swelling and other symptoms. An innocent woman suffered no such ill effects. The record declares, "This is the law in cases of jealousy" (Num. 5:29).

The priest was to determine when a man had contracted leprosy. Anyone who had an indication of the disease was to be examined and isolation was the fate of those afflicted. When one was pronounced unclean by the priest, he was compelled to wear torn clothing, let the hair of his head hang loose, cover his upper lip, and cry, "Unclean, unclean" when anyone approached. He was banished from his home and forced to dwell outside the camp (Lev. 13:45). Often such unfortunates dwelled in tombs as the only available shelters. If the disease ran its course and the leper believed himself to be free from its ravages he could present himself to the priest who made a thorough investigation. If the man proved to be free of the disease he performed a ritual for ceremonial cleansing and return to society (Lev. 14). It was because of this requirement that Jesus commanded the leper whom he had physically cleansed, "Go and show yourself to the priest, and make an offering for your cleansing as Moses commanded for a proof to the people" (Luke 5:14).

4. Aaron and his sons were to superintend the tabernacle. When the signal was given to march they dismantled the tabernacle, covered all of the articles of furniture, and prepared them for transportation. Then the Kohathites came near and the priests assigned to each man his task and his burden. They did the same for the Gershonites and Merarites who were charged with the actual transportation of all the essential equipment from place to place. Later, when the temple was built, the priests lived round about it as guards. They also opened the building every morning (1 Chron. 9:27). The utensils of service had to be carefully checked in and out, the spices had to be mixed for the incense, and the showbread baked every sabbath (1 Chr. 9:28-32). These tasks fell to the priests.

DAY OF ATONEMENT

Special mention needs to be made of this great day, which was observed annually on the tenth day of the seventh month. This month was ushered in with a festival of trumpets. The first day was to be observed as a day of solemn rest, a memorial day (Lev. 23:23-25). This is the great Jewish New Year still observed by Jews throughout the world.

Beginning at sunset on the ninth day of this month, the day of national expiation was ushered in to be observed until the close of the following day. It was the only day of fasting specifically commanded the Jews by the Old Testament, and during this entire day they were to partake of no refreshment, but rather "afflict their souls" (Lev. 23:27). Luke refers to it in Acts 27:9. Upon this fateful day the high priest entered the holy of holies. No common priest was ever permitted to enter this sacred apartment, and even the high priest was restricted to this occasion as a representative of the nation (Lev. 16:2). He was required to select a young bullock for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering. Divesting himself of his rich robes of office, he donned white linen clothing, for on this day he stood upon an equality with others, being forced to offer for his own sins as well as for those of the people.

He then took two goats for a sin offering for the people, and after presenting them before the Lord, he placed two pieces of gold in a small box. On one appeared the words "For the Lord," and on the other "For Azazel" which is translated "scapegoat" in the King James Version. The pieces of gold were drawn out and placed upon the heads of the goats. The one upon which the Lord's lot fell was destined to be slain.

The high priest killed the bullock for his own sins and caught the blood. He then filled the golden censer with coals of fire from the altar and put incense upon them. This incense created a fragrant smoke which veiled the mercy seat. Then the high priest sprinkled the blood with his finger before the mercy seat seven times. Then coming out, he killed the goat for the sins of the people, and took its blood into the most holy place and sprinkled it upon and before the mercy seat.

Afterwards the goat which remained alive was brought, and the high priest confessed over it all the iniquity and transgressions of Israel, putting them upon the head of the goat which was then sent away into the wilderness by a man in readiness (Lev. 16:21). It is said, "The goat shall bear all their iniquities upon him to a solitary land." (Lev. 16:22). Then the high priest went into the tent of meeting, took off his linen garments, bathed his body in water, and put on his ministering garb and continued the ritual activities demanded. The writer of Hebrews makes numerous references to this day of atonement, of which he says, "Into the second only the high priest goes, and he but once a year, and not without taking blood which he offers for himself and for the errors of the people. By this the Holy Spirit indicates that the way into the sanctuary is not yet opened as long as the outer tent is still standing (which is symbolic for the present age)" (Heb. 9:7-9).

A Copy and Shadow

Contents

We must not forget our original premise that in each dispensation, God prepared mankind for the reception of greater revelations in succeeding dispensations. We live in the final age of the earth. The apostle declares that those things which happened to God's ancient people "were written down for our instruction, upon whom the end of the ages has come" (1 Cor. 10:11). Again he states, "For whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction, that by steadfastness and by the encouragement of the scriptures we might have hope" (Rom. 15:4). We should be deeply grateful as we read of the priesthood of the past ages that "God had foreseen something better for us" (Heb. 11:40).

It is a proof of the divinity of the Bible that it contains a shadow or likeness of a substance or body which did not yet exist. To have a shadow, three things are required: a substance, a light, and a reflection. We cannot create a shadow from a non-existent substance. Only God could create a shadow first, then bring into existence the substance, so that the light of truth directed against it would reveal the exactness of the shadow. The service of the Old Covenant priesthood constituted a type of our service and sanctuary in the Christian era. "They serve as a copy and shadow of the heavenly sanctuary, for when Moses was about to erect the tent, he was instructed by God, saying 'See that you make everything according to the pattern which was shown you on the mountain'" (Heb. 8:5). "For Christ has entered not into a sanctuary made with hands, a copy of the true one, but into heaven itself" (Heb. 9:24). "These are only a shadow of what is to come; but the substance belongs to Christ" (Col. 2:17). As the substance is superior to a shadow, so is the present system superior to that which preceded it.

But since a reflection bears a resemblance to that which it shadows, so may we learn of God's plan and purpose by studying the former priesthood. The record thereof is a part of those former things written for our instruction. We propose a few suggestions along this line to encourage the student into greater research in God's former revelation.

THE HIGH PRIEST IN TYPE

The high priest of the Old Covenant foreshadowed Christ. Both were specially called of God to their positions. "One does not take the honor upon himself, but he is called by God, just as Aaron was. So also Christ did not exalt himself to be made a high priest, but was appointed by him who said to him, 'Thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee.'" (Heb. 5:4, 5). There could be but one high priest at a time under the Levitical regime, there can be but one high priest any time during this dispensation. "He holds his priesthood permanently, because he continues forever" (Heb. 7:24).

Both Aaron and Christ were ordained to serve in behalf of others in matters pertaining unto God. Aaron was vested with special robes of office, created for glory and beauty. Isaiah pictures our Lord as "glorious in his apparel, marching in the greatness of his strength" (Isa. 63:1). When the seer upon Patmos beheld him, he was clothed with a long robe and with a golden girdle about his breast (Rev. 1:13). The ancient high priest had written across his mitered brow "Holiness to the Lord." When the conquering Christ appeared to John, he portrayed him thus, "On his head are many diadems; and he has a name inscribed which no one knows but himself. He is clad in a robe dipped in blood and the name by which he is called is The Word of God . . . On his robe and on his thigh he has a name inscribed, King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev. 19:12, 13, 16).

When the high priest served in his mediatorial robe, he bore upon his breast and next to his heart the names of all of the tribes in whose behalf he officiated. Their names were upon the onyx stones on his shoulders and in the precious stones upon his bosom. Just as he could never forget those whose care weighed heavily upon him, and for whom he interceded before the mercy seat, so our high priest carries a sympathetic understanding of all our needs. "For we have not a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but one who in every respect has been tempted as we are, yet without sinning. Let us then with confidence draw near to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy and find grace to help in time of need" (Heb. 4:15, 16).

Aaron began his public ministry by being washed, the act being performed by Moses. Our Lord began his personal ministry by being washed in the waters of baptism, the immersion being performed by John the Immerser. Aaron was anointed with oil which was poured upon him so generously that it ran down upon his beard and the collar of his coat. The lesser priests were anointed with the same oil but not in such a measure. Even so our Lord was anointed with the Spirit sent down from heaven. It was this anointing which "Christed" him, and it was not given to him by measure (John 3:34).

In his official capacity Aaron was a mediator, standing between God and the people. Now "there is one God, and there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5). Aaron was also a judge, and by the aid of the Urim and Thummim, he could render a perfect decision from which no appeal could be made. The apostle declares that God "has fixed a day on which he will judge the world in righteousness by a man whom he has appointed, and of this he has given assurance to all men by raising him from the dead" (Acts 17:31). Jesus said, "The Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son" (John 5:22).

The high priest secured atonement for all of the nation. It was he who took the blood into the holiest of all, and there behind the veil, sprinkled it before the mercy seat. This had to be repeated annually. "But when Christ appeared as a high priest of the good things that have come, then through the greater and more perfect tent, he entered once for all into the Holy Place, taking not the blood of goats and calves but his own blood, thus securing eternal redemption" (Heb. 9:11, 12). "Nor was it to offer himself repeatedly, as the high priest enters the Holy Place yearly with blood not his own; for then he would have had to suffer repeatedly since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself."

It is observable that on the day of atonement the high priest was forced to carry out the ritual alone. "There shall be no man in the tent of meeting when he enters to make atonement in the holy place" (Lev. 16:17). Our high priest also was bereft of all help in his great sacrificial atonement for the world. There was no friend to aid. His response as made by the prophet was, "I have trodden the wine press alone, and from the peoples no one was with me" (Isa. 63:3).

We must not forget that it is impossible for that which is weak and finite to perfectly portray that which is perfect. Consequently there must be discrepancies in the comparison of the priesthoods, and points of contrast as well as of similarity. Some of these are mentioned by the sacred writers. The ancient high priests became such by fleshly descent, but of Christ it is stated, "Who has become a priest, not according to a legal requirement concerning bodily descent but by the power of an indestructible life" (Heb. 7:16). Again, those who formerly became priests took their office without an oath, but this one was addressed with an oath, "The Lord has sworn, and will not change his mind, Thou art a priest forever" (Heb. 7:21). Then, too, the former priests were many in number, because they were prevented by death from continuing in office; but he holds his priesthood permanently, "because he continues forever" (Heb. 7:23, 24).

THE COMMON PRIESTS

The priests associated with Aaron were typical of all Christians, associated with our great high priest in the service of God. Every Christian is consecrated and sanctified as a priest, there are many priests. Besides these there are no other priestly orders recognized by heaven. There can be no hierarchical distinctions in the church. Every priest of God is of equal dignity in the divine arrangement. There is no distinction between a clergy and laity.

The common priests of the Old Covenant were all sons of high priests. Their priesthood grew out of their relation to him. They became priests because they were born into his family. Thus it is in this dispensation. We are priests of God because of our relationship to Christ and for no other reason. We become priests by being born again. Those steps which are required to make us sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, introduce us into the priesthood. There was no priesthood for Aaron's descendants separate and apart from his priesthood, there is none for us out of Christ. It is only as he lives in us and we live in him that we become a kingdom of priests unto God.

In many respects the consecration of Aaron and his sons was alike. They were made partakers of the same ritual for sanctification in their priestly functions. In like manner our Lord "though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being born in the likeness of men." (Phil. 2:6, 7). "For he who sanctifies and those who are sanctified have all one origin. That is why he is not ashamed to call them brethren" (Heb. 2:10). Accordingly, some of those features required to begin the personal ministry of our Lord are requisite to introduce us to our ministration as priests. We, too, must be washed in the waters of baptism, and the gift of the Spirit is made to us upon completion of this initiatory rite (Acts 2:38; 5:32). Certainly we do not receive the measure of the Spirit as poured out upon Christ, but we are anointed with the Spirit as sons of God (Gal. 4:6).

The ancient priests required first a blood sacrifice before they could be consecrated. The same holds true for ourselves. They were required to put off their old garments; we are required to "hate the garment spotted by the flesh" (Jude 23). They were required to be completely washed in the laver; we must submit to "the washing of regeneration" (Titus 3:5). They were adorned with robes of glory and beauty; we are to "Put on then, as God's chosen ones, holy and beloved, compassion, kindness, lowliness, meekness and patience" (Col. 3:12). They received an application of the anointing oil when washed; we are saved "by the washing of regeneration and renewal in the Holy Spirit, which he poured out upon us richly through Jesus Christ our Savior" (Titus 3:5, 6).

The priests of the former dispensation were made such by obedience to the commands of God. Moses could not originate, devise or invent ceremonies, rituals, or modes of induction. At the very outset "Moses said to the congregation, 'This is the thing which the Lord has commanded to be done'" (Lev. 8:5). Nothing else would have been accepted or recognized by heaven. Those who were introduced by some other form would never have been accepted or recognized as priests. In a like manner, those who today have not been baptized into Christ can never be accepted as priests of God. Only God can stipulate those terms by which men may approach unto him in acceptable service. No substitutionary measures will be allowed to stand.

The Old Covenant priests were ordained to serve and not to be served. They were set apart to minister and not to be ministered unto. Every priest of God, sanctified to his service, was expected to engage actively in that service. The priests did not hire a substitute to officiate in their places. Priesthood conferred a special personal obligation to minister unto God and to others. This obligation grew out of relationship to the sanctuary and to God. True, the priests did not all do the same thing at the same time, but they did in turn whatever service was required and whatever fell their lot at any given time. It is said of Zechariah "Now while he was serving as priest before God when his division was on duty, according to the custom of the priesthood, it fell to him by lot to enter the temple of the Lord and burn incense" (Luke 1:8, 9). Is there not a lesson in this for God's priests today to qualify themselves to do anything required in the service of God, when it may fall their lot to do it? Aaron and his sons were ordained to "serve God as priests" (Exo. 28:1), and not to be served. Unless God's people today personally minister unto him as priests they void his plan, and defeat his eternal purpose.

The blood of the sacrifice was applied to the extremities of each priest. It was placed upon the tip of his right ear, on the thumb of the right hand, and on the great toe of the right foot. This dedicated the whole body to God. From this time forward he was "God's man." It was not enough that the sacrifice be killed and the blood shed. That blood had to be applied to each individual. Thus it is also with God's priests. The blood must be applied to each heart. "For if the sprinkling of defiled persons with the blood of goats and bulls and with the ashes of a heifer sanctifies for the purification of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish to God, purify your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (Heb. 9:13, 14). It is in view of this that the record declares, "Therefore, brethren, since we have confidence to enter the sanctuary by the blood of Jesus . . . let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:19, 22). The Christian is God's man. He belongs wholly unto God. "You are not your own; you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body." (1 Cor. 6:19, 20). A Levitical priest met death if he forgot the sanctification of the blood. "How much worse punishment do you think will be deserved by the man who has spurned the Son of God, and profaned the blood of the covenant by which he was sanctified, and outraged the Spirit of grace?" (Heb. 10:29.)

The most holy place was a type of heaven. Into it only the high priest went, "and he but once a year, and not without taking blood which he offers for himself and for the errors of the people. By this the Holy Spirit indicates that the way into the sanctuary is not yet opened as long as the outer tent is still standing" (Heb. 9:7, 8). The holy place before the curtain represents the church. It was here the common priests ministered. "The priests go continually into the outer tent, performing their ritual duties" (Heb. 9:6).

In the outer tent stood the table containing the bread of the Presence. There were twelve loaves, one for each tribe. This bread could be eaten only by the priests, and had to be eaten in the tent. It was changed once every seven days, and was eaten at that time. The Lord has a table in his church today. It contains the bread of His Presence. There is but one loaf upon it, because there is no longer any tribal distinction. "Thou wast slain and by thy blood didst ransom men from every tribe and tongue and people and nation, and hast made them a kingdom and priests to our God, and they shall reign on earth" (Rev. 5:9, 10). "Because there is one loaf, we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the same loaf" (1 Cor. 10:17). The hallowed bread can only be eaten by God's priests, by Christians. It is wrong to offer it to those who have not been sanctified by obedience to the commands of God. It is to be eaten by God's priests once every seven days. In the primitive church the disciples met together upon the first day of the week to break bread.

The only source of light in the tabernacle was the golden lampstand. It consisted of a center shaft which supported three branches or divisions on either side. These received their strength from their attachment to the center shaft. In all there were seven lamps, the number seven signifying perfection to the Jews. There is but one source of light in the church, the Word of God. It is a perfect light. The testimony concerning Christ as given by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John constitutes the center support. The three divisions of God's revelation previously given all point forward to Christ. Christ said, "These are my words which I spoke to you, while I was still with you, that everything written about me in the law of Moses and the prophets and the Psalms must be fulfilled" (Luke 24:44). The three divisions following: history, epistolary and prophecy (Acts, epistles and Revelation) all point backward to Christ. Destroy the center shaft and all would fall. It was the duty of the priests in the Mosaic dispensation to attend to the lamps daily. They were to see that these lamps were always prepared to shine brightly, and that they were "set up so as to give light upon the space in front of it" (Lev. 25:37). The priests of God now should daily attend unto the study and proclamation of God's Word. This was true in the primitive church. "Every day in the temple and at home they did not cease teaching and preaching Jesus as the Christ" (Acts 5:42).

The golden altar also stood in the holy place. Upon it incense was burnt to send up a sweet odor before the mercy seat of God. The incense was burnt every morning and every evening (Exo. 30:7, 8). In Revelation 5:8 we read of "golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints." The psalmist entreated, "Let my prayer be counted as incense before thee, and the lifting up of my hands as an evening sacrifice" (Psalm 141:2). Surely God's priests in this age should minister daily at "the golden altar"; for we are instructed, "Through him then let us continually offer up a sacrifice of praise to God, that is, the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name" (Heb. 13:15).

It is with reluctance we conclude this chapter. We are fully aware that we have not plumbed the depths of God's great typical institution, and shall be content if, having scratched the surface, we may encourage the reader to dig ever deeper, and like the husbandman of the parable "of his treasure bring forth things new and old." We stand lost in wonder and amazement at the spiritual negative from which the perfected picture has been developed, especially when we contemplate that the negative was made before the body existed to be photographed. When the body was at last brought into existence, the negative was shown to be a perfect reproduction. "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning."

A Profane Priesthood

Contents

"Her prophets are wanton, faithless men; her priests profane what is sacred, they do violence to the law" (Zeph. 3:4). The writer of the Hebrew letter asserts that the high priest under the Mosaic law could "deal gently with the ignorant and wayward, since he himself is beset with weakness" (Heb. 5:2). Speaking of our Lord, it is affirmed, "He has no need, like those high priests, to offer sacrifices daily, first for his own sins and then for those of the people" (Heb. 7:27).

The human weakness of the priests was early manifested in their career. Perhaps the first defection in their religious ministration came about when Nadab and Abihu "each took his censer, and put fire in it, and laid incense on it, and offered unholy fire before the Lord, such as he had not commanded them" (Lev. 10:1). Their sin was that of substitution of something else for what God had specified as essential in worship. As a result they were divinely disciplined, and fire came from the most holy place to devour them. The intimation is that they were under the influence of intoxicants and thus in a confused mental state in which they could not distinguish "between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean." In any event, the sin was as inexcusable then as it is now. The punishment of their dereliction was so startling that it had a sobering effect upon the remaining priests. However, as generations drifted by, the priests fell victim to their own lusts, and exercised an evil influence upon the congregation.

When Eli was priest, his sons "were worthless men, they had no regard for the Lord" (1 Sam. 2:12). They were covetous and greedy. A custom had been introduced that when a man offered a sacrifice, the servant of the priest would come with a three-pronged fork in his hand which he would thrust into the kettle or pot of boiling meat. All that the fork brought up the priest appropriated for his own consumption. Too, the priest's servant demanded of those who sacrificed a choice piece of raw meat for roasting with the fat still attached. Inasmuch as the law demanded that all of the fat be burnt, and none be eaten, the offerer might protest, saying, "Let them burn the fat first and then take as much as you wish," whereupon the reply would be made, "No, you must give it now; and if not, I will take it by force." As a result, "the sin of the young men was very great in the sight of the Lord; for the men treated the offering of the Lord with contempt" (1 Sam. 2:12-17).

Added to these faults were grave immoralities, for the priests engaged in illicit intercourse with the women who served at the entrance to the tent of meeting. So flagrantly notorious was this crime, that Eli said, "Why do you do such things? For I hear of your evil doings from all the people. No, my sons; it is no good report that I hear the people of the Lord spreading abroad." However, they paid no attention to the remonstrance of their father, and a prophet was sent to Eli with the fateful news of the loss of the priesthood to his posterity.

The words of the man of God were very significant. "Why then look with greedy eye at my sacrifices and my offerings which I commanded, and honor your sons above me by fattening yourself upon the choicest parts of every offering of my people Israel . . . Behold the days are coming when I will cut off your strength and the strength of your father's house, so that there will not be an old man in your house. Then in distress you will look with envious eyes on all the prosperity which shall be bestowed upon Israel; and there shall not be an old man in your house for ever. The man of you whom I shall not cut off from my altar shall be spared to weep out his eyes and grieve his heart; and all the increase of your house shall die by the sword of men. . . . And I will raise up for myself a faithful priest who shall do according to what is in my heart and in my mind; and I will build him a sure house, and he shall go in and out before my anointed for ever. And every one who is left in your house shall come to implore him for a piece of silver, and a loaf of bread, and shall say, 'Put me, I pray you, in one of the priest's places, that I may eat a morsel of bread'" (1 Sam. 2:29-36).

In view of the above, George Bush, Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Literature, New York City University, says in his Notes on Leviticus: "Aaron was succeeded by Eleazar, his eldest surviving son, after the death of Nadab and Abihu, and it continued in his family through seven generations, till the time of Eli. On his death it was removed from that branch for the wickedness of Eli's sons, and given to the descendants of Ithamar, Aaron's other son. In the time of Solomon it returned again into the line of Eleazar, in which it continued till the Babylonish captivity. Jeshua, the first high priest after the return of the Jews, was of the same family; but after his time the appointment became very uncertain and irregular; and after Judea became a Roman province, no regard whatever was paid to this part of the original divine institution. The office was in fact in process of time so far desecrated in the general corruption, that it was often sold to the highest bidder, whether of the family or not; and so things continued, till finally the nation had filled up the measure of its iniquities, and priest, altar, and temple were all swept away in the abolition of the Jewish economy and the dispersion of the race." (pp. 73, 74).

The decadence of the priesthood is easily traceable in the sacred scriptures, and this condition is assigned as one of the basic reasons for the grievous transgressions which resulted in the exile of the people to Babylon. As early as chapter 17 of Judges we read of a young man of the tribe of Levi contracting to be a priest for a family at a stipulated salary of ten pieces of silver, a suit of clothing and his living on an annual basis. "And Micah installed the Levite, and the young man became his priest, and was in the house of Micah. Then Micah said, 'Now I know that the Lord will prosper me, because I have a Levite for a priest'" (Judges 17:12, 13). The fact that he expected to officiate before both a graven and molten image did not seem to trouble the mercenary Levite. Later when a group of marauders from the tribe of Dan were stealing the household gods the "priest" enquired as to their intentions. "And they said to him, 'Keep quiet and put your hand upon your mouth, and come with us, and be to us a father and a priest. Is it better for you to be priest to the house of one man, or to be priest to a tribe?' And the priest's heart was glad; he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image, and went in the midst of the people" (Judges 18:18-20). He had received a call to pastor a larger church!

By the time of Isaiah, stern indictments were hurled against the profligates. "The priest and prophet reel with strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in giving judgment" (Isa. 28:7). Jeremiah declared, "An appalling and horrible thing has happened to the land: the prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests rule at their direction; my people love to have it so, but what will you do when then end comes?" (Jer. 6:31). With the prophets erring in their vision, and presenting false messages, and the priests by their direction stumbling in giving judgment, conditions became ever more serious for God's people. The condition was augmented by virtue of the fact that the people preferred smooth prophecies to the real truth. They were willing to support men who taught error and reassured them that God's vengeance would not come, but they starved the occasional faithful bearer of heaven's real message. "For from the least to the greatest of them, every one is greedy for unjust gain; and from prophet to priest, every one deals falsely. They have healed the wound of my people slightly saying 'Peace, peace,' when there is no peace" (Jer. 6:13, 14). So brazen had they become that the word says they were not only unashamed, but actually did not know how to blush.

Their religious leaders acted in collusion to maintain their mercenary positions. "Both prophet and priest are ungodly, even in my house have I found their wickedness, says the Lord. Therefore their way shall be to them like slippery paths in the darkness, into which they shall be driven and fall; for I will bring evil upon them in the year of their punishment, says the Lord" (Jer. 23:11, 12). The faithful Jeremiah warned, "Do not listen to the words of the prophets who prophesy to you, filling you with vain hopes; they speak visions of their own minds, not from the mouth of the Lord. They say continually to those who despise the word of the Lord, 'It shall be well with you,' and to everyone who stubbornly follows his own heart, they say, 'No evil shall come upon you.'" Apparently the religious teachers were willing to provide whatever the people were anxious to hear, if they were well paid for it. It was a case of "like people, like priest" (Hosea 4:9).

Almost without exception the men of God who were sent to declare the burden of God's people, included the priests in their condemnatory pronouncements. Micah said, "Its priests teach for hire, its prophets divine for money; yet they lean upon the Lord and say, 'Is not the Lord in the midst of us? No evil shall come upon us.'" (3:11). It needs to be remarked that God had provided for the sustenance of his priests. They were entitled to a portion of the offerings made upon the altar. "Do you not know that those who are employed in the temple service get their food from the temple, and those who serve the altar share in the sacrificial offerings?" (1 Cor. 9:13). The condemnation by Micah was not because the priests were financially supported in teaching, but because they had professionalized the God-given task and were doing so because of the money they got for it. No longer satisfied to trust in God and their brethren to supply them with voluntary gifts at the altar, they were now hiring themselves out for wages and teaching for gain. It is not injurious to say that the apostle declares in the verse following the one where he reasons that the priests get their food from the temple, "In the same way, the Lord commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel" (1 Cor. 9:14). Will God be as certain to condemn those who today "teach for hire?"

Zephaniah referred to Jerusalem as a rebellious, defiled and oppressing city. He declared that she listened to no voice, accepted no correction, and refused to draw near to God. The reason may be found in his assertion that "Her officials within her are roaring lions; her judges are evening wolves that leave nothing until the morning. Her prophets are wanton, faithless men; her priests profane what is sacred, they do violence to the law." (Zeph. 3:3, 4). Malachi is especially stern. He accused the priests of lacking both respect and reverence. "A son honors his father, and a servant his master, 'If then I am a father, where is my honor? And if I am a master, where is my fear?' says the Lord of hosts to you, O priests, who despise my name" (Mal. 1:6).

God declares that his covenant with Levi was one of life and peace, given to him that he might fear. He affirms that "He feared me, he stood in awe of my name. True instruction was in his mouth, and no wrong was found on his lips. He walked with me in peace and uprightness, and he turned many from iniquity. For the lips of a priest should guard knowledge, and men should seek instruction from his mouth, for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts." That the priestly function had been prostituted from its original purpose is evident as the man of God continues, "But you have turned aside from the way; you have caused many to stumble by your instruction; you have corrupted the covenant of Levi, says the Lord of hosts, and so I make you despised and abased before all the people, inasmuch as you have not kept my ways but have shown partiality in your instruction" (Mal. 2:5-9).

As a result of the corruption and idolatry which engulfed

the inhabitants of Jerusalem they were carried into Babylon. Here, in a state of desperation, God burnt out of their hearts a love for other gods. At the end of seventy years they were released to return to Jerusalem where they labored arduously to restore the city and its walls. Among them were many priests and Levites as well as temple servants. The desire to follow the word of God is manifested in the fact, that when certain ones of the priests sought their registration among the genealogies, and could not locate their names, they were excluded from the priesthood as unclean. "The governor told them that they were not to partake of the most holy food, until a priest with Urim and Thummim should arise" (Neh. 7:65).

However, as generations passed on, the lessons were forgotten, and by the time our Lord was born the priesthood had become the pawn of crafty politicians. When Judea became a Roman protectorate, there was often a conflict between the Jews and their conquerors, so that sometimes two high priests were recognized at the same time. An indication of the unsettled state of affairs in this era is found in the account given by Josephus, who says: "When Cyrenius had now disposed of Archelaus's money, and when the taxings were come to a conclusion, which were made in the thirty-seventh year of Caesar's victory over Antony at Actium, he deprived Joazer of the high priesthood, which dignity had been conferred on him by the multitude, and he appointed Ananus, the son of Seth, to be high priest . . . Valerius Gratus . . . deprived Ananus of the high priesthood, and appointed Ishmael, the son of Phabi, to be priest. He also deprived him in a time, and ordained Eleazer, the son of Ananus, who had been high priest before, to be high priest; which office, when he had held it for a year, Gratus deprived him of, and gave the high priesthood to Simon, son of Camithus, and, when he had possessed that dignity no longer than a year, Joseph Caiaphas was made his successor. When Gratus had done these things, he went back to Rome, after he had tarried in Judea eleven years, when Pontius Pilate came as his successor."

The priesthood had been steered into evil waters. Thus it continued until the time appointed for the consummation of the Jewish state. The Roman army under Titus, encircling the walls of Jerusalem, drew the siege ever tighter, until the city fell in A.D. 70, and with the burning of the temple, altar, sacrifices and priest were taken from Judaism. A new day had dawned for the world, and their refusal to heed "the signs of the times" spelled doom for the Jewish people. A new high priest had been coronated in the heavens, a new mediator had been ushered in by blood. The time of which the prophets had spoken had finally arrived.

The Time of Reformation

Contents

"According to this arrangement, gifts and sacrifices are offered which cannot perfect the conscience of the worshiper, but deal only with food and drink and various ablutions, regulations for the body imposed until the time of reformation" (Heb. 9:9, 10). The apostle recognized that the ordinances of the Mosaic economy were only temporary. They constituted restrictions and restraints to hold a people in line until a better covenant based upon better promises could be introduced. That change which then took place involved "a change in the priesthood" and of necessity, "a change in the law as well" (Heb. 7:12).

Ample warning had been given of God that such a reformation was coming. Jeremiah had declared, "Behold, the days are coming, says the Lord, when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah, not like the covenant which I made with their fathers when I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt, my covenant which they broke, though I was their husband, says the Lord. But this is the covenant which I will make with the house of Israel, after those days, says the Lord; I will put my law within them, and I will write it upon their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. And no longer shall each man teach his neighbor and each his brother, saying, 'Know the Lord,' for they shall all know me, from the least of them, to the greatest, says the Lord" (31:31-34).

The coming age was to provide new leadership. Ezekiel was told to prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, who were accused of feeding themselves and neglecting the sheep. They were rebuked because they had not strengthened the weak, healed the sick, bound up the crippled, brought back the straying, and sought the lost, but had ruled with force and harshness. God declared, "I will save my flock, they shall no longer be a prey; and I will judge between sheep and sheep. And I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he shall feed them: he shall feed them and be their shepherd. And I, the LORD, will be their God, and my servant David shall be prince among them; I, the LORD, have spoken. I will make with them a covenant of peace and banish wild beasts from the land, so that they may dwell securely in the wilderness and sleep in the woods. And I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing; and I will send down the showers in their season; they shall be showers of blessing." (Ezekiel 34:22-26).

There are numerous allusions in this highly figurative portrayal which should not be overlooked. The exploitation of God's people by their leaders was not to be tolerated. The flock of God was not created to provide food for those who fed them. God said, "Behold, I am against the shepherds; and I will require my sheep at their hand, and put a stop to their feeding the sheep; no longer shall the shepherds feed themselves. I will rescue my sheep from their mouths, that they be not food for them" (Ezek. 33:10). The shepherds condemned in Ezekiel are "the priests who teach for hire and the prophets who divine for money" as mentioned by Micah (3:11). Nothing can be clearer than the fact that God intended to wrest his flock from the grasp of mercenaries and hirelings.

This new regime was to be inaugurated when one shepherd was set up over them. The prophet identifies that shepherd as "my servant David." Since David was asleep with his fathers and his sepulcher was with them (Acts 2:29), when Ezekiel spoke, it is evident that the prophecy pertained to our Lord. Peter declared in the very same connection, "This Jesus God raised up, and of that we are all witnesses" (Acts 2:32). Accordingly our Lord asserted, "I have other sheep, which are not of this fold; I must bring them also, and they will heed my voice. So there shall be one flock, and one shepherd" (John 10:16).

The characteristics of the new covenant are set forth. It was to be "a covenant of peace" (Ezek. 34:25). It was to provide security and safety from harm. Wild beasts were to be banished from the land that the sheep "may dwell securely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods." It was to secure liberty and freedom. "They shall know that I am the Lord when I break the bars of their yoke, and deliver them from the hand of those who enslave them" (verse 27). The gracious assurance is given, "'And you are my sheep, the sheep of my pasture, and I am your God', says the Lord God" (verse 31).

The evangelical seer, gazing into the future, and speaking as he was moved by the Holy Spirit, paints an unparalleled picture of the Christian dispensation. The walls of the city of God are to be called "Salvation" and the gates "Praise." The sun will no longer be needed for light by day, nor the moon at night. Instead the Lord will be an everlasting light, and God will be the glory of his people. Jehovah declares, "Your people shall all be righteous; they shall possess the land for ever, the shoot of my planting, the work of my hands, that I might be glorified" (Isa. 60:18-21).

Following this, Isaiah gives that noble declaration of the coming Christ, which Jesus personally read to the synagogue assembled in his home city of Nazareth, and of which he said "Today this scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing" (Isa. 61:1, 2; Luke 4:16-21). Then the prophet affirms that those who receive the "good tidings" which the Lord was "anointed to bring" will be called "oaks of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he may be glorified." These are destined for a work of restoration (61:4) and they shall "be called the priests of the Lord, men shall speak of you as the ministers of our God" (Isa. 61:6). "All who see them shall acknowledge them, that they are a people whom the Lord has blessed" (verse 9).

Nothing is clearer than the fact that God's purpose was to make ministry and priesthood co-extensive in "the time of reformation." Every person who accepted the good tidings was to be a priest, every such person was to be a minister. Every priest was such because he ministered; every person was to minister because he was a priest. In priesthood and ministry all were to be of equal rank insofar as liberty, privilege and relationship to God are concerned. God's people were no longer to be a kingdom with priests, but a kingdom of priests; they were not to be a congregation with ministers, but a congregation of ministers. Priesthood was to be universal in the kingdom of heaven, ministry was to be mutual and reciprocal. This was to be the grand climax of the ages, the golden era of God's dealings with mankind.

God promised Israel that if they would obey his voice and keep his covenant they would be a kingdom of priests and a holy nation unto him. But they did not obey his voice nor keep his covenant. They never realized the fruition of the magnificent promise because they failed to meet the conditions. But God's purpose was not defeated. He created a new Israel of God (Gal. 6:16), made up of those who are Christ's, and are Abraham's offspring, and heirs according to promise (Gal. 3:29). Every one of these is a priest of God. By substituting those who are the children of Abraham by faith for those who were his children by flesh, God at last made every spiritual son of Abraham a priest. At last, every real Jew is a priest. "For he is not a real Jew who is one outwardly, nor is true circumcision something external and physical. He is a Jew who is one inwardly, and real circumcision is a matter of the heart, spiritual and not literal." (Rom. 2:28, 29).

To effect this great transformation there had to be a new covenant, new altar and new sacrifice. Under the previous covenant only a limited priesthood could obtain. "If perfection had been attainable through the Levitical priesthood what further need would there have been for another priest to arise after the order of Melchizedek, rather than one named after the order of Aaron? For when there is a change in the priesthood, there is necessarily a change in the law as well" (Heb. 7:11, 12). There is a change in the priesthood! These are the words of inspiration. Since "the end of the ages" is come upon us, it is evident that God's plan of priesthood must reach its perfection in this dispensation, or his purpose be forever frustrated. Inasmuch as the latter is an unthinkable conclusion, it is apparent that in the functioning of every child of God as a priest, and only in that way, we see the perfected design of heaven carried out.

The creation of any system which sets up a special class of priestly functionaries to minister in behalf of their fellows in things pertaining to God not only usurps the rights of the remainder of God's priests, but of even greater consequence, it does despite to the Spirit of grace, by introducing again a limited priesthood which can never produce perfection. Such a system has no more place under a faultless covenant than the burning of incense or animal sacrifices. Yet, the ambition of men's hearts for power and prestige is so prevalent, that a constant battle must be waged to keep an indifferent, indolent membership from surrendering their privileges and responsibilities to a group of professional worship directors who sell their talents and abilities for filthy lucre.

Under the Mosaic economy, the priests, and no one else could approach God's sanctuary. Yet those priests must come by the blood of the altar and the laver of baptism in order to enter the tent of meeting. It is still true that only the priests of God can participate in his service. But all who are in his congregation are priests. "Christ appeared once in the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb. 9:26). "By a single offering he has perfected for all time those who are sanctified" (Heb. 10:14). "Therefore, brethren, since we have confidence to enter the sanctuary by the blood of Jesus, by the new and living way which he opened for us through the curtain, that is, through his flesh, and since we have a great priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:19-22). Every one who has had the blood applied to his heart and who has been immersed in the laver of baptism is a priest with right of entrance into the sanctuary.

In the former dispensation every priest who was consecrated participated in God's service. One could not hire another. It is true that in that imperfect era the congregation could support priests to minister in their behalf, but that was because the congregation was not permitted to minister in the sanctuary. When King Uzziah "was strong he grew proud, to his destruction. For he was false to the Lord his God, and entered the temple of the Lord to burn incense on the altar of incense. But Azariah the priest went in after him, with eighty priests of the Lord who were men of valor, and they withstood King Uzziah, and said to him, 'It is not for you, Uzziah, to burn incense to the Lord, but for the priests the sons of Aaron, who are consecrated to burn incense. Go out of the sanctuary; for you have done wrong, and it will bring you no honor from the Lord God'" (2 Chron. 26:16-18). Uzziah was stricken with leprosy for his rashness. It is amazing that when men could not be priests they wished to be; and now that they can be they prefer to hire another to minister in their stead.

Even under the law one priest could not hire another. The priests were ordained to serve. Since every Christian is now a priest, it is certainly a travesty upon God's plan for a congregation of priests to hire another priest to minister in their behalf in things pertaining unto God. Such a procedure produces two evils. In the first place, it defeats the very purpose of God as to priesthood by creating a sense of helplessness and dependency upon the part of the greater majority of his priests, and in the second place it creates a professional caste who serve for wages or hire. Thus the birthright of heaven is casually sold by one, and scornfully bought by another. If Simon the Sorcerer was condemned because he thought the gift of God could be purchased for money, what will be the fate of those who think it can be sold for money?

There is no priesthood in God's program now but that which is common to all Christians. That which makes one a Christian makes him a priest of God. The literal priesthood has been supplanted by the spiritual; the limited has been succeeded by the universal. Yet the religious world has been captivated by a special clergy. Designate it what you will, this is but a limited priesthood, arrogating to itself those rights which belong to all. Nothing is more certain than the fact that the average religionist believes that this special group of ministerial functionaries is a product of New Testament teaching. Yet it is apparent that the system which produces them is a denial of the very essence of the New Covenant and an espousal of the program of the Old Covenant. Those who seek justification for a special priesthood in this dispensation are also seeking to be justified by the law and are fallen from grace.

The time of reformation has come. It has brought with it certain changes. Those changes must be recognized. To deny them or abrogate them is to flout God's purpose.

1. There has been a change of sacrifice. The animal sacrifices once required are no longer demanded. To offer such sacrifices now would be to crucify the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame.

2. There has been a change of law. No longer are we subject to the "regulations for worship in the earthly sanctuary" (Heb. 9:1). The law had "but a shadow of the good things to come instead of the true form of these realities" (Heb. 10:1). The man who chooses to be justified by the law shows a preference for the shadow rather than the reality.

3. There has been a change of priesthood. The limited has given way to the universal. With the introduction of the priesthood of all believers, no particular class or caste has an exclusive right "to perform ritual duties." Indeed it is one of the absolute essentials to priesthood that each person who is a priest "have something to offer" (Heb. 8:3). The change in the priesthood has conferred upon all of God's priests the right to minister unto God subject to the restrictions of the Great King.

This great truth was recognized in the primitive church. "The devotional exercises of the Christian assemblies, like those of the Jewish synagogues, consisted principally of prayers, singing of hymns, and sacred discourses, founded upon positions of the Old Testament. Apostolic epistles were read in the congregation, to which they had been generally directed, but after a single reading they were generally laid aside. Every one who had power and the inclination to speak in public was allowed to do so with freedom" (A History of the Christian Church, by Dr. Charles Hase. Pages 40, 41).

The mystery of iniquity which began to work even during apostolic days soon changed this state of affairs, and wrested the rights from the many and gave them into the hands of the powerful few. This was done by recourse to the limited priesthood of the law as a pattern. Writing about conditions in the second century, our same learned historian, who was Professor of Theology in the University of Jena, says: "The offices of the Church at this period presented very little to excite the cupidity of ordinary men, and even the honor attending them was counterbalanced by the dangers. And yet it seemed desirable to increase the veneration which necessarily attends the virtues and a faithful performance of official duty in the Church, by mysterious forms of ordination, by connecting them through various associations with the Old Testament priesthood, and by external tokens of peculiar sanctity. The result was that even in the second century the priests (Kleros) were represented as the official mediators between Christ and the congregation (Laos). To speak in the church, and to administer holy rites, were conceded to be the special prerogatives of the clergy, although learned laymen were sometimes heard in the public assembly, with the consent of the bishop. In all things relating to the business of the congregation, the principal care and authority devolved upon the clergy, but this power was generally exercised mildly and with a true regard for the public good, since those who possessed it could use no external means of coercion, and the clergy, being generally without fixed salaries, were dependent upon the voluntary contributions of the people. Their authority was often much straitened by the influence of the confessors, and the idea was not yet removed of a priesthood embracing all true Christians" (Ibid., pp. 57, 58).

From the foregoing, it is apparent that one of the first steps to the formation of a special clergy was the denial of the freedom to every one who had the power and inclination to speak in public. Although, for prestige and pride a learned layman was sometimes given the privilege of being heard in the public assembly, "to speak in the church was conceded to be the prerogative of the clergy." Yet, the rise of the clergy to dominant power was temporarily restrained by the fact that they were generally without stipulated salaries, and dependent upon voluntary contributions; as well as by the lingering concept of a priesthood of all believers. However, the surrender of the freedom to address the brethren by those who had the ability and desire to do it, into the hands of a special group of ministrants, was the seed from which the clergy sprung, and soon the guaranteed wage for serving God in behalf of men was introduced, and with it passed away the real function of the priesthood of all believers, and a limited priesthood once more came into vogue. It is not amiss to state that the clergy system and the financial guarantee always go hand in hand.

When the members of the church become so indolent and wrapped up with worldliness that they no longer study the holy scriptures, when they become so indifferent to the needs of their brethren that they no longer seek to excel to the edifying of the church, when freedom means so little that they will gladly surrender it to pamper pride, they begin automatically to try and purchase that for which they are not willing to exert personal effort. And when men demand professional ministers there will arise professional ministers to supply the demand. However, a system of universal priesthood can no more exist side by side with a system of limited priesthood, than we can be under the reign of grace and the Mosaic law at the same time. The professional ministry with its contracts to men cannot exist side by side with the mutual ministry growing out of a covenant with God.

We are living in "the time of reformation" of which the prophet spoke. The "end of the ages" has come. God's great ideal must reach its culmination in our lives. It is not for us to question whether his plan will work. It is but for us to work his plan. It is not for us to seek to improve upon his design or pattern, or through fear to shape, trim and alter it to meet our ideas, but to restore that pattern, firm in the conviction that he "who does not slumber nor sleep" will not fail us, but will attend us in our way.

At the root of almost every departure and apostasy is the pride of men. We are more afraid of what men will think about us than we are of what God thinks. We want to make a show, a demonstration, a manifestation of power, ability, and wealth. We worship culture and kneel as abject slaves at the shrine of conformity. The simple worship of the saints around the festal board has become a well-planned pageant, in which immaculate actors carry out a rigid formal ritual. The speaker's platform is not a stand in which humble farmers, mechanics or carpenters may exhort their fellow Christians to endure trials, overcome temptations and grow in grace, but it is a carpeted stage on which a polished performer presents a perfected oration for which he has been personally prepared. We are more concerned about what our worldly friends think of "our minister" than we are as to what they think of God's Son. God's time of reformation is here; it is now time that our reformation begin.

The Order of Melchizedek

Contents

No study of the priesthood as set forth in the New Covenant would be complete without a knowledge of the high priesthood of Christ from which it stems, and no investigation of the priesthood of God's Messiah can afford to ignore the order upon which it is based. After Melchizedek appeared briefly on the scene of God's history in the days of Abraham, he disappeared without further mention until David records the words of God declaring that he would make his Son "a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedek" (Psalm 110:4). Accordingly, when the writer of Hebrews desired to emphasize the superiority of the New Covenant to the Old Covenant, he had recourse to the diversity in the priesthoods of these respective revelations. He cites the prediction of David and directly applies it to the Son of God (Heb. 5:6).

In conjunction with the statement that Christ was "designated by God a high priest after the order of Melchizedek" he continues, "About this we have much to say which is hard to explain, since you have become dull of hearing" (Heb. 5:11). This indicates that it is a difficult task to expound the truths concerning the priesthood of Christ to those whose hearing has become dull. The original word for "dull" means "lazy, sluggish, indolent, stupid." The word for "hearing" relates to the ability to perceive truth or grasp the force of reasoning. The occasion of the dullness of the Hebrews is assigned to the fact that they have not had "their faculties trained by practice to distinguish good from evil." The result was that at the time when they should have been teachers they required someone to teach them again the first principles of God's Word.

We face today the same difficulty as did the writer of the Hebrew letter. The subject of God's priesthood falls upon ears that are dulled by inattention, traditionalism and prejudice. The average member of the church does not have his faculties trained to distinguish good from evil. Men, who long ago should have become teachers, must still have rudimentary principles explained to them over and over again. There is no limitation of the Holy Spirit's ability to explain, the limitation is upon the part of man to grasp. The limitation could be removed by the diligent application of the faculties through study. Trained faculties like trained soldiers are not produced by merely hearing textual lectures.

The inspired writer, although recognizing the difficulty did not demur from the task of explaining God's system of priesthood, and no more should we be discouraged by a kindred problem. Like him, we also should "desire each one of you to show the same earnestness in realizing the full assurance of hope until the end, so that you may not be sluggish, but imitators of those who through faith and patience inherit the promises" (Heb. 6:11, 12). We shall proceed to an investigation of the order under which the priesthood of Christ was inaugurated. This will necessitate a careful study of Hebrews, chapter seven.

In this chapter, there are a number of valid arguments introduced to establish the priesthood of Christ over that of the Levitical priests. The principal arguments are drawn from the following considerations:

1. Melchizedek was both king and priest, and his superiority in rank was acknowledged even by Abraham, the father of the Jewish race. Thus Levi who had not yet been born, could be said to have acknowledged this superiority representatively through his illustrious ancestor, who paid tithes to Melchizedek.

2. Perfection was not attainable through the Levitical priesthood (verse 11) because "the law made nothing perfect" (verse 19). With the abrogation of the law because of its weakness and uselessness (verse 18) the better hope is introduced by which we draw nigh to God (verse 19) and the priesthood thus created would be superior to one based upon a law which could make nothing perfect.

3. The priesthood of the Old Covenant was not constituted with a solemn oath of God, but the priesthood of Jesus began in this august fashion. "This makes Jesus the surety of a better covenant" (verse 22).

4. The tenure in office of the former priests was uncertain and discontinued by death, making succession an imperative to the perpetuity of the system. In the case of our Lord a permanent, unchangeable priesthood is assured because he always lives to make intercession.

5. The priests of old were frail, weak, and sinful creatures, who had first to offer sacrifices for their own sins, before they could minister in behalf of the congregation. Our high priest is "holy, blameless, unstained, separated from sinners and exalted above the heavens" (verse 26) and is superior in nature, character and attributes to those of the previous dispensation.

FACTS ABOUT MELCHIZEDEK

Verse 1. His name Melchizedek means "king of righteousness." He was also king of Salem (Jerusalem) which word means "peace." He met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings and blessed him, as also recorded in Genesis 14:14-20.

Verse 2. Abraham apportioned to Melchizedek a tenth part of everything. This was done out of respect for the superior office of this man, and perhaps as an expression of thanksgiving unto God for the satisfactory culmination of the battle to rescue Lot and his goods, since Abraham recognized Melchizedek as a priest of God Most High.

Verse 3. Melchizedek is said to be "without father or mother or genealogy." This does not mean that he literally had no parents. The subject under consideration is the priestly function. No one was allowed to serve in the Jewish priesthood unless he could "trace his title clear" in the carefully guarded genealogical records (Cp. Ezra 2:62). We know the father of Aaron was Amram, and his mother was Jochebed. The record has preserved their names. We know that the sons of Aaron were Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But no one knows the name of the father, or mother, or posterity of Melchizedek, because the record is silent on these matters.

The expression that he "has neither beginning of days nor end of life" means simply that we have no historical record of his birth or death, or of the beginning or conclusion of his priestly office. The Jewish readers were ever anxious to trace from the record the cessation of a man's priesthood, and determine his successor. But so far as the record is concerned one can determine no end to the priesthood of Melchizedek, and on that basis and as far as the record goes, that priesthood is continuous. No man can produce the record of its culmination.

It is affirmed that "resembling the Son of God he continues a priest for ever." This does not mean we cannot trace the literal genealogy of Jesus, because we have two accounts given of it (Matt. 1 and Luke 3), but he had no genealogical record as a priest such as the Jews required, and indeed his literal genealogical record showing he came from Judah would have made it impossible for him to be a priest on earth (Heb. 8:4).

Melchizedek and Jesus resembled in the fact that each was a king as well as a priest; each was a king of righteousness and a prince of peace; neither had direct ancestors or successors in the priestly office and so far as the record shows both continued in office: Melchizedek because the record gives no account of his death; Jesus because the record attests that "he always lives."

Verse 4. Abraham is designated "the patriarch" which means "chief father." In the reasoning of the Jews he would be superior in rank to any of his posterity, which would include the sons of Levi. Yet Abraham recognized the superior dignity of Melchizedek and manifested it by voluntarily conferring upon him a tenth of the booty taken in his foray against the retreating invaders.

Verse 5. Not all of Levi's descendants were priests, but those who did receive the priestly office were by the law commissioned to receive tithes from their brethren, as a recognition of the dignity of the office.

Verses 6, 7. Melchizedek who was not in the genealogy of Levi not only received tithes from the eminent father of the Jewish nation, but also blessed Abraham who had the promises. Since "it is beyond dispute that the inferior is blessed by the superior," these two items— the tithes bestowed by Abraham and the blessing bestowed upon Abraham— prove that Melchizedek was superior in rank not only to Abraham, but to any of his descendants in the flesh, none of whom could outrank their father.

Verse 8. The Levitical priests who received tithes soon had to forfeit their office, because they were mortal, and the record of their deaths is proof of the need of successors, but nowhere does the record indicate the cessation of the office of Melchizedek who took a tenth of the spoils from Abraham.

Verses 9, 10. Although Abraham, as patriarch, had the promises, he recognized the superiority of Melchizedek in his priestly office. He stood as a representative of that nation which would proceed from his loins, and the inspired writer points out the consequence of his voluntary act of deference. Although Levi had not yet been born, through Abraham his progenitor, it was as if he too paid tithes to Melchizedek, thus establishing the great fact that those mortal men who received tithes under the law were inferior to him who prior to the law was both king and priest. So the priesthood of the order of Aaron must be considered as inferior to that of the order of Melchizedek.

THE WEAKNESS OF THE LAW

Verse 11. The Jews regarded their legal system as perfect and permanent. They reasoned that inasmuch as it had been personally announced by Jehovah under awe-inspiring conditions at Sinai, he would not repudiate his covenant. They overlooked the apparent fact that they had themselves nullified it by their disobedience. But that it could not produce perfection is here shown from the fact that if it did this would render unnecessary the coming of another priest who was not after the order of Aaron, which order was recognized and created by that law. Yet that another priest after another order must arise was attested to by the patriarch David in Psalm 110:4. Since a new priesthood could not improve on that which was already perfect, the necessity of a new one arising argued the weakness and imperfection of the one then in existence.

Verse 12. This verse renders a death blow to those who contend that we are still under the law given at Sinai. We cannot be under the priesthood of Christ and the law of Moses. If we are not under the priesthood of Christ, we are still under the law requiring animal sacrifices. If we are not under that law we are under a different priesthood than the one which that law produced.

Verses 13, 14. The argument of the inspired writer is clinched by the fact that Christ was not of the tribe of Levi, but of the tribe of Judah, in connection with which Moses said nothing about priests. If perfection were by the Mosaic law, it would be achieved under the Levitical priesthood. That it could not be so secured is evidenced from the prophecy that another priesthood would be inaugurated, and the one who became high priest under the new regime would be from a different tribe than the one authorized by law to furnish priests.

Verses 15, 16, 17. Our Lord became a priest "by the power of an indestructible life," and not as did the former priests "according to a legal requirement concerning bodily descent." The priests of the Mosaic dispensation were not inducted into their high office as a result of a proven character or guileless conduct. They were born into a certain family, and by virtue of legislation regarding that fleshly descent they became priests. The priesthood of Christ is more spiritual in nature, and is enduring and perpetual, being in that respect far superior to the Levitical priesthood.

Verses 18, 19. The former commandment was set aside because of its weakness and unprofitableness to secure the final great purpose of God, the salvation of man. The law answered the purpose for which it was intended, as "a custodian until Christ came" (Gal. 3:24). It was designed for that, and having been added because of transgression until the seed came, it did all it was intended to do. It was given to a limited number, for a limited purpose and a limited time.

The law could not produce perfection (verse 11), nor purge the conscience from dead works, nor could it expiate sin. It was removed that a better hope could be introduced, by which we draw nigh to God. With such a high priest as we now have we can draw near with true hearts in full assurance of hope.

THE OATH OF OFFICE

Verses 20, 21, 22. The third link in the chain of argument designed to prove the superiority of the Messianic priesthood over that of Aaron is the fact that Christ was confirmed in his office by an oath of God, whereas the former priests were inducted with appropriate ritualism upon the basis of mere legislative arrangement. When the time came for Aaron and his sons to be ordained, Moses was given simple and detailed instructions as to the consecration ceremonies. There was no extraordinary proceeding as may be seen by examination of the events described in Exodus 28.

In the case of Christ, the Father declared with a solemn oath that the Son would be a priest for ever. Those who are sufficiently interested in the scriptural research necessary to determine the occasions upon which God employed an oath to confirm his word, will find that God never took such a solemn step unless he wanted to manifest the absolute certainty and immutability of his decrees. God's promise does not require an oath to make it binding. He will as readily fulfill his word unaccompanied by an oath, as he will that word attested by swearing an oath. But in matters of the gravest importance God employs an oath for our benefit. It is accepted universally among men that the highest form of attestation is by oath. "Men indeed swear by a greater than themselves, and in all their disputes an oath is final for confirmation. So when God desired to show more convincingly to the heirs of the promise the unchangeable character of his purpose, he interposed with an oath" (Heb. 6:16, 17).

Since God employs an oath to demonstrate the unalterable character of his purpose, the fact that the Levitical priesthood was inaugurated without an oath is an argument that it could well be recognized as temporary and impermanent. The reverse is true concerning the priesthood of Christ relative to which it is affirmed, "God hath sworn and will not repent." When man repents he changes his will; when God repents he wills a change. No change will be made in the present system of priesthood. It will never be superseded by another. So long as the priestly relationship is demanded in approach to God, it will be sustained in Christ Jesus. He will have no successor to his office.

The inspired writer declares that "this makes Jesus the surety of a better covenant." The word "surety" is from the Greek egguos, and is nowhere else used in the New Testament, nor in the Septuagint. We cannot therefore arrive at its meaning by observing its usage by inspired writers. It is quite common in classic Greek, where it means "a bondsman or sponsor." It refers to one who pledges his property, his social standing, or his sacred honor that a certain thing will be carried out. If a man is apprehended by the law, he must give some assurance that he will appear in court. He is said to be "released on bond." The one who deposits the amount of money, securities or other negotiable interests to guarantee the appearance of the one arrested is called "the bondsman or surety." When one borrows money from a bank he must secure the name of other property owners as surety. Those who co-sign the note guarantee the payment of the borrowed sum.

Jesus, by virtue of his office and the oath which confirmed it unto him, is our surety of a better covenant based upon better promises (Heb. 8:6). His sacrifice and death attest unto us that all of the promises of God will be fulfilled. His resurrection from the dead is a guarantee that "he who raised Christ Jesus from the dead will give life to your mortal bodies also through his Spirit which dwells in you" (Rom. 7:11). His present position as mediator and high priest in our behalf is a token that we may "with confidence draw near to the throne of grace" (Heb. 4:16).

THE PERMANENT PRIESTHOOD

Verses 23, 24, 25. The argument for superiority as made in this section of Hebrews 7, is based upon the plurality of priests occasioned by death under the former dispensation, and the singularity and permanency of the priesthood of Christ Jesus.

The former priests were many in number, because of human frailty and mortality. Regardless of how excellent they might be in personal conduct, or how efficient in administration of ritual duties, death took its toll. From the time that the mantle was taken from the shoulders of Aaron and placed upon Eleazar until A.D. 70 when Phannias served as the final high priest, eighty-one men in order had ministered in the holy place. This is a sufficient commentary on the inspired statement "they were prevented by death from continuing in office."

How different it is with our Lord. "He holds his priesthood permanently, because he continues for ever." He has conquered death, and it holds no terrors for him. He is victor over it, and it cannot engulf him as it did the former priests. The superiority of his priesthood over theirs is as great as that of life over death, as immortality. He will not relinquish the priestly mitre to another brow. Upon the peaks of Mount Hor, "Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron died there on the top of the mountain" (Num. 20:28). No such scene will ever occur in the career of our great high priest.

The consoling thought to us is that "he is able for all time to save those who draw near to God through him, since he always lives to make intercession for them." Man must draw near to God. He must do this through Christ. All who thus draw near he is able to save, and to do it for all time. This ability comes from the fact that he always lives to make intercession. He need not begin his work only to be forced to relinquish it to another. His ability is not circumscribed by liability to failure through death or deposition from office.

THE SINLESS CHARACTER

Verses 26, 27, 28. The final argument is based upon the spotless nature and unsullied character of Christ Jesus as contrasted with the sinful nature of the former priests who had to offer sacrifices in their behalf.

In view of the fact that we constitute "a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 2:5), "it was fitting that we should have such a high priest, holy, blameless, unstained, separated from sinners, exalted above the heavens." He is separated from sinners in that he did not partake of their sins, enter into their plans, or succumb to their temptations. He was not segregated from them while on earth, for it was charged that "this man eateth with publicans and sinners," but his association with them was not to indulge in their carnal pleasures but to lead them into a purer life. Physically, he moved among them for their good; spiritually, he was separated from them lest he be evil. His present exalted position at the right hand of God enables him to further the work of intercession which he ever carries on in our behalf.

He has no need to offer sacrifices daily as did the former priests. Nor did he ever require a sin offering in his own behalf. He offered himself once for all and thus culminated sin offerings. Is this not a refutation of the doctrine of the Roman Catholic mass which is claimed by a deceiving priestcraft to be a daily sacrifice?

Answering the question, "What do you mean by the mass?" Conway says, "The mass, according to Catholic doctrine, is a commemoration of the sacrifice of the cross, for as often as we celebrate it, we show the death of the Lord until he come (1 Cor. 11:16). At the same time, it is not a bare commemoration of that other sacrifice, since it is also itself a true sacrifice because it has all the essentials of a true sacrifice: its Priest, Jesus Christ, using the ministry of an earthly representative; its victim, Jesus Christ, truly present under the appearance of bread and wine; its sacrificial offerings, the mystic rite of consecration." Again,

"Catholics hold that the infinite merits and efficacy of the sacrifice of the cross cannot be increased by any new sacrifice. The mass is not a new sacrifice, but the continuation of the bloody sacrifice of the cross applied in an unbloody manner to the souls of individual Christians."

If Jesus is a priest, and his body the victim, and he daily engages in its sacrificial offering, the Scriptures are at fault in declaring, "He entered once for all into the Holy Place, taking not the blood of goats and calves but his own blood, thus securing an eternal redemption" (Heb. 9:12). What can be plainer than the following? "Nor was it to offer himself repeatedly, as the high priest enters the Holy Place yearly with blood not his own; for then he would have had to suffer repeatedly, since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb. 9:25, 26).

The priestcraft of Rome stands out here in direct contrast to the priesthood of heaven. In order to lend power to a human system, Rome changed the table of God into an altar, the supper into a sacrifice, the emblems into a victim. No longer could the communicants gather as a family around the household thanksgiving table; instead they must prostrate themselves as supplicants before an altar. And as altars and sacrifices must have their priests, so the hierarchy moved in to supply the daily need— always for the necessary remuneration, of course. How gladly should we receive the good news that "we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:10).

The Royal Priesthood

Contents

The ideal of God for a kingdom composed entirely of priests is achieved in the relationship created by the new covenant. That which could not be accomplished at Mount Sinai has been accomplished at Mount Sion, where we received a kingdom which cannot be moved or shaken. Every child of God is a priest, every one is now a minister.

In the Revelation letter John informs us of Jesus "who loves us and has freed us from our sins by his blood and made us a kingdom, priests to his God and Father" (Rev. 1:5, 6). This one statement tells us of the motivation (love), the action (freed us), and the means (his blood), by which Jesus achieved his goal of founding a unique kingdom.

Because of the priestly nature of the kingdom, celestial voices are raised in this hymn of praise:

"Worthy art thou to take the scroll and to open its seals,

For thou wast slain and by thy blood

didst redeem men for God

From every tribe and tongue and people and nation,

And hast made them a kingdom and priests to our God" (Revelation 5:9, 10).

Let us examine the language of the Spirit. The terms "high priest" and "chief priest" are found 123 times in the new covenant scriptures. Of these occurrences, 113 directly or indirectly refer to the high priests or chief priests of Judaism.

The ten exceptions are all located in the epistle to the Hebrews and are direct references to our Lord Jesus Christ. They present him as the great high priest who was foreshadowed by the high priests under the law of Moses. Accordingly, there is not a hint in these occurrences of any priest in the kingdom of God, except our Lord himself.

The Greek word for priest is hiereus. The term "priest" is found 33 times in the new covenant scriptures. It refers to the Levitical priests 18 times. Of the fifteen remaining occurrences, 8 refer to Christ, 3 to Melchizedek, 1 to the pagan priest of Jupiter, and the other 3 to the entire membership of the community of saints, who are described as "a kingdom, even priests."

The word "priest" is never once applied to a special ministry or caste in the congregation of our Lord. No gospel preacher, bishop, or deacon, was ever referred to as a priest in any distinctive sense; no such individual was a priest by right of office.

The word "priesthood" is found but six times in the new covenant scriptures. Four of these appearances are in one chapter (Hebrews 7). In every instance the four refer either to the Levitical priesthood or to that of our Lord. The other two instances are also found in one chapter. They designate the entire body of believers as "a holy priesthood" (1 Peter 2:5), and "a royal priesthood" (1 Peter 2:9).

Nothing is clearer than the fact that in the primitive Christian community there was no priesthood other than that of the Lord Jesus Christ and every one of his followers, who were to "offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable unto God." The special priesthood which is so prevalent in our day has no scriptural precedent under the rule of Jesus. It has been created by men and has arisen without divine warrant. It usurps the privileges and prerogatives which belong to all alike. It makes a pretentious claim to authority but it asserts a divine right without a word of divine writ to sustain it. God's magnificent plan for the ages culminates in every saint recognized as a real priest. Any attempt to promote a special priesthood clothed with special powers to minister in things pertaining unto God thwarts the divine purpose. It exists as an affront to the Great King and his humble and loyal subjects.

In spite of this we are faced with the fact that in our day the idea of a special priesthood to minister for and in behalf of other saints is so prevalent that a majority of believers have no concept of the people of God functioning in any other manner. Few indeed realize that they were ever intended to be priests, and their idea of priesthood has been so conditioned by the subservient role to which they are reconciled that they find it ludicrous to consider themselves as priests in any sense.

The danger of this lies in the fact that the kingdom of heaven is designed to be a kingdom of priests. It derives its nature from a citizenry composed of priests. If we create a wholly different order in which the citizens disclaim any relationship as priests, there is a question as to whether it can be regarded as the kingdom of heaven or not. To what extent can we alter the fundamental constituency of the kingdom of heaven and still regard ourselves as composing it? Perhaps nothing is more important for our generation than a recapture of the royal priesthood.

This brings us to the place where we may well investigate another word— clergy. It is from the Greek kleeros which means "a lot, an inheritance." In the original it occurs thirteen times in the Scriptures. It is rendered heritage 1, inheritance 2, lot 3, lots 5, and part 2 times. The word is never used to mark off a segment or portion of God's people from the rest in the new covenant scriptures. All who have been redeemed and have entered into Christ constitute the heritage of God. He has not selected a special group to serve as his lot or inheritance.

This was not true under the legalistic regime created by the old covenant. Then God had a special inheritance, a clergy to act as his special functionaries. "At that time the Lord set apart the tribe of Levi, to carry the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister to him, and to bless in his name to this day. Therefore Levi has no portion or inheritance with his brothers; the Lord is his inheritance, as the Lord your God said to him" (Deuteronomy 10:8, 9).

Observe that here a special group was set apart, or ordained to minister unto God and to pronounce a blessing or benediction upon the remainder of the congregation in God's name. Under Judaism there was a distinction between the clergy and the laity. There were certain rituals reserved exclusively for the priests, or clergy, to perform. The people were not permitted to enter the sacred areas or to engage in the clerical functions.

Inasmuch as the Levitical priests constituted a special clergy to minister unto God, they were to be supported in their clerical duties by those in whose behalf they ministered. "The Levitical priests, that is all the tribe of Levi, shall have no portion or inheritance with Israel; they shall eat the offerings by fire to the Lord, and his rightful dues. They shall have no inheritance among their brethren; the Lord is their inheritance as he promised them" (Deuteronomy 18:1, 2).

Nothing is clearer than the fact that under "the ministration of death" which was written and engraven in stones

God created a clergy with certain sacerdotal functions. Those who composed it wore distinctive robes and stood between the people and God. But all such distinctions were rendered invalid by the cross of Christ.

We are not under law, but under grace. "The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." We are under a better covenant based upon better promises. Under the reign of grace God no longer has a special tribe ordained as clergymen. Through grace every child of God is sanctified and anointed, set apart and ordained to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable unto him. We are all God's portion or inheritance in the world.

Every Christian is a clergyman in the only scriptural usage of the term. To create a special clergy is to lapse back into Judaism. It is easier to live under law than under grace. Law creates its special interpreters and judges, and the community can rest in their judgment and be relieved of personal responsibility. When problems arise men can "go up to the priest," and his clerical interpretation becomes the authorized guide. Yet it was from this very system Jesus died to deliver us. He made us free from all priestly and hierarchical domination.

It is impossible to create a special clergy without, by the same act, creating a laity. The word laos from which we get "laity" is found at least 141 times in the new covenant scriptures, where it is translated "people."

In every instance when applied to the community of Christ it refers to the whole body of believers. It never refers to a group as distinguished from a priestly or ministerial class. This was not true under the legalistic covenant. There was always a careful line of distinction drawn between the priests (clergy) and the people (laity).

priests (clergy) and for all the people (laity) of the assembly" (Leviticus 16:33). "These preparations having thus been made, the priests (clergy) go continually into the outer tent, performing their ritual duties; but into the second only the high priest goes, and he but once a year, and not without taking blood which he offers for himself and for the errors of the people (laity)" (Hebrews 9:6, 7).

The great difference under the new covenant is illustrated in one important verse. It affirms the priesthood of all believers and uses the term laos to designate the same group. "But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people (laity), that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light" (1 Peter 2:9).

This is a significant passage because it identifies the royal priesthood with God's laity. Every priest of God is one of his laity, every member of God's laity is a priest. Every child of God is his lot or inheritance through the blood of Jesus, therefore, all of God's children constitute his clergy. Since they also constitute his laity, there can be no distinction between clergy and laity in the kingdom of Christ.

It is worth noting that Peter declares that Christians are God's laity (people), "that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness." God's laity are not those to whom messages of God are brought. They are themselves the bringers of a message. The laity are not those who listen to a clergy declare the wonderful works of God; they are the clergy who do the declaring.

It is sad indeed to contemplate how far we have fallen away from God's ideal of the priestly citizenry. It is not uncommon to hear Christians excuse themselves for their ignorance or apathy with the words, "After all, I am just a layman." This is equivalent to saying "I am just one of God's people." The tragedy is that those who thus speak proceed to act as if they are not God's people.

The clergy are expected to engage in religious activities, to walk circumspectly, to employ proper language, to visit the sick and to study the Bible. This is regarded as the field of clerical function. This is what the clergy is paid to do. Those who are "just laymen" live on a different plane. Their function is to go listen to the clergyman and pay his salary for performing a priestly role. But all of this is as far from God's program for the Christian life as the blood of Christ is from the blood of bulls and goats.

Just as any attempt to create a special clergy must result in a laity, so any attempt to create a distinctive laity must result in a special clergy. Sometimes men seek to avoid the implications of their philosophy by employing other terms to designate what they create. They frequently borrow scriptural terminology in the vain hope that a thing may be sanctified by calling a good name over it.

But we may designate the clergy system by whatever terms we will, borrowing the language of apostate ecclesiasticism, or "stealing the livery of heaven" in which to clothe it, yet the fact is that so long as the idea of a special ministerial caste exists, and the remainder of the saints are regarded as "the laity," that long we are nearer to Rome than to Jerusalem. And that long we are standing at a mount that can be touched rather than before Mount Sion.

Let us be very plain so there can be no ground for misunderstanding. We may call our clergyman "our minister," "local evangelist," or just plain preacher," but if he occupies a place of prominence in the assembly of saints as the front man for the congregation, if he is the exclusive minister, by virtue of his office, "to declare the wonderful works of God," when the whole community come together in one place, and if other saints are excluded from the opportunity by his very presence, we have a special clergyman. A preacher can be a clergyman as easily as a clergyman can be a preacher.

It is going to be very difficult to recover the abandoned ideal of the universal priesthood of believers. This is true for several reasons. The greatest deterrent is the bitter opposition to it by many who profess to be followers of Jesus. We have converted men to systems, structures and organizations. They have no real sense of vital relationship to Jesus as the head of a living organism. They are often lazy, indifferent and unconcerned. And many who never thought of fighting the devil will fight the thought of returning to the responsible role of priesthood. Too, we have been betrayed into measuring spiritual growth by numerical statistics. We have two criteria by which to judge our success— attendance and contributions. This may well be called "the scholar-dollar" fallacy. It operates on the assumption that the greater the number in Sunday School and the greater the bank account the closer to heaven we are. Actually there may be little relationship between the number of dollars in the bank and the number of names in the Book of Life.

To abandon the clergy-oriented modern institution for the Spirit-filled community of saints in the first century is the last thing most people will consider. It is probable that the primitive community was more adapted to meaningful meetings in small homes, third floor walk-up tenements (as at Troas), or in catacombs and caves. Here those who were fighting for survival of a cause could come and bind up their wounds, share their experiences and exhort one another to shoulder the cross again. Their problem was not the institutional community image but how to survive individually until the morrow.

We must be realistic enough to recognize that we live in a modern world. There are many conditions in twentieth century America which were undreamed of in first century Palestine or Asia Minor. Religion has been institutionalized for many centuries. Millions who want to follow Jesus do not think of themselves as runners, pugilists or soldiers in a spiritual sense. References to such activities are regarded as portraying a quaint symbolism of a bygone area.

We are resigned to being spectators rather than participants. The action is to be carried out by trained. professionals. We are the drama critics who sit in favored locations and observe the presentation without ever becoming really involved. We are like natives watching a battle from the hills whose special interests favor one side in the conflict, but who never move down into the fray.

It is evident that a priestly role involves service to God. A priest under the old covenant did not act by proxy. He was not a mere onlooker but an active sharer in the responsibilities pertaining to the temple. But this was only a step in the divine program which was to culminate in a universal priesthood of all believers.

Our tragedy is that we have been betrayed into going back to before the cross and reinstating the concept of priesthood which was a part of Judaism. We have again created a professional priesthood to minister in our behalf. We think of the pulpit as "a holy place" in "the sanctuary" where only those with special ordination or anointing may officiate.

In many cases those who enter the pulpit wear robes to distinguish them from the rest of the saints. They regard the speaker's stand as a "sacred desk" and pronouncements made from it may be uttered in a special "religious voice" adopted for the occasion. Such utterances may be given greater attention than those made by a public schoolteacher who instructs a group of students in a Sunday school class.

The minister may develop a sense of importance as to his position and speak about "my elders," "my church," "my laymen." If he ever regards the body of believers as constituting a priesthood he regards himself as a sort of local high priest whose task is to correlate and be responsible for a ritual or liturgy by which men approach God through his leading or direction. This has tended to institutionalize the church and to eliminate the family feeling so essential to the maintenance of brotherly love under the fatherhood of God.

From time to time there have been movements sparked in the history of the Christian community to get rid of the clergy. John Milton led such an attempt in his day and directed a vitriolic attack. Unfortunately most of these ventures were as negative as they were antagonistic. They were anti-clerical and were directed toward the goal of reducing the clerics to what is called lay-status.

It would seem that a reverse approach would be more in keeping with God's purpose. Those who think of themselves as "the laity" should be taught to regard themselves as "priests of the most high God," and should be equipped for the fulfillment of the priestly function required by the new covenant.

We must come to recognize that God's only sanctuary is the human heart consecrated and dedicated to the high calling of Christian service. In the economy of Christ, priest and sacrifice become one. Jesus offered himself, and it is written, "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all" (Heb. 10:10). As a part of the priesthood inaugurated through this universal sacrifice we also must "present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, as a spiritual service."

Unfortunately, we have been betrayed into erecting temples and tabernacles in which we dedicate sanctuaries, and we tend to think of what we do in such special places as service to God. But all of this is pre-Christian and Judaistic in origin. It actually nullifies the power of the cross, while pampering our pride and salving the conscience. Temples require special priests, vestments, liturgies, orders of service, and a great many other things wholly unknown to the new covenant. We have actually forsaken "the order of Melchizedek" for that of Aaron and Levi, and have reverted to "the law of a carnal commandment" in preference to "the power of an endless life" (Hebrews 7:16).

This does not mean that members of the royal priesthood should not assemble together. Indeed, the very epistle which says the most about priesthood specifically says we should not forsake the assembling of ourselves together. But the same passage tells us that the purpose of our convening should be to incite one another to love and to good works, and to encourage one another (Hebrews 10:24, 25). We do not meet to conduct a service to God, or to offer a ritualistic sacrifice. We are the sacrifice.

This means that wherever a child of God is, there God is in his sanctuary. If one works at a lathe in the shop, at a desk in the office, at a table in the laboratory, or at a counter in the store, he is God's priest in that place, and whatever he says or does must reflect the glory of God.

It is very difficult for one who works on an assembly line to see how the affixing of three nuts to their respective bolts can have any regal or priestly significance, but this is because we are not trained to see how God uses things to open up doors of ministry. Jesus took advantage of a well curb when He was tired to talk to one woman who was a social outcast, and through her ministered to a whole city. So priests of God can use coffee-breaks and lunch hours in our own day of industrialization.

One of the major differences between Judaism and the Christian community is that under the former the important thing was the place where the sacrifice was offered, while under the latter, place has lost significance. The true worshipper no longer thinks in terms of a particular site or city as "the place where men ought to worship" but in terms of spirit and reality.

Under the Levitical priesthood men had to go where the high priest was in order to sacrifice, but our high priest left heaven to come where men were, and by so doing he lifted worship from the drudgery of time and place and made it universal as to both. God can only be confined by what he has made, and never by anything which men have made. "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything."

It is a tremendous challenge which confronts us. We must undo the crystallizing trend of centuries, and turn back the tide of ecclesiasticism which has engulfed and overwhelmed the ideal of God. We must instil in the hearts of men a recognition of the placelessness of worship and the universality of priesthood of the chosen generation comprising the citizenry of the holy nation. In short, we must restore to earth the dream of the prophets and the vision of the apostles. We must uncover the Word and discover the Way.

Priesthood and Ministry

Contents

The Roman Catholic Church has built up a system of special priesthood on a hierarchical basis, the grounds for which we will examine in subsequent chapters. In approximation to this the Protestant world generally has adopted a clergy system which relegates the members to what is referred to as "lay status," and which effectively negates the new covenant ideal of universal priesthood. Thus the concept of "the priesthood of all believers" has virtually been lost, or if it is still professed it is not given spiritual emphasis in practice.

There are a great many factors which contribute to this. One is the mistaken view concerning the nature of the church, which is no longer regarded as a functioning body served actively by every member, but is looked upon as an institution which may purchase services in its own behalf. A general apathy toward intensive study of the Bible has created a widespread ignorance of the language of revelation and its connotations. Too, the clergy system is now so venerable with age that it is accepted as of divine origin. It is believed that the Christian religion would be powerless without it.

The community of believers in our day suffers from a confusion of tongues. The terms used in the scriptures are often applied to those things which are foreign or alien to their original meaning, and new words have been coined to describe Biblical concepts which serve only to warp or distort them. General terms are given only a specific meaning, and vice versa.

For one to attempt a recapture of the original faith and order as set forth by the holy apostles means that he must recover the meaning attached to the words used by the Spirit. Frequently this means stripping from such words the ecclesiastical ideas with which they have been clothed. When this is done it becomes obvious that the true meaning has been concealed for many generations.

A good illustration of what we mean is found in the words "minister" and "ministry." These appear as translations of Greek terms, but they have been given such limitations in our day that the majesty and breadth originally attached to them has been all but lost.

"Minister" is from the Latin ministro, which means "to serve, to attend, to wait on." A minister is one who serves, and any service rendered is ministry. The word "minister" designates one as a servant but never, of itself, expresses or suggests the kind of service rendered. One simply cannot tell by looking at the word the nature of the service. To use the word ministry in such a manner as to apply it exclusively to one branch or field of service is to do an injustice to the language of the Spirit.

In spite of this, to speak of "the minister" in our day is to refer to only one functionary. In justification for this it is urged that Paul declared that he was "made a minister" (Eph. 3:7), that Tychicus was "a faithful minister in the Lord" (Eph. 6:21), that Epaphras was "a faithful minister of Christ" (Col. I:7), and that Timothy was told how to become "a good minister" (1 Tim. 4:6). What does this mean? Simply that these men were good servants, faithful in whatever relationship they were called upon to sustain to God, Christ and the congregation.

"Minister" is from diakonos, which occurs 30 times. It is rendered minister 20, deacon 3, and servant 7 times. It is translated "deacon" in Philippians 1:1, 1 Timothy 3:8, 12. To employ it to designate a special type of labor in a congregation, exclusive of that done by the deacons would be absurd in the light of God's revelation. Yet when one asks a friend to come and hear "the new minister" he is not inviting him to listen to a speech by a newly appointed deacon. Nor does the term "associate minister" refer to an assistant to the deacons. One who decides to "study for the ministry" is not planning to train for the diaconate in most places. Yet the word "deacon" is a transliteration of the Greek word for minister.

The word for minister is found in John 2:5, 9 where it is applied to the servants who drew water which was then changed into wine by Jesus. It is apparent that one could argue that a minister is "a drawer of water" with as much scriptural ground as he could contend that a minister is "a preacher of the gospel."

Phoebe is called "a minister of the church which is at Cenchrea" (Romans 16:1) but we would hardly surmise that she was sent forth by the congregation as an evangelist. Those religious bodies which claim to oppose "women ministers" find themselves in difficulty with Phoebe, whom the apostle Paul commended as a minister of a local congregation.

Of course there is nothing in the term "servant" which defines the type of service. The nature of the service is not inherent in the word. The word servant does not mean gardener, chauffeur, maid or cook. There is a difference in saying that "A cook is a servant," and in saying, "A servant is a cook." So there is a great difference between the statements, "A gospel preacher is a minister," and "A minister is a gospel preacher."

A preacher is a minister in the congregation, but so is the custodian who cuts the grass and sweeps the floor, the one who supervises the nursery, and the one who prints and folds the bulletins. Those who use their cars to transport others to the meetings, who visit the homes for the aged, and who look after the needy, are all ministers. It is at this point we have been betrayed into a way of life and speech which contravenes God's plan and purpose. We have actually squeezed the words of the Holy Spirit until we have wrung them dry of their content.

Only one man's name appears upon the signboard with the caption— Minister. The same name appears upon the letterheads and stationery, and upon the bulletins and mailing pieces. By the very designation of one as the minister, we have successfully convinced all of the others that they are not ministers. They do not even think of themselves in that category.

If you address a group of members in the foyer with the question, "Are you gentlemen ministers of the congregation," the laughing reply will be, "No, the minister is in the office." Even more ridiculous in the light of the scriptures is for one to reply, "I am not a minister, I am just a deacon." This is the equivalent of saying, "I am not a minister, I am just a minister." It is little wonder that the church is confused.

A further indication of our "confusion of tongues" is demonstrated when we talk of one "preparing to enter the ministry." We mean by it that the person under consideration expects to make a professional career out of preaching the gospel. It is only fair to state, however, that he will be expected to take courses designated as homiletics, hermeneutics, pastoral psychology, church administration, religious communications, etc. All of this would have been wholly unintelligible to the apostles and to the communities of saints planted by their labors.

"Ministry," "ministering," and "ministration," come from diakonia, which is used 34 times in the new covenant scriptures. It first occurs in Luke 10:40 where Martha was said to be "distracted with much serving." One might infer from this that a student who went to college to prepare for the ministry would major in "home economics," with a minor in "table settings." Martha was so deeply involved in ministering that she made application to Jesus for an "assistant minister." "Lord, do you not care that my sister has left me to serve (minister) alone? Tell her to help me."

The word for ministry and ministering is employed for the daily distribution of food (Acts 6:1), for the administration of funds to the famine-ridden and drought-stricken Judean saints (2 Cor. 8:4, 9:1), for the work of Paul (2 Cor. 11:8), and that of Timothy (2 Tim. 4:5). Thus a person is engaged in ministry whether he is serving tables, carrying funds to the unfortunate, proclaiming the truth, or in any other fashion serving others.

There is nothing distinctive in the word "ministry" as to the kind of service performed. There are two great sources of intellectual evil in the interpretation of God's revelation. One is to create distinctions where God has made none; the other is to destroy or lose sight of the distinctions which God has made.

It is not too much to say that the life of the saint is expressed in the word ministry, or service. Jesus came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He declared that he was among men as one who served. Those who follow him must come to minister, and not to be ministered unto. The community of believers should have as a goal the providing of an opportunity for every member to share in constructive fashion his thinking and gifts. Any system which commits the edification of the body to one person hired for the role, and reduces the rest to mere spectators is contrary to the plan and purpose of God.

It is at this point that the modern institutional church, while professing to be God's agency for transformation of the world, actually operates to defeat the divine intention. The church envisions itself as a rival of other religious institutions. It is concerned with its "image" in society. It therefore becomes involved in presenting good programs to impress the visiting public, which it calls "worship services," but which consist chiefly of ritualistic or liturgical performances.

There is no question but what the gatherings of the saints in apostolic times were in the nature of family reunions. The spontaneity and unrehearsed participation was of the type which you might expect to find in our day when a Christian family sits down at the Thanksgiving table. Even the least one is heard with special appreciation, and those who are less forward are gently urged to share in the occasion.

Since religion has become highly organized by promoters, whose motivations may be quite genuine and sincere, it has had to invent and devise new offices and officers to keep it moving with accelerated pace. The idea of a personal heart-to-heart relationship with God through the Spirit has been replaced with the philosophy that one should be allied with "a successful church." Such a church is one that enjoys good social relationships and attracts the right people whose presence can lend it an aura of respectability.

It is for this reason that the more dire need there is in a community the farther the church removes itself from it. The desperately poor do not help the image of the church by being within it. Instead they serve only to salve the consciences of the membership by allowing them to make contributions to relieve those whom they never expect to personally encounter.

The "local minister" is the front man for the congregation in our day. He is the key to its popularity or its waning influence. Often a great deal of investigation is made before negotiations begin for his hiring. His personal mannerisms, dress, tone quality and pulpit aplomb come under close scrutiny. A great deal of behind-the-scenes arguing may go on as to the relative merits of several candidates for the post. If a majority of the members of the committee are from one school, an alumnus from that subsidiary institution stands a better chance than one from another alma mater.

So much is this a part of the institutional religious life of our day that it comes with a shock of surprise when one points out that it is utterly foreign to the concept enunciated by the holy apostles. The "local minister" or "one-man pastor" is unknown to the new covenant scriptures. The community of the saints was edified and strengthened by the use of every gift. The believers never gathered to hear a "sermon." The word is not even found in the sacred scriptures. Origen was called "the father of the sermon."

The royal priesthood has certain rights which are divinely given. These rights are accompanied by the responsibility to use them. They cannot be abrogated or transferred without doing serious injury to the body, or despite to the Spirit of grace. One of the basic rights is that of every faithful child of God who has the ability, to speak to his fellows for their edification and comfort. In the primitive congregations men were urged to seek this above all other spiritual gifts.

Of course this meant that the public expression of worship was so arranged as to provide for this exercise, since it would be ridiculous to urge all to seek the ability to edify and then relegate the function to one imported for a fee. Instead of one taking all of the time, the brethren were taught to yield the speaking privilege to one another in love (1 Corinthians 14:30, 31). And to this fact the scholarship of the world gives ready agreement. Read carefully the following statements from eminent historians

"The participation in worship was not confined to the official members, but to every male member it was permitted to utter his apprehension of truth. The ordinary services of the church were very similar to those of a good prayer meeting at the present time." (A. H. Newman, D.D., LL.D., Manual of Church History, page 141).

"The form of worship of the primitive church was also exceedingly simple. Meetings were held commonly on the first day of the week in private houses or in some public building appropriated to that purpose. At those meetings prayer was offered, portions of the Old Testament and letters from the apostles were read, psalms and perhaps hymns were sung; and words 'of exhortation' were spoken freely by anyone who might feel moved to do this." (Andrew C. Zenas, Professor of Biblical Theology, McCormick Theological Seminary, Compendium of Church History, page 28).

"The major premise of every true conclusion as to the ministry of the Apostolic Age, must be the outpouring of the Spirit, hailed by Peter at Pentecost as the mark of Messianic times. In it Moses' ideal that all the Lord's people should be prophets was in substance fulfilled. Accordingly in their worship, as we see from 1 Corinthians 14, each believer was free to edify his fellows by psalm, teaching, revelation, tongue, interpretation, as well as prayer or Eucharist. Whatever limitations expediency came in time to impose on this diffused ministry, the idea involved had, and has, abiding force; and it was not the idea underlying the later distinctions between 'clergy' and 'laity.'" (James Vernon Bartlet, M. A., Ten Epochs of Church History, page 477).

"Worship in the apostolic age was a spontaneous expression of devout feeling. The order of worship was a free copy of the synagogue service. Selections from the Old Testament were read. Expositions of Scripture and spontaneous speaking followed." (George P. Fisher, History of the Christian Church, page 141).

"The meeting described by the apostle (1 Corinthians 14) is not to be taken as something which might be seen in Corinth but was peculiar to that city; it may be taken as a type of the Christian meeting throughout the Gentile Christian churches; for the apostle, in his suggestions and criticisms continually speaks of what took place throughout all the churches. What cannot fail to strike us in this picture is the untrammeled liberty of the worship, the possibility of every male member of the congregation taking part in the prayers and exhortations, and the consequent responsibility laid on the whole community to see that the service was for edification." (Thomas M. Lindsay, D.D., Principal of Glasgow College of the United Free Church of Scotland, The Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries, page 48).

"That two or three should thus take part, and all being 'done unto edifying', was, and still should be, a matter for dependence upon, and leading by, the Holy Spirit. No uncontrolled impulse is to be allowed. Gradually, however, clerical power became dominant, and the worship and testimony of a local church was committed to the control of one man, who became known as 'the minister'. This was an easy way of seeking to regulate difficulties, but it was not God's way. Two wrongs do not make a right. The system of 'the one-man ministry' spread over Christendom and remained general, until many of God's people were awakened to the importance of adhering to New Testament principles and recognizing the prerogatives and claims of the Holy Spirit in the gatherings of a church; they realized the unscripturality of the stifling of the development of spiritual gifts by the appointment of one man to conduct the services. The Lord will have regard in the coming Day of reward to those who, amidst disrepute and criticism, have sought to remain faithful to Him and obedient to His will as revealed in God's Word." (W. E. Vine, M.A., First Corinthians, page 196).

"We understand edification here in its general and original sense, as given to it in St. Paul's writings, as referring to the advancement and development, from its common ground, of the whole church. The edification, in this sense, was the common work of all. Even edification by the Word was not assigned exclusively to one individual; every man who felt the inward call to it might give utterance to the Word in the assembled church." (Dr. Augustus Neander, Ordinary Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin, Church History, Vol. 1, page 251).

"From this (1 Corinthians 14:26) and other passages it is clear that the upbuilding of the church was not confined then, as now, to one, or at most two, of the congregation; but was the privilege of all the members, and though such a practice is liable to abuse (James 3:1), it is possible that its entire disuse has led to still greater evils obvious to all— 'quenching of the Spirit.'" (Robert Young, author of Young's Analytical Concordance).

"There is no doubt, that in the ordinary Lord's Day meeting of the apostolic churches, quite a number of brethren took part in the speaking and praying. This is clear to any one who will read carefully the fourteenth chapter of First Corinthians. It is true that the instructions contained in that chapter are mostly given to persons possessed of spiritual gifts; but if, when men possessed of such gifts were in the church, it was not best that any one of them should occupy the entire time, why should we think it best to reverse the rule in the absence of such gifts? Surely we have no right to make such a change unless there be something in the absence of spiritual gifts which demands it." (J. W. McGarvey, Apostolic Times, 1873).

Since it cannot be denied that in the days of the apostles the edification of the congregations was not limited to one or two men, but was the privilege of all who were faithful and able, and that this precedent was by actual disposition of the Holy Spirit, and with apostolic approval and regulation, it remains for us to enquire upon what grounds the principle is now ignored and a wholly different system inaugurated which was unknown to the early saints?

The most common excuse for the modern substitution is that the picture given in the New Testament belongs to the days of spiritual gifts bestowed by the laying on of apostolic hands, and consequently is not binding upon the church today in the absence of such gifts. But was not every letter written to and regulating the churches, penned in the days of spiritual gifts? Then by what reasoning can we apply any of the new covenant letters to the congregations in our day? If we can carelessly dismiss the plan of edification authorized "when the whole congregation assembles," can we not dismiss all other instructions given to the believers?

If the system of hiring one man to speak to the assembled congregation each time is superior to that of having "all speak one by one" (1 Corinthians 14:31), why did not the Holy Spirit bestow the gift to edify only upon the most talented one in each congregation?

It is not denied that men possess natural gifts and abilities in these days. Supernatural gifts belong to the supernatural era of the Christian dispensation and natural gifts belong to the natural era. Will not the very same principles which governed the use of supernatural gifts to the edification of the assembly also govern the use of the natural gifts to the same end?

The Holy Spirit uses the term charisma to designate the gifts. Concerning this word and its usage we insert herewith a statement from Fenton John Anthony Hort, D.D., Lady Margaret's Reader in Divinity, University of Cambridge, in his well-known work, The Christian Ecclesia, page two:

"Charisma comes of course from charizomai; it means anything given of free bounty not of debt, contract or right. It is thus obviously used in Philo, and as obviously in Romans 5:15; 6:23; and less obviously, but I believe the same force in the other passages of St. Paul, as also in the only other New Testament place, 1 Peter 4:10. In these instances it is used to designate what we call 'natural advantages' independent of any human process of acquisition, or advantage freshly received in the course of Providence; both alike being regarded as so many free gifts from the Lord to men, and as designed by Him to be distinctive qualifications for rendering distinctive service to men, or communities of men."

Inasmuch as the Holy Spirit employed the identical term to designate both natural and supernatural gifts, referring to the gift of sexual control (1 Corinthians 7:7) in exactly the same fashion as the direct manifestations of 1 Corinthians 12:4, can we not conclude that all gifts or abilities are to be utilized for "the common good" (1 Corinthians 12:7), regardless of the method of bestowal? And would not a system which makes impossible the functioning of the abilities of all the brethren today be as obnoxious to God as the same system would have been in Corinth in the days of Paul?

The Holy Spirit moved Peter to write to the exiles of the Dispersion, "As each has received a gift, employ it for one another, as good stewards of God's grace" (1 Peter 4:10). Would the same Spirit, if writing to us today, change the message to read, "Let each stifle his natural gifts, and employ another, as a good steward of God's grace"?

If the apostle Paul wrote to a congregation in Rome in the twentieth century, would he say, "I myself am satisfied about you, my brethren, that you yourselves are full of goodness, filled with all knowledge and able to instruct one another" (Romans 15:14), or would he recommend that they hire a "local minister"? Inasmuch as he was satisfied with them, and about them, would he be satisfied with our modern substitution which, while the people love to have it so, makes impossible the functioning of the assembly as Paul outlined it?

When the apostle addressed his first letter to the congregation at Thessalonica, he emphasized the fact of the coming of our Lord, adding, "Therefore encourage one another and build one another up, just as you are doing" (1 Thessalonians 5:11). Is there a better time to exercise the members in building one another up than when all have gathered in one place. This was God's program for the congregation originally. Has he altered it for the present time? Who will affirm that an uninspired man may utilize all of the time appointed for public edification, when an inspired man was not permitted to do so?

The system into which the religious world has fallen has created the greatest "brain drain" in history. It is directly responsible for accumulation of a tremendous mass of unused talent. In many congregations there are brilliant men who are never allowed to share their thinking with the rest of the saints and faithful brethren simply because they are not regarded as being in the clerical caste.

Superintendents of schools, college professors, attorneys, advertising executives, and many others, are doomed to a life of perpetual silence in the public meetings by this system. Men who are invited to address conventions of learned personnel are never invited to share their thinking in the public assembly of the congregations where they attend. Often they are forced to listen to one who invades their professional field in his remarks, although quite ignorant of the subject upon which he professes to speak with authority.

Congregations need to hear the personal testimony of men who are in daily contact with life as it is being lived. Those who teach science in the college classroom are more qualified to speak about the problems raised by modern research than one who never studied the subject. The psychiatrist in the congregation should be more capable of talking about emotional and personality disorders than one whose observation is limited and who has no technical knowledge of the subject.

Why should a congregation not be allowed to share in all of the helpful insights of all of its membership? Why muzzle men who are often more scholarly and qualified than the one who is hired to project the orthodox position week after week? That many are growing weary with the sterility which has resulted is obvious. A reaction is setting in which takes the form of a revolution. In many areas "an underground church" is forming.

This phenomenon is observable when people become tired of meaningless and monotonous ritual, of forms and ceremonies. Small groups begin to meet in homes without benefit of clergy, and in these cell meetings all are free to speak their honest sentiments and convictions. No one lords it over the others. There is no clergy-laity division. It is apparent that many are hungering and thirsting after righteousness and want to feed themselves.

The royal priesthood should be made to realize that divine rights have been surrendered to, or captured by, a special caste, an incipient clergy. These rights must be returned to the saints, or God's plan of the ages will be nullified as it pertains to our responsibility. By what scriptural authority do men set themselves up, or offer themselves for hire, as the ministers of the congregations?

On what bases do some of the priests claim such exaltation, eminence, enthronement and esteem, over the other regal princes of the priesthood of heaven? Is it by virtue of a more noble birth? Is it the result of superior knowledge conveyed to them by other mortals? Are they composed of a more worthy clay which elevates the fortunate ones thus created to shine as brighter constellations in the Christian galaxy?

Every Christian is a priest! Every Christian is a minister! Every priest of God has a divine right as a minister of God to serve the King of kings and his loyal subjects. Every talent must be utilized in God's service. Every man who has the ability to exhort, edify or comfort his brethren must be granted the right to do so. God has placed no pulpit as a throne in the midst of the congregation, to which one man has an exclusive right.

The freedom of the speaker's platform for every loyal capable subject must be asserted, or we must admit that a part of the worship of God belongs to a stipendiary, and in that phase of devotion we can only approach God through human mediators, financially supported by the saints "to perform their ritual duties." Since this is the function of priests (Hebrews 9:6) we will then have a special caste of priests above their fellows, and we will take steps toward Rome.

E. De Pressense has written: "We have already shown that the universal priesthood was only maintained to its full extent in practice, as well as in theory, so long as the redemptive sacrifice of Christ was accepted without reserve as the source of universal salvation. He is the one Priest of the Church only if He truly finished all upon the cross, so that His disciples have but to appropriate His sacrifice by faith, in order to become priests and kings in Him and by Him. If all was not completed on Calvary, if the salvation of man is not a perfected work, then we are still separated from God; we have no free access into his sanctuary, and we seek mediators who may present our offering for us. When Christianity is regarded rather as a new law than as the sovereign manifestation of Divine grace, it leaves us in our impotence, our unworthiness, to our fruitless strivings and our partial aspirations. We are no more kings and priests, we fall back under the yoke of a servile fear. The hierarchy gains by all that men lose of childlike confidence in that infinite mercy which alone renders needless all official mediation between the penitent and God." (The Early Years of Christianity, Volume 4, pages 47, 48. Translated by Annie Harwood-Holmden).

The Case For a Special Priesthood

Contents

Fairness demands that we consider and examine the position of those who uphold the idea of a special priesthood, and who seek to establish a difference among God's people represented by the terms "clergy" and "laity." Since this doctrine seems to reach its ultimate in the Roman Catholic Church, we will carefully scrutinize the position of that great religio-politico institution on the issue. Before me lies the booklet by Rev. John A. O'Brien, Ph.D., entitled "The Priesthood: A Divine Institution." It has a sub-heading: "The Priest is Christ's Ambassador to Men." The booklet bears the approval signatures of Very Rev. Msgr. T. E. Dillon as Censor Librorum; and John Francis Noll, D.D., Bishop of Fort Wayne. Surely if it is possible to make out a logical case for the special priesthood this booklet should be able to accomplish it, since it was written for that very purpose.

In our examination of its postulates and alleged proofs, we shall present it in toto, lest we be accused of scrapping the arguments or omitting something vital to the conclusion. Our method will be to print it section by section and test its claims as we proceed. In some cases we will notice and comment upon each sentence, in others we shall deal with a whole paragraph; this dependent upon the nature of the argument involved. Below is the introductory section of the booklet.

> The Catholic Church differs from the various denominations in that it alone possesses an altar and a priesthood. It worships Almighty God not alone by prayer but by sacrifice as well. It offers up in an unbloody manner the Sacrifice of Christ on Calvary. This sacrifice was foreshadowed in the Old Law by the bloody sacrifice of the priesthood of Levi, the offerings of sheep and goats and oxen. The offering of the sacrifice of bread and wine by Melchisedech, King of Salem, and priest of the Most High, typified the clean oblation of which the prophet Malachi spoke: "From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name is great among the Gentiles, and in every place there is sacrifice and there is offered to my name a clean oblation, saith the Lord of hosts." Such is the divinely inspired prophecy concerning that clean oblation, the holy Sacrifice of the Mass which constitutes the central act of worship in the Church founded by Christ.

Without a priesthood, however, there can be no altar and no sacrifice, as the experience of our separated brethren abundantly demonstrates. There can be preaching and prayer. But that essential element of worship, sacrifice, which bulks so large in the Old Testament, is lost without a priesthood. Did Christ found a Church but make no provision for a priesthood to offer sacrifice? Did He fail to institute a priesthood which would continue in all ages the work He had begun? Did He launch His bark without captain or crew to guide it over the uncharted waters of the centuries yet to come?

We have no more desire to defend the various denominations than we do the Roman Church, for neither constitute the New Testament congregation of saints established by our Lord through His holy apostles. The churches of Christ have a priesthood. It is composed of all those who are God's own people (1 Peter 2:9) and these priests worship God not only by prayer but by "spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ" (1 Peter 2:5).

The Romish priesthood which "offers up in an unbloody manner the Sacrifice of Christ on Calvary" is doing that which no child of God was ever authorized to do, and while it is true that the real sacrifice of our Lord was prefigured and adumbrated by the offering of sheep and goats and oxen, "when Christ appeared as a high priest of the good things that have come, then through the greater and more perfect tent, he entered once for all into the Holy Place, taking not the blood of goats and calves but his own blood, thus securing an eternal redemption" (Heb. 9:11, 12). Since the mass is supposed to be a daily offering in an unbloody manner of the sacrifice of Christ on the cross, the Romish priests like those of Judaism "go continually— performing their ritual duties" (Heb. 9:6). But of Christ it is affirmed that he need "not offer himself repeatedly" but "has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb. 10:25, 26). The Roman Catholic Church is an unholy mixture of Jewish ritualism, pagan superstition, and Christian revelation.

Melchizedek did not offer a sacrifice of bread and wine. He merely brought forth common items of sustenance, and with them refreshed Abraham and his servants on their return from battle. Josephus says: "Now this Melchizedek supplied Abram's army in an hospitable manner, and gave them provisions in abundance, and as they were feasting, he began to praise him, and to bless God for subduing his enemies under him" (Antiquities of Jews 1-10-2). Melchizedek no more intended to offer a sacrifice than did Abraham, who when confronted by visitors said, "Rest yourselves under the tree, while I fetch a morsel of bread, that you may refresh yourselves" (Gen. 18:4, 5).

In order to justify this distorted interpretation the Douay Version has rendered Genesis 14:18, "But Melchisedech the king of Salem, bringing forth bread and wine, for he was the priest of the most high God." But the Romanist translators do not hesitate to translate the same Hebrew word which they render "for" by the word "and" in other places.

We are indebted to the Hebrew letter for virtually all that we know of the nature and character of Melchizedek and his priesthood. Since that letter was written to prove that the order of Melchizedek was superior to that of Levi, and the subject was priesthood, it would have bolstered the argument immensely to have established that Melchizedek offered a sacrifice of bread and wine in type of the Lord's death on Calvary, and the memorial which he ordained of that event. However, when the apostle records the connection of Melchizedek with the father of the Jews, he merely says that he "met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings and blessed him" (Heb. 7:1). There is no hint in the Holy Scriptures that he offered a sacrifice of bread and wine, so we must put this down as a figment of imagination conjured up to support a questionable practice.

The words of Malachi (1:11) are said to be "a divinely inspired prophesy concerning that clean oblation, the holy Sacrifice of the Mass." But the mass is nowhere mentioned in the New Covenant writings which constitute our only source of information relative to the fulfillment of prophecy concerning the kind of sacrifices which God will honor. In Peter 2:5 it is distinctly said that God's holy priesthood will offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God. Accordingly every child of God is required to present his body "a living sacrifice" (Rom. 12:1). In the Hebrew letter, which more than any other deals with sacrifice, we are urged, "Through him then let us continually offer up a sacrifice of praise to God, that is the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name" (13:15). In Malachi 1:11 the expression "my name" is used by the Lord three times, and the reason assigned for incense and a pure offering in every place is "for my name shall be great among the heathen, said the Lord of hosts." Is it not logical to believe that the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name constitute the offering and incense to which Malachi makes reference?

To this argument the Romanists file two objections. They demand to know how the fruit of our lips in hallowed praise can be an antitype of incense and sacrifice. We reply with the words of David, "Let my prayer be counted as incense, before thee, and the lifting up of my hands as an evening sacrifice" (Psa. 141:2). In the vision which John beheld he saw "golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints" (Rev. 5:8). We conclude then that these represent a fulfillment of the prophecy of Malachi, and that there is no room here for arbitrarily asserting that the ancient prophet was speaking of the mass.

The second objection to our interpretation is that the word "mincha" translated "offering" in the passage by Malachi, always means literal sacrifice and cannot be applied to a figurative or spiritual sacrifice. This objection is invalid as evidenced in Isaiah 66:20, where mincha twice occurs in one verse, and the first time must be employed in a figurative sense. "And they shall bring all your brethren from the nations as an offering to the Lord . . . just as the Israelites bring their cereal offering in a clean vessel to the house of the Lord."

We have demonstrated that in the New Testament plan there is a priesthood and there are sacrifices. As to the altar, the apostle affirms "We have an altar from which those who serve the tent have no right to eat" (Heb. 13:10). So Christ did not "found a church and make no provision for a priesthood to offer sacrifice." He did not "fail to institute a priesthood which would continue in all ages the work He had begun." He did not "launch His bark without captain or crew to guide it over the uncharted waters of the centuries yet to come." He is the captain of our salvation (Hebrews 2:10) and every member of the church is part of that crew. Every member is a priest and a minister. What Rome must do to substantiate her claim is to show that God ordained a captain, a crew, and a third class composed of paying passengers who are on board not to serve, but to be served. It is here at the first attempt that Dr. O'Brien's thesis on a special priesthood breaks down, and his argument like an ill-manned vessel is left floundering. Let us notice his next argument.

A STRANGE PROCEDURE

That Christ acted in this strange manner would seem to be the belief of our Protestant friends. For in their eyes the minister who preaches to them is clothed with no divine power. His authority comes solely from the congregation which employs him. He is like the artist who plays the organ, the secretary who keeps the books, and like them is dismissable at the will and caprice of the congregation which hires him.

That Christ did not act in the strange manner above described, founding a Church but failing to make any provision for its perpetuation through a definite ministry, has been the constant belief of the Church which He founded. The Church teaches that Christ not only instituted the priesthood but conferred upon it clearly specified powers and authority. It is inconceivable to her that a divine Being, Jesus Christ, would found a Church to minister to the spiritual needs of mankind in the succeeding ages without establishing a ministry and conferring upon it the power and authority necessary to enable the church to fulfill her divinely appointed mission. Such is the procedure which both reason and common sense would lead us to expect.

Such is the procedure which the New Testament shows us Christ actually followed. It tells us that Christ selected twelve Apostles and ordained them His first priests. Upon them He conferred the power of ordaining others to continue their work. The sacrament by which men are ordained and receive the Power and grace to discharge the duties of the priestly office is Holy Orders.

It is apparently inconceivable to the priestly writer that a church may exist without a special priesthood claiming dogmatic authority or a hired minister subject to the whims of his employers. Yet, strange to say, no New Testament congregation ever hired a man as the minister to preach to them. Such a thing as hiring and firing the minister was as unknown to the primitive churches, as playing an organ in the public worship expressions of the church. The scribe is more nearly correct than he realized, when he states of the hired minister, "He is like the artist who plays the organ." That is true, for neither the hired minister nor the organ player is found in the scriptural description of the church which was purchased by the blood of our Lord.

Christ did not found a church and fail to provide for its perpetuation through a definite ministry, but that definite ministry is composed of all of the saints. True, there are bishops over each local congregation of disciples to shepherd them, and deacons in each local congregation to attend to the care of the needy ones, but these are chosen from among the membership by the whole multitude of believers, and there is no higher position of authority than to be one of several bishops of a local congregation. A plurality of bishops over one church is clearly taught in the Sacred Scriptures; one bishop over a plurality of churches is not taught therein.

The writer makes two expressions synonymous. They are "instituting a priesthood" and "establishing a ministry." Jesus Christ did this very thing, but the ministry and priesthood he established are universal as related to Christians, and not confined to a sacerdotal group as Rome would have it. It is observable that the author says, "The Church teaches that Christ not only instituted the priesthood but conferred upon it clearly specified powers and authority." We do not have time, space nor inclination at this point to argue the right of "the church" to teach, but suffice it to say, we have definite logical grounds for respecting the revelation of God as the only authoritative teaching on matters of religious interest. We shall demand and expect a "Thus saith the Lord" as a proper criterion for judging the worthiness of any doctrine affecting our spiritual welfare.

Dr. O'Brien affirms that the procedure which he defends is shown by the New Testament to be the one which Christ actually followed. It is here the battle can be properly joined. It is true that Christ selected twelve apostles, but it is not true that he "ordained them His priests" in a special sense. That they were special ambassadors of the absent King, the Bible teaches (2 Cor. 5:29), but that they were high priests, or even higher priests, than the remainder of the saints, is not true. They became priests of God, not by ordination, but by acceptance of our Lord and obedience to His commands This is true of every child of God.

The apostle upon whom Rome relies the most is Peter. It seems as if the Holy Spirit, in view of the unprincipled use to be made of this apostle by a modern priestcraft, selected him to be the one to declare in unmistakable language the great doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. Peter shows that everyone who comes to the "living stone rejected by men" becomes in turn "a living stone" built into a holy priesthood. Thus to become a priest is conditioned only upon coming to Christ (1 Peter 2:5). God's priests are those who are "chosen and destined by God the Father and sanctified by the Spirit for obedience to Jesus Christ and for sprinkling with his blood" (1 Peter 1:2). The apostles shared "the priesthood" with every other citizen of heaven's rule, for that realm is "a kingdom of priests."

Rome not only demands a belief in "seven sacraments" but even in the ritualistic forms attendant upon the administration of them. "I also profess, that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ, our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for everyone: To wit, Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders and Matrimony, and that they confer grace; and that of these, Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. And I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic Church, used in the solemn administration of all the aforesaid sacraments" (Ordo Administrandi Sacramenti, page 65).

The Lord Jesus Christ did not institute confirmation, penance, extreme unction, matrimony, or holy orders. Matrimony was ordained in the primeval garden when God ordained that a man should leave father and mother and cleave unto his wife. This was four thousand years prior to the advent of Christ into the world. Although Christ ordained or appointed the apostles and the seventy, he instituted no formal ceremony of outward ritual. Even great Roman Catholic historians have been forced to admit that "ordination is not truly and properly a Sacrament."

Did the Apostles Have "Priestly Powers"?

Contents

The apostate church, in order to establish the claim of the hierarchy, seeks to prove that the apostles were granted three "priestly powers." Reasoning from their assumption that the modern priests are successors to the apostles, they then claim for them these special powers. We shall examine these claims as given in the booklet "The Priesthood: A Divine Institution."

THE FIRST ORDINATION

> It was instituted by Christ at the Last Supper, when after consecrating the elements of bread and wine into the Holy Eucharist, He said to the Apostles: "Do ye this for a commemoration of me." (Luke 22:19) The Council of Trent declares: "If anyone says that by these words: 'Do ye this for a commemoration of me,' that Christ did not constitute the Apostles priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests offer His body and blood, let him be anathema."
>
> At the Last Supper, Jesus Christ, the High Priest of the New Law according to the order of Melchisedech, fulfilled the promise which He had previously made to the Apostles, that He would give them His flesh to eat and His blood to drink. He instituted as a permanent and official act of worship the Eucharistic Sacrifice which He had just offered. In commanding the Apostles to do what He had just done, He gave them the power which that act entails, namely, the power to consecrate. In authorizing them to offer the self-same Sacrifice which He had instituted, Christ made the Apostles and their successors the sharers of His eternal priesthood.

By the expression "consecrating the elements of bread and wine into the Holy Eucharist" the writer means according to the doctrine of transubstantiation that the bread and wine were changed into the literal body and blood of Christ. The Council of Trent, to which reference is made, says, "Canon I.— If any one shall deny that the body and blood together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore entire Christ, are truly, really, and substantially contained in the sacrament of the most holy Eucharist; and shall say that He is only in it as in a sign, or in a figure, or virtually— let him be accursed."

I deny that the bread and fruit of the vine were the literal flesh and blood of our Lord, when he instituted the memorial, for the simple reason that he was standing there in the flesh, and with the blood still in His body, when he gave the elements to the apostles. Since "blood is the life of the flesh," then if the elements were actually His body and blood, there were two Christs present at the final Supper— one a literal, living Christ, the other a dead Christ. But an anathema is pronounced upon one who denies that the soul of Christ is not actually in "the Eucharist." If "the soul and divinity of Christ" were "truly and really contained in the sacraments" they could not at the same time be truly and really contained in his body standing before the apostles. But a body is dead when the soul is not in it, therefore the living Christ would have had to be dead, and the dead Christ would have had to be living.

But both Jesus and the apostles refer to the elements in the same fashion after "consecration" as before. In Matthew 26:27, 29, "He took a cup, and when he had given thanks he gave it to them saying, 'Drink of it, all of you' . . . I tell you I shall not drink again of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." Paul declared that he received of the Lord the information he delivered to the Corinthian congregation relative to the Lord's Supper. He declared that Jesus took bread, gave thanks, broke it and said, "This is my body which is for you." Yet in 1 Corinthians 11:26, 27, 28 the apostle shows that what was eaten was still bread and not flesh.

The Council of Trent is cited as authority for the idea that by the expression "Do ye this for a commemoration of me," Christ constituted the apostles priests to offer His body and blood. We reject the resolution of this council as having no authority whatsoever. Since the work of the Council of Trent was not concluded until 1563, when its decrees were ratified by Pope Pius IV, that council came 1500 years too late to carry any weight with the true children of God.

But do the words of Christ imply that he was commissioning a special priesthood to offer an unbloody sacrifice? Far from it. The Lord's Supper is a feast, not a sacrifice; it is observed at a table, not an altar; it is eaten, not offered up; it is a communion of a congregation of priests, not an oblation of priests for a congregation. Jesus did not tell the apostles when he ordained the feast "I appoint unto you an altar at which you may officiate," but he did say at that time "As my Father hath appointed a kingdom for me, so do I appoint for you that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom" (Luke 22:30). The apostle Paul in connection with the teaching about the Lord's Supper, declares, "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons. You cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of demons" (1 Cor. 10:21). We conclude then that the expression "Do this in remembrance of me" does not refer to official authority to sacrifice at an altar, but to the partaking at a festival board of those emblems of our Lord's sacrifice once far all. As proof of this interpretation of the words of our Lord, we cite the fact that Paul delivers the same charge to the whole congregation, and explains them by saying, "For as often as ye eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord's death until he comes" (1 Cor. 11:26). Thus our Lord meant that we should all eat and drink in memory of Him, and that is all He meant. It is here that the decretals of the Council of Trent and the whole philosophy of Romish priestcraft come tumbling down.

Dr. O'Brien, following the regular line of argument used by the Romanists through the years declares that at the last supper, Jesus fulfilled the prior promise to the apostles that He would give them His flesh to eat and His blood to drink. This is a direct reference to the teaching of our Lord as recorded in John, chapter six, and which the Catholic Church makes applicable to "the Eucharist."

Jesus said, "Truly, truly, I say to you, unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you have no life in you; he who eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. For my flesh is food indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him" (John 6:52-56). Our Lord did not here refer to the commemorative supper as we shall demonstrate.

It will be agreed by all that the language employed must be accepted as literal or figurative. The Catholic position is that it is literal in import. If this be true, no Catholics except the priests have life, for Jesus said, "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink of his blood, you have no life in you," and the common members are not allowed to drink the cup. Their reply is that the blood is in the wafer, but if it is, they cannot drink it, for when they have finished the act of eating there is nothing left of the wafer. And if the blood of Christ is in the wafer, why does the priest drink the cup? Jesus affirms that he who eats his flesh and drinks his blood has eternal life and will be raised by Him at the last day. If this is to be taken literally, then all who partake of "the Eucharist" will be saved, a thing which Rome denies.

But the context demonstrates that the expression is used figuratively, and has to do with digesting the doctrine and imbibing the spiritual system of teaching, of our Lord. On the previous day, Jesus had fed a multitude of five thousand with two fish and five barley loaves taken from a lad, and the miracle had so affected the people they were about to take Him by force and coronate Him as king. Jesus withdrew, and crossed the sea to Capernaum. The multitude followed Him, expecting to be fed again the next day. Jesus told them that they had sought Him, not because of His power, but because they ate their fill of the loaves. He exhorted them to "not labor for the food which perishes, but for the food which endures to eternal life, which the Son of man will give to you."

The hungry mob, still anxious for further food, asked for a miracle such as Moses performed saying "Our fathers ate the manna in the wilderness; as it is written, 'He gave them bread from heaven to eat.'" When Jesus pointed out the bread of God is that which comes down from heaven and gives life to the world, they asked to be fed by such bread always. Then comes a significant statement. Jesus said to them "I am the bread of life; he who believes in me shall never thirst" (John 6:35). Thus, the hunger is satisfied by coming to Christ; the thirst is satisfied by believing in Christ. Eating the flesh of the Son of man is equivalent to embracing His tenets; drinking the blood of the Son of man is equivalent to trustful obedience to His will.

That this is a correct view is demonstrated by an occurrence after the lesson delivered in the Capernaum synagogue. Many of his own disciples, not comprehending the spiritual bearing of his message, said "This is a hard saying; who can listen to it?" Jesus said, "Do you take offense at this? . . . It is the spirit that gives life, the flesh is of no avail, the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and life" (John 6:61-63). Thus, the expression "he who eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life" means simply that he who comes to Christ, and believes on Him, in obedience to His word, is made a partaker of His life, i.e., of His flesh and blood. Again the priestly thesis breaks down.

OTHER PRIESTLY POWERS

> Christ completed the communication of His priesthood to the Apostles, when a few days later, he conferred upon them the other strictly sacerdotal power of forgiving sins. On that first Easter Christ appeared to His Apostles and said to them: "As the Father hath sent me, I also send you. When he had said this, he breathed on them: and he said to them: Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." (John 20:21-23)
> The Apostles regarded themselves henceforth as ministers of reconciliation. Thus St. Paul writes to the Corinthians: "God hath reconciled us to Himself through Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation . . . For Christ, therefore, we are ambassadors; God, as it were exhorting through us." (II Cor. 5:18-20) In other words God sends Christ to reconcile sinners; Christ sends us. We are His ambassadors of mercy to sinful men, divinely commissioned to cleanse and heal them.

The statement of our Lord is plain, unequivocal and positive. It is undeniable that he gave the apostles the right, privilege or authority to forgive sins. But notice that he did not tell them at the same time how they were to do it. This does not mean we cannot know how they were to accomplish it, for our Lord told them they would receive the Holy Spirit who would guide them unto all things. We need only consult the record of their acts thus to know how they were to forgive and retain sins.

There are but three ways of forgiveness for sins mentioned in the New Testament, as follows: (1) Actual forgiveness; (2) Declared forgiveness; (3) Legislative forgiveness. If we can determine which of these the apostles taught and practiced, after having received the Holy Spirit which was to guide them into all truth, we shall know what our Lord meant when He said, "Whose sins you remit, they shall be remitted."

Did the apostles claim to have the power to actually forgive sins? Instead of making such a claim, they taught the very opposite. When Simon attempted to purchase the gift of God with money, Peter said unto him, "Repent therefore of this wickedness of yours and pray to the Lord that, if possible, the intent of your heart may be forgiven you" (Acts 8:22). If Peter believed in the power of absolution as taught in the Romish "sacrament of penance" he could have demonstrated it here. Instead, he pointed to God as the only one who could actually forgive sins. John declared, "If any one does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (1 John 2:1). This is far different than saying, "If any man sin we have the sacrament of penance." Rome says that a certain form of absolution is essential and must be pronounced, but nowhere do the apostles make any such allegation. They deny by their practice that Jesus conferred upon them the power to actually forgive sins. This belongs exclusively to God.

Did the apostles exercise a declarative power of forgiveness? That our Lord possessed such power while on earth is quite easily demonstrated. When a certain paralytic was brought to him, he said to the cripple, "Take heart, my son; your sins are forgiven" (Matt. 9:2). When the scribes who observed this act of mercy said among themselves that Christ was blaspheming, Jesus perceiving their thoughts said, "Which is easier, to say 'Your sins are forgiven,' or to say, 'Rise and walk'? But that you may know that the Son of man has authority on earth to forgive sins," he then said to the paralytic, "Rise, take up your bed and go home." When the crowds saw the man do this, they were afraid, and glorified God who had given such authority to men. Did the apostles have the same authority? Did the statement that they could remit sins, confer the ability to declare such sins remitted as was the case with Christ? If so, the New Testament is absolutely silent about it, and with no testimony on the matter, we can neither affirm nor believe it.

Since there are but three methods of forgiveness revealed in the New Testament, and since the apostles did not employ either of the first two, it is a compelling conclusion that our Savior referred to legislative forgiveness in His statement to them. This means that the apostles were to reveal a law, by compliance with which, the guilty sinner would receive actual forgiveness from God for sins committed. The apostle Paul declares, "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8:2). From this we learn that we are set free from sin by a law. "You who were once slaves of sin have become obedient from the heart to the standard of teaching to which you were committed, and, having been set free from sin, have become slaves of righteousness" (Rom. 6:17, 18). Freedom from sin is not obtained by an "absolvo te" pronounced by a priest but by obedience to the standard of teaching.

Rome has much to say about Peter. Let us notice the plan by which this apostle proposed remission of sins to the guilty ones on the day of Pentecost. When they demanded to know what to do, "Peter said to them, 'Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins'" (Acts 2:38). Here is the first announcement of the law by which forgiveness of sins may be secured. It is not by an exercise of sacerdotal authority, but by compliance with the terms specified by the apostle, speaking under the influence of the Spirit.

The priestly advocate quotes 2 Corinthians 5:18-20, to make it appear that the ministry of reconciliation is manifest in a sacerdotal power to absolve, but a close examination of the previous chapter will disclose that the apostles "having this ministry by the grace of God . . . by the open statement of truth we would commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (2 Cor. 4:1-3). It is by a statement of the truth, by the proclamation of the terms conveyed by heaven that the sins are remitted. No man possesses the authority to actually or declaratively forgive sins. The second pillar supporting the theory of a special priesthood is thus torn from its moorings. Surely that theory is built upon the sand. Now let us proceed to consideration of the third alleged support.

THIRD GREAT POWER

> The third great power which Christ conferred upon His priests is that of preaching the gospel with authority. While this is not so distinctively a sacerdotal power as that of celebrating Mass or of forgiving sins, it is nevertheless a mark of divine delegation which sets them off from the laity. This power of teaching in His name Christ conferred upon His first priests when He said to them: "Going, therefore, teach ye all nations . . . teaching them to observe all things, whatever I have commanded you. And, behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world" (Matt. 28:19, 20).
>
> The right of the priests to preach the gospel with authority entails upon the laity the correlative obligation in the following explicit manner: "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me." (Luke 10:16)

We have seen that such a "distinctively sacerdotal power as that of celebrating mass or of forgiving sins" was not conferred upon men as Rome teaches, and now we shall learn that "preaching the gospel with authority" is not "a mark of divine legislation which sets them (priests) off from the laity." In a previous chapter we have shown that all of God's people (laity) are a part of the royal priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9, 10). Instead of divine legislation setting priests apart from the laity, it was divine legislation which made no distinction. God made men and women; Satan made clergymen, and clergymen made laymen!

It is true that our Lord gave the commission to the apostles to "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations" (Matt. 28:19). The means of enrolling such students is found in the kindred statement, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to all creation" (Mark 16:15). God never commissions a man to do anything without either supernaturally qualifying him to do it, or providing a means by which he may qualify himself naturally to do it. It would be foolish to assume that God would commission a man to do that which was absolutely impossible to accomplish, then condemn him for not doing it. Since the apostles were directly commissioned to teach all nations, it was necessary that they be endued with the ability to speak in the language of every creature. That they were so qualified to be witnesses "unto the end of the earth" (Acts 1:8) is evident from the fact that on the day of their original proclamation, they "began to speak in other tongues" so that "devout men from every nation under heaven" each heard them speaking in his own language, or native dialect (Acts 2:4-8). No one can directly operate under "the great commission" today. This commission was given to "witnesses" (Luke 24:46-48). A witness is one who testifies to facts with which he is conversant. No one today can bear the testimony of these apostles. We can assert our faith in their testimony, and we may re-proclaim that which they testified, but their testimony was as peculiarly their own as their commission to announce it to the world. They fulfilled that commission and accomplished their task, consequently had no successors to their office.

The relationship of the apostles to the church was not personal but official, and in this relationship they were to continue to the end of the world. The office of apostles is still in the church, else it has no foundation. All Christians on earth, all members of the household of God are "built upon the foundation of the apostles, and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone" (Eph. 2:20). The apostles are even now in authority, for our Lord said, 'When the Son of man shall sit on his glorious throne, you who have followed me will also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:28). The apostles occupy the position of authority in the kingdom of Christ. "As my Father appointed a kingdom for me, so do I appoint for you that you may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Luke 21:28).

The commission was not given to the twelve as disciples, but apostles. They fulfilled it by announcing the terms of reconciliation to the entire world, then sealed their testimony with their blood. But there is a difference in the basis of persecution of an ordinary martyr and an apostle. The first dies because he believes what he has heard; the other because he knows what he has seen. Our Lord said to Paul, " I have appeared to you for this purpose, to appoint you to serve and bear witness to the things which you have seen, and to those in which I will appear to you" (Acts 26:16). When the apostles personally completed their work of giving to the world as ambassadors of the Great King, the terms of the treaty in full, the commission was accomplished. They have no successors in office, not simply because no one today can possess the miraculous powers which they needed to confirm their testimony, but because their work of apostleship was completed.

Men now must obtain faith through the testimony of the apostles, just as they did while the apostles were alive. If disputes arise in the congregations we must still "go up to consult the apostles" about the matter. Their revelation is still the criterion by which to measure every act of spiritual significance. Jesus is with them to the end of the age, by maintaining the authority of their teaching, while this world stands. It is true the men are dead but their authoritative teaching remains and we must continue as steadfastly "in the apostles' doctrine" today as on the birthday of the church. When the rich man in Hades besought Abraham to send Lazarus to warn his brothers lest they also come into torment, Abraham said, "They have Moses and the prophets: let them hear them" (Luke 16:29). Moses and the prophets had been dead for hundreds of years. In what sense did they have them? The reply must be in their authoritative utterances as recorded in the Old Covenant scriptures. In the same sense we have the apostles in their authoritative record of the New Covenant scriptures.

No one is an authoritative proclaimer today as were the apostles. The commission to the apostles is indivisibly connected with miraculous power. After Jesus upbraided the apostles "for their unbelief' (Mark 16:14) he gave them the commission to "Go into the whole world and preach the gospel to the whole creation." To strengthen them in the tremendous task involved he continues "And these signs will accompany those who believe: in my name they will cast out demons; they will speak in new tongues; they will pick up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing, it will not hurt them; they will lay hands on the sick; and they will recover." To prove that this was connected with the commission as given, the context shows that "they went forth and preached everywhere, while the Lord worked with them, and confirmed the message by the signs that attended it" (Mark 16:20). He who operates under authority of the great commission today, should be called upon for his miraculous credentials.

That Rome believes in miracles we do not deny, but that she does not believe that every parish priest possesses power to work miracles is evidenced from the lengthy examination she prosecutes to determine if "miracles" were performed as a prelude to canonization, and the few priests who are designated as saints. Those who claim to be successors to the apostles are convicted as usurpers. Every child of God has a divine right to reproclaim the good news; no one has a right to proclaim it authoritatively. This was reserved for the chosen ambassadors, the holy apostles, and their office has no successors because it was never abdicated. The statement "He that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me" was made to the twelve and to them alone. It has no application to a misguided assumptionist who today calls himself "father" in direct antithesis to the teaching of our blessed Lord.

Rise of the Hierarchy

Contents

Those who scan the labored attempts of the Roman scholastics to justify their system of priesthood cannot help observing how flimsy is the rational foundation for such a gigantic superstructure. Although affirming that it is based upon God's revelation in the New Covenant scriptures, the defendants must make forced applications of passages wrested from their context, and even then resort to a statement of probabilities. Far from proving that the special priesthood was ordained by Christ and his holy apostles, the chief appeal is to the so-called "fathers," many of whom lived long years this side of the apostles when "the mystery of lawlessness" which already worked in Paul's day, reached its fruition.

"DO YE THIS . . ."

> It seems most probable from the evidence afforded by the New Testament that Christ ordained the Apostles priests and empowered them to offer the Eucharistic Sacrifice with no special ceremony but with the simple words: "Do ye this in commemoration of me." Here, as in the case of many of the other sacraments, Christ after instituting the sacrament left it to His Church to determine the matter and form, the precise manner in which the sacrament was to be conferred upon subsequent recipients.
> This was apparently determined shortly after the sacrament was instituted. For St. Luke in the Acts of the Apostles and St. Paul in his epistles mention all the elements of the sacrament, namely, the external symbolic rite of the imposition of hands and prayer, the internal grace thus communicated, and the institution of the sacrament by Christ. Thus St. Luke writes: "These (the seven deacons) they set before the Apostles, and they praying, imposed hands upon them." (Acts 6:6) "Then they, fasting and praying, and imposing their hands upon them (Paul and Barnabas) sent them away." (13:3)

Paul and Barnabas ordained priests to carry on their ministry among colonies of newly converted Christians, while the two Apostles moved on to new fields. "And when they had ordained to them priests in every church, they commended them to the Lord, in whom they believed." (14:22) St. Paul warns Timothy that the sacrament of Orders is to be conferred only on those candidates who give every assurance of fitness for the holy priesthood, saying: "Impose not hands lightly upon any man." (1 Tim. 5:22).

The priest, in an attempt to justify his "sacrament of the holy orders" starts with the expression "it seems most probable." But it is neither probable nor possible that Christ ordained the apostles priests in the sense he refers to, for to do so would be to render ineffective the kingdom of priests, composed of all whose sins were washed away by his blood (Rev. 1:5, 6). We have already learned that the Lord's Supper is a festal observance, participated in by all of God's priests, and not a sacrifice offered by a special priesthood. The congregation was not left to determine "the precise manner in which the sacrament (of orders) was to be conferred," for the word of God knew nothing of any such "sacrament."

In Acts 6:6, the seven who were selected and appointed as deacons were already "priests of God." Paul and Barnabas were also "priests of God" and were merely given public recognition as having been chosen for a special evangelistic mission, as those who read of their subsequent journey will learn. When they again arrived in Antioch "where they had been commended to the grace of God for the work which they had fulfilled" (Acts 14:26) they gathered the church together and declared all that God had done with them.

Paul and Barnabas did not ordain priests in newly planted congregations. The original word which is mistranslated "priests" by the Roman Catholic version is the Greek "presbuteros" which literally means "an aged person." The word for priest is "hiereus." Nothing can be more palpably misleading than the deliberate translation of a word to justify a practice; thus changing the Bible to suit a human system, rather than changing such a system to suit the Bible. To prove this grave charge I cite the very book of Acts, from which Dr. O'Brien quotes.

There were both "priests" and "elders" among the Jews. Since Rome translates the word "presbuteros" (an aged man) by the term priests in Acts 14:22, what does she do when the words for both "priests" and "elders" occur in the same verse? Notice the Douay Version at Acts 5:23: "And being let go, they came to their own company, and related all that the chief priests (archiereis) and ancients (presbuteroi) had said to them." In Acts 23:14, the Douay Version reads: "Who came to the chief priests (archiereusin) and the ancients (presbuterois)." In Acts 25:15, "When I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests, and the ancients of the Jews, came unto me." Why did the translators from the Latin Vulgate not render the above by "chief priests and priests"? They knew it was obvious that there were both priests and elders among the Jews, and an arbitrary translation of priests for "presbuteros" would be easily detected. Therefore they translated it by the word "ancients," which can be and is used in both an official and non-official sense in the New Covenant scriptures. Why then did they not translate Acts 14:22 in conformity with their translation elsewhere, to read: "And when they had ordained to them ancients in every church, they commended them to the Lord in whom they believed"? Rome had to get her priestcraft, in, even if she violated all laws of interpretation and forfeited all claims to consistency. Of such fragile, fanciful tissue is the great fabric of priesthood woven.

In 1 Timothy 5:22, Paul says nothing about "the sacrament of Orders." He is not even dealing with the appointment of men to office. The entire context shows that the subject is discipline of unworthy elders and not appointment of worthy ones. Read 1 Timothy 5:19-22, where, after Timothy is instructed to admit no charge against an elder, except on evidence of two or three witnesses, he is told to "keep these rules without favor, doing nothing by partiality" and is instructed in connection therewith, "Do not be hasty in the laying on of hands, nor participate in other men's sins," which is but another way of saying, "Do not be hasty in administration of rebuke and discipline and lay yourself liable to a charge of rash judgment; neither be so slow as to be guilty of tolerating and condoning the sins of the guilty." One must not conclude that every time the expression "lay hands on" occurs, that it refers to ordination to office. It certainly does not convey that meaning in Acts 4:3, where the Jewish rulers came upon Peter and John "and they laid hands on them, and put them in prison until the next day."

MERE OFFICEHOLDERS

> Some non-Catholic writers have contended that the distinction between clergy and laity arose solely from the need of maintaining good order in the Church and that the priests were mere officeholders deriving their authority from the congregation. Such a contention is contradicted by the unanimous voice of Christian antiquity. From the earliest days we find express reference in the writings of the Fathers to bishops, priests and deacons, as indeed we do in the Acts of the Apostles and the epistles of St. Paul.
> St. Clement is explicit: "Christ is from God, and the Apostles from Christ. Preaching from city to city and throughout the country, the Apostles appointed their first converts, testing them by the Spirit, to be bishops and deacons for the future Christians." (Ad. Cor., 43:2). He administers a severe rebuke to the Christians of Corinth for daring "to dismiss from the ministry those who had been placed in office by the Apostles or their successors with the approval of the whole Church." (44:3).

Here is a non-Catholic writer who contends that there is no hint of a distinction between "clergy and laity" in the New Testament. The argument between Catholics and Protestants over the origin of the distinction is of no interest to one who is neither Catholic nor Protestant, but merely a humble Christian. We have before demonstrated that all of God's people (laity) are his clergy (lot or inheritance). The distinction between the two which now exists in both Catholicism and Protestantism is without divine warrant, and is one of the marks of those of whom our Lord spoke, "Their heart is far from me; in vain they do worship me, teaching as doctrines the precepts of men" (Matt. 15:8, 9). There is just as much scriptural authority for a pope as for a Protestant clergyman— and there is none!

That the "early fathers" may make reference to "bishops, priests and deacons," we will not deny, but that the grandfathers, the apostles, make any such distinction as Rome makes we emphatically deny. Nowhere in the Acts of Apostles, or in any of the writings of Paul, is the Greek term for priest, translated with any clerical bearing, as pertains to the Christian church. It is strange that Dr. O'Brien does not cite the passages in Acts or the Pauline epistles substantiating his claims.

The quotation from Clement does not prove what the priestly advocate wishes it to prove. Certainly the apostles appointed "bishops and deacons" in each congregation. But they did not appoint "bishops, priests, and deacons." The bishops were also called elders, pastors, presbyters, overseers, and shepherds. A plurality of such pastors were ordained in every congregation (Titus 1:5; Acts 14:23). The congregation at Philippi was composed of "saints with bishops and deacons" (Phil. 1:1). Clement shows that such officers were placed in office by the apostles, "with the approval of the whole church." This is one "father" that Rome should be very quiet about, for the things he writes are in exact opposition to those which Rome practices. Where is the authority of this quotation from Clement for one priest over each parish, and a bishop over a multitude of churches?

A HIERARCHY

> I have before me the citations of many early Fathers showing a clear recognition by the infant Church of the priesthood as a divinely established office, for the reception of which the sacrament of Orders was instituted. Space permits but the following one from St. Gregory of Nyssa (395) who reflects the mind of all the early writers. "The same power of the word," he says, "renders sublime and honorable the priest, who, by the newness of Ordination, has been singled out from the multitude; he who was yesterday one of the people suddenly becomes a commander, a presiding officer, a teacher of righteousness, and the dispenser of hidden mysteries." (Orat. in Rapt. Christi).
>
> The Council of Trent declares that there is in the Catholic Church a divinely established hierarchy of bishops, priests, and deacons, and that bishops are superior to priests and possess the power of confirming and ordaining. (Sess. 23. Canons 6, 7.) Since Christ established the priesthood as a permanent institution He certainly conferred upon some priests, namely, bishops, the power of communicating the priesthood to others. It is evident from the New Testament that the Apostles were bishops, for it depicts them frequently as ordaining, which is the function characteristic of bishops. The episcopate is the completion of the priesthood.

The citations given do not show a clear recognition "by the infant churches of the priesthood as a divinely established office." Only two authorities are quoted. The first is Gregory of Nyssa who lived 350 years after the church was established, and had already departed from its original pattern. A graduate of the catechetical school at Alexandria, he had absorbed the allegorical interpretations and bold speculations of Origen who was formerly head of the seminary. The quotation given does not show what the infant church thought, but represents the views current in the days of Gregory of Nyssa, long after the Nicene creed was written. If the priest wished to show what the infant church believed, why did he not quote from the New Testament scriptures? An infant that is 359 years old is quite a lusty youngster.

The second authority mentioned is the Council of Trent, which was convened by Pope Paul III in 1545, and after several disputes and adjournments, was again assembled by Pius IV, Jan. 8, 1562. Its twenty-five sessions constituted so many debates in which the decrees were passed by a majority of the delegates, of which the Italians were more numerous than all of the other nations together. The above citation from the twenty-third session of this group holds no authority for a Christian. We are interested in a "Thus saith the Lord," and not a decree of a human synod passed by a majority vote. The witnesses being worthless, the testimony offered relative to "A Hierarchy" is also worthless.

It is not evident from the New Testament that the apostles were bishops. Paul, who ordained elders, was not a bishop, for among the qualifications he lists as essential to a man desiring the office of a bishop, one requirement was that he be "the husband of one wife" (1 Tim. 3:2; Titus 1:6). Paul was not a married man (1 Cor. 7:8; 9:5). There is not one iota of proof that "the function characteristic of bishops" is ordaining. The word bishop means "an overseer, a superintendent." One might fulfill his function as a bishop and never ordain anyone. Dr. O'Brien is arguing from modern Catholicism backward, instead of from

New Testament Christianity forward. The Roman Catholic hierarchy is without a divine leg upon which to stand. It is a mushroom growth of an ecclesiastical seed, planted in hierarchical ambition, fertilized by superstition, and nurtured on pride.

SUPERIORITY OF EPISCOPATE

> St. Ignatius of Antioch (98-117) describes the three orders of bishops, priests and deacons, and points out clearly the divine origin of the episcopate and its superiority over the priesthood. "The college of presbyters," he writes, "adheres to the bishop as the strings to a lyre." (Ad Eph., 4:1) "Where the bishop is, there let the multitude (of believers) be; even as where Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church." (Ad Smyr., 8:2)

The so-called Apostolic Fathers are Clement, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp and Papias. Of these, Ignatius was the first to even suggest the idea of the Episcopate. Enroute to a martyr's death he is alleged to have written seven letters addressed to Ephesians, Magnesians, Trollians, Philadelphians, Smyrnaeans, Romans, and to Polycarp. The above quoted portions are from the first and fifth of these epistles. In addition to these, an excerpt from the letter to the Magnesians, reads, "Your bishop presides in the place of God, and your presbyters in the place of the assembly of the apostles. Ye are nothing without your bishop."

One is made to question why Ignatius is forced to go to such extravagant lengths in defending the office of the bishop. Is it because that office was a newly invented one, which the disciples were reluctant to recognize? Why did Ignatius not cite the teaching of the holy apostles to bolster his contention? The answer is that the apostolic writings know nothing of "the bishop."

Even so, there are several things which Rome might well consider in the writing of Ignatius. In spite of the fact that his letters indicate a well-defined deviation from apostolic teaching, it is noticeable that there is no trace of episcopal authority extending beyond a single community or congregation. The idea of a bishop over numerous churches, or a diocese, was not known as yet.

Neither does Ignatius rest the idea of episcopal authority on the same ground as that which Rome now attempts to defend it. The contention now is that the bishops are successors to the apostles, but Ignatius clearly assigned that status to the presbyters. Of the seven epistles acknowledged by Eusebius, there are two Greek recensions, a longer and shorter one, with the latter generally accepted as genuine. In both of them several glosses are apparent and it is evident they have suffered from alterations. To what extent they may be authentic is questionable, but in any event, they are not inspired and cannot be a true measure of God's plan for the congregations of saints.

CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY

> "Why don't priests marry?" is one of the questions most frequently asked by non-Catholics. The celibacy of the clergy is not a precept of the divine or natural law, nor a dogma of the Catholic Church. It is simply a disciplinary regulation of the Western Church, imposed with a view to the more effective discharge of the priestly duties and a closer approximation to the ideal of our great High Priest, Jesus Christ. "He that is without a wife," says St. Paul, "is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please God. But he that is with a wife is solicitous for the things of the world, how he may please his wife; and he is divided." (I Cor. 7:32, 33)
>
> During the first three centuries there was no law of the Church enforcing celibacy. Clement of Alexandria speaks of married priests and deacons, and the historian Socrates refers to a married episcopate in the Eastern Churches. To this day the secular clergy in the Greek Catholic Church, that is, the Church in communion with Rome, are married, though the bishops are celibates. In short, it is not a question of dogma, but solely of ecclesiastical discipline. On this particular point of discipline there exists a difference, between the Church of the West and that of the East, though both are united in the acceptance of the dogma proclaiming the divine origin of the priesthood.

Inasmuch as the above has nothing to do with the subject of the origin of special priesthood, it requires but little attention. It is plainly admitted that celibacy of the clergy is not a precept of divine or natural law, therefore it originated as an arbitrary regulation of the hierarchy. It needs to be remarked that on one hand Rome raises matrimony to the rank of "a sacrament"; then refuses it to her clergy. She first exalts it in a sense which He does not justify. It is still true that marriage is to be held "in honor among all" (Heb. 13:4), and that one symptom of apostasy is manifested "through the pretensions of liars whose consciences are seared, who forbid marriage and enjoin abstinence from foods" (1 Tim. 4:2, 3).

A SUBLIME OFFICE

Having presented the evidence from Scripture and the writings of the early Fathers as to the divine origin of the priesthood and its essential powers, let us now briefly consider the dignity of the office, and the benefits which accrue to human society from its exercise. The priest is singled out by God who chooses him to be His ambassador to men. The words which Christ addressed to the Apostles at the Last Supper may be applied to all His priests: "You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you; and have appointed you, that you should go, and should bring forth fruit; and your fruit should remain." (John, 15:16). It was this same divine teaching which St. Paul reechoed when he declared to the Hebrews: "Neither doth any man take the honor to himself, but he that is called by God, as Aaron was." (Heb. 5:4).

> The priest is called by God not only into the line of Aaron, into the tribe of Levi, into the family of Samuel, into the priesthood of Melchisedech, but into the discipleship of Jesus Christ. He is made a member of that goodly company of disciples whose sound has gone forth unto the ends of the earth. Throughout nineteen hundred years they have borne the teachings of the Divine Master into every race and every land from the frozen snows of the Arctic to the burning sands of the Sahara, and even unto the far distant shores washed by the waves of the Australasian seas.

We might well stop our review at this juncture seeing that the very first sentence of the above has been proven false. We have examined the evidence from Scripture and the early fathers, and found it not only inconclusive in sustaining Rome's postulate, but actually opposed to the idea of the divine origin of a special priesthood. Since the office exists without heavenly warrant it is a usurper in the religious realm, and can only do ultimate harm instead of good to society from its exercise.

No one living today is an ambassador of God, a minister plenipotentiary. The words which Christ spoke to his chosen ambassadors as apostles apply to no other persons. That which he spoke to them as disciples may apply to all disciples as such, but the apostolic commission and regulations apply exclusively to eye witnesses of Jesus Christ, which the priests today cannot possibly be. The statement of Paul in Hebrews 5:4 which the writer quotes, has direct reference to our Lord, as the following verse indicates, "So also Christ did not exalt himself to be made a high priest but was appointed by him" (i.e. God). The God of heaven did not appoint parish priests as he selected Aaron and Christ.

Perhaps no greater collection of Romish trivia could be found in the same space than that which asserts the Catholic priests are "called into the line of Aaron, into the tribe of Levi, into the family of Samuel, into the priesthood of Melchisedech, into the discipleship of Jesus Christ." It is evident that those who are in the "tribe of Levi" cannot serve God under the Christian dispensation as special priests, because there has been "a change in the priesthood, and necessarily a change in the law as well" (Heb. 7:12). Our Lord who was of the order of Melchizedek was not of the line of Aaron, the tribe of Levi, or of the family of Samuel. "For the one of whom these things are spoken belonged to another tribe, from which no one has ever served at the altar. For it is evident that our Lord was descended from Judah, and in connection with that tribe Moses said nothing about priests" (Heb. 7:13, 14).

Now in order to have their robes, incense, holy water, anointing oil and unbloody sacrifices, the Romish priests have to claim "the line of Aaron, and the tribe of Levi." But if they do that, they must give up the priesthood of Melchizedek (Heb. 7:11). If they claim the priesthood of Melchizedek they must surrender all of their pomp, pageantry and ritual, for these belong to the Levitical priesthood. They cannot claim to be members of both for if so they have no connection with our high priest, seeing He was not of the line of Aaron, or the tribe of Levi. The whole truth is that the Romish priests are neither of Levi nor Melchizedek, but represent spiritual parasites, fungus growths upon the religious world. The desperate attempt to find scriptural justification for the existence of this ignoble hierarchy must end in despair.

The Power to Pardon

Contents

It is possible for a priest in the great religio-politico institution designated the Roman Catholic Church to utter words of truth. He may have an unscriptural motive in his statement, or he may intend an application foreign to that conveyed by his words, but the statement as made may be factual. A good example is the following:

CHRIST IS WITH THEM

> "Behold!" said Christ, "I am with you all days even to the consummation of the world." With these words echoing in their ears, the Apostles went out into the countries of the then known world, preaching the gospel fearlessly to every creature. They quailed not before the lions in the Roman arena, nor before the pitch and tar with which they were to be burned alive to illumine the gladiatorial contests of the Romans. Why? Because they realized that they were speaking not in their own names, but in the name of Jesus Christ. Because they realized that they were His divinely appointed ambassadors, clothed by the Master with plenipotentiary power to speak and teach in His name. That is why St. Paul was able to say with truth: "Let a man so regard us as ministers of Christ and dispensers of the mysteries of God." (I Cor. 4:1).

The paragraph as quoted is absolutely correct, but the application to a modern priestcraft is not correct. We endorse the statement just as it stands, because it is proven to be true by both the word of the Lord and history. But the Romish priests are not the successors of the apostles and any attempted application of the statement to them is delusive and deceptive.

POWER OF PARDONING

> The second great power of the priestly office is that of pardoning. When the priest raises aloft his right hand and pronounces the words of pardon over the sinner in the tribunal of confession, the shackles are torn from the soul of the penitent. The priest pardons as effectively as if the words fell from the lips of Christ. It is a power which transcends that of kings and emperors. The power of kings is over the bodies of men. But they stand impotent before the kingdom of the soul. The hand of the priest reaches up beyond the horizon of the sky, and with golden keys unlocks the treasury of God's mercy and forgiveness and applies them to the souls of men.
>
> The priest preserves inviolate the secrecy of the confessional even at the cost of life itself. Under no circumstances does he ever reveal the slightest imperfection breathed into his ear in confession.

The theory of Rome is that the secret confessional is a court of justice, over which the priest presides as jurist, jury, attorney and executioner. To this court the penitent comes, discloses his acts and receives his sentence, or pronouncement of innocence.

Bossuet, the Bishop of Meaux, in his Exposition, page 33, said: "We believe that Jesus Christ has been pleased that those who have submitted themselves to the government of the Church by baptism, and who have since violated the laws of the Gospel, should come and submit themselves to the judgment of the same Church, in the tribunal of penance, where she exercises the power which is given her, of remitting and retaining sins (Matt. 18:18, John 20:23). . . . This penitential court of justice being so necessary a curb to licentiousness— so plentiful a source of wise admonition— so sensible a consolation of souls afflicted by their sins, when their absolution is not only declared in general terms, but when they are in reality absolved by the authority of Jesus Christ, after a particular examination and knowledge of the case."

This Catholic authority states that there is a tribunal of penance, that it constitutes a court of justice, that here violators submit to the judgment of the church, and absolution is granted by the authority of Christ, and such absolution is given only after examination of the case. Thus, each parish priest is judge and jury, and from his decision no appeal can be made. He is a local priest but the supreme court.

To sustain our statement we quote from Grounds of Catholic Doctrine, page 22: "Christ has made the pastors of His Church His judges in the court of conscience, with commission and authority to bind or loose, to forgive or to retain sins, to the merits of the cause and the disposition of the penitents. Now, as no judge can pass sentence without having a full knowledge of the cause, which cannot be had in this kind of causes which regards men's consciences, but by their own confession, it clearly follows, that He who has made the pastors of the Church the judges of men's consciences, has also laid an obligation upon the faithful to lay open the state of their consciences to them, if they hope to have their sins remitted."

The confession booth is thus a secret court in which a man probes the conscience of another and passes sentence upon the victim of error. Such a thing is unknown to the Holy Scriptures. But what passages are twisted and wrested to uphold auricular confession?

One is James 5:16, about which Grounds of Catholic Doctrine has this to say: "'Confess therefore your sins one to another,' that is to the priests or elders of the church, whom the apostles ordered to be called for (verse 14)." An examination of the passage does not prove what Rome would like for it to prove. It is against auricular confession to a priest. In the first place, the elders are not priests in an official sense. After James gave instruction to call the elders in under certain circumstances, he does not say to confess your sins unto them, but rather, "Confess your sins one to another, and pray for one another." When one disciple of the Lord confesses his sin to another, it is one of God's priests confessing his error to another of God's priests, but the confession is mutual, just as the prayers are to be.

Another passage cited by Rome is Acts 19:18: "Many also of those who were now believers came, confessing and divulging their practices." Instead of this being a secret confession whispered in privacy in a secluded booth, it was an open acknowledgment of practices which had previously been indulged, but which were now discovered to be in contravention of divine precepts. That this is true, is further suggested by the next verse which says, "And a number of those who practiced magical arts brought their books together and burned them in *the sight of all." Every text which Rome adduces for her confessional will be found under close scrutiny to apply to public confession and not to private or secret confession to a human tribunal.

The statement, "The priest pardons as effectively as if the words fell from the lips of Christ" borders upon blasphemy. It is a pretentious, proud and arrogant assertion, but it is without any authority from God. Nowhere do the holy apostles ever hint at such a tribunal as that about which Rome prates. When the incestuous member at Corinth was determined to be guilty, the whole congregation when assembled, acted upon his case; when he repented the whole congregation was instructed to forgive and comfort him. But their forgiveness was for the reproach brought upon the congregation, and consisted of a remission of their own censure as evidenced in the act of formal exclusion from the group. Fornication is a sin against God and can only be forgiven by God. But, if auricular confession was the means of obtaining pardon, why did Paul not advise this both to the congregation and the penitent? If the apostles had such power, why did they not once refer to it? John declares, "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous" (1 John 2:1). He does not say, "If any man sin, we have a judicial tribunal in which one may confess and receive absolution."

The hand of a priest can reach no higher than that of any humble supplicant. He has no golden key that is not afforded unto all alike. Every child of God is invited to "Have confidence to enter the sanctuary by the blood of Jesus, by the new and living way which He opened for us through the curtain of His flesh, and since we have a great high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with true heart in full assurance of faith, with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:19-22). The golden key belongs to every immersed believer, for every such person is "a priest of God." Any special priest who claims exclusive right to unlock the treasury of God is a usurper and a pretentious despoiler of God's citizenry.

SEAL OF CONFESSION

> The sacrifice which every Catholic priest stands ready to make to preserve this trust inviolate is illustrated by the following historical incident. In 1899 Father Dumoulin, a French priest, was charged with the crime of murder. The sexton had murdered and robbed a wealthy woman. To throw suspicion from himself he dipped the smoking revolver in the woman's blood and placed it in Father Dumoulin's room. Then to seal the lips of the priest, he went to confession to Father Dumoulin, accusing himself of the murder.
> Circumstantial evidence pointed to the priest. Knowing how secure he was behind the sacramental seal, knowing that the priest could not open those lips to reveal the guilty person even to save his own life, the sexton gave testimony convicting the priest. He was given a life sentence worse than death— life imprisonment at hard labor on Devil's Island under the tropical sun, whither France sends her worst criminals. Suffering the loss of his good name, the ostracism of his friends and a public ignominy that was more painful than death itself, Father Dumoulin, like the good priest that he was, remained faithful to his trust.

For twenty-five years he toiled under the burning rays of the tropical sun among the outcasts of mankind, guarding ever the secret in his bosom. In those twenty-five years he saw his mother die of a broken heart, carrying to her grave the blight of her son's imprisonment. Twenty-five years of grinding convict toil had left him with grey hairs, a face deep lined, a body broken and bent, on the edge of the grave.

CLEARED AFTER 25 YEARS

In a wretched hovel in a slum district in Paris a man lying on a bare cot is calling hysterically for a priest before he dies. As the priest enters, he shouts aloud: "I am guilty of the murder for which Father Dumoulin was condemned. I sealed his lips with confession and threw the guilt on him." Unwilling to face his God with that foul crime upon his soul, he seeks forgiveness through the very agency of confession whose inviolable secrecy he perverted to convict an innocent priest.

What a tardy retribution that could not undo those twenty-five years of mental torture, that could not recall the dead from their graves, nor reveal to them his innocence. And yet that is precisely what every priest in Christendom would willingly undergo rather than reveal the tiniest venial sin breathed into his car in confession. Such is the absolute, impenetrable and inviolable secrecy with which a priest guards the contents of every confession.

This purely prejudicial material has not one thing to do with the issue. The title of the booklet by Dr. O'Brien is "The Priesthood: A Divine Institution." Does the fact that a priest refuses to reveal secrets breathed into his ear prove that the priesthood of Roman Catholicism is divinely ordained? Does it prove that auricular confession is an institution of heaven? Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, the condemned Communistic traitors, went to their death without revealing a single secret concerning their conspirators. Would this prove that Communism is a divine institution?

Can that be a divine institution which prompts men to lie and even do so under a solemn oath? Yet "the seal of confession" does just that. This is proven by an excerpt from the work of Rev. Peter Dens, D.D., on "*The Nature of Confession and Obligation of the Seal," as translated by the monk of La Trappe, E. Zosinius. At a meeting of the Roman Catholic prelates in Ireland, held on September 14, 1808, it was agreed that Dens' "Complete Body of Theology" was the best book extant on the subject. Let us note these quotations from it.

"What is the seal of sacramental confession?"

Answer: "It is the obligation or duty of concealing those things which are learned from sacramental confession."

"Can a case be given in which it is lawful to break the sacramental seal?"

Answer: "It cannot, though life be forfeited, or a commonwealth be destroyed."

"What answer, then, ought a confessor to give when questioned concerning a truth which he knows from sacramental confession only?"

Answer: "He ought to answer, that he does not know it, and, if it be necessary, to confirm the same with an oath."

To deliberately falsify, and then to ask God to witness the lie as truth is certainly taking His name in vain. Yet we are asked to believe that such a system is heroic, courageous and commendatory. But the whole truth is that "the seal" can be broken. Liguori, the famed Catholic historian, quoted so frequently by Alexander Campbell in his debate with Right Rev. John B. Purcell, Bishop of Cincinnati, declares that "the seal" must not be broken lest the confession be rendered odious, but he also says that the confessor may secure licence of the penitent, and that such licence may be granted in writing or orally. Since the Roman Catholic is taught to regard the priest as God in the confessional, it is evident that to refuse to submit to a demand for such licence would be to fight against God, in his superstitious mind.

The writer mentions "the sacrifice which every Catholic priest stands ready to make to preserve the trust inviolate." Such a sacrifice does not prove that the truth itself is worthy. It may demonstrate the belief of the priest in his trust, and even show the consistency with which he views it, but that still does not establish the righteousness of the trust. The fact that a man is willing to die for a thing, does not prove the thing itself is true, although it may demonstrate that he believes it to be so. Men, like Horatius, might die as willingly for pagan gods, as Christians would for the true and living God.

"Then outspake brave Horatius,

The captain of the gate:

To every man upon this earth

Death cometh soon or late.

And how can man die better

Than facing fearful odds

For the ashes of his fathers

And the temples of his gods?"

No account of suffering upon the part of a priest can establish the scripturality of auricular confession. It is a miserable imposture spawned during the darkest days of the world and religion, when the sun of intellect hid her face because of the pollutions of a profligate priesthood. It became a dogma and an obligatory practice of the Roman Church at the Lateran Council, in 1215 A.D., under Pope Innocent III. Not one trace of it, as a dogma, can be found prior to that year.

St. John Chrysostom, from whose celebrated works, Rome loves to quote, said in his homily on Psalm 50: "We do not request you to go confess your sins to any of your fellow-men, but only God."

In his Homily V, De incomprehensibili De natura, Vol. 1, he says: "Therefore I beseech you, always confess your sins to God! I, in no way, ask you to confess them to me. To God alone should you expose the wounds of your soul and from Him alone expect the cure. Go to Him, then, and you shall not be cast off, but healed. For, before you utter a single word, God knows your prayer."

It is questionable whether the priest undergoes any more mental torture than that which is suffered by a refined and modest woman who must be subjected to questioning and prodding relative to her innermost thoughts, and who is forced to disclose to a bachelor, the most intimate feelings she may not even mention to her own husband. The confessional box is a throne of priestly control where a man sits who has his finger on the pulsing heart and throbbing conscience of every member of a domestic circle, and who claims the very authority of God in releasing or retaining sins.

The Power to Consecrate

Contents

It is in her claim that the priest has the power to consecrate, that Rome indulges in the language of blasphemy, claiming that the priest is equal in power to our Lord and speaks in the very voice of God. "Consecration" as Rome uses the term has to do with the alleged power to transmute the elements of bread and fruit of the vine into the actual body and blood of our Lord.

The Council of Trent declared: "By the consecration of the bread and wine a change is wrought of the bread's whole substance into the substance of Christ our Lord's body, and of the wine's whole substance into the substance of His blood, which change has been by the Holy Catholic Church suitably and properly called Transubstantiation" (Session 13, Chapter 4).

In explanation of this language, Rome says: "By the substance of bread we mean its very essence, that internal, invisible something which, itself devoid of color, shape, weight, taste, etc. supports the qualities or accidents which are perceived by the senses. Transubstantiation therefore, means that when Jesus Christ, at the Last Supper, pronounced the words, 'This is my body; this is my blood,' the Son of God by His omnipotent power transubstantiated or changed, the substance of the bread and wine into His living flesh; so that no bread or wine whatsoever remained, but Himself, body, blood, soul and divinity, under their appearances. So in like manner, every day at Mass, the priest, acting in the name of Christ pronounces the same words, and God effects the same change" (The Question Box, Conway, page 417).

POWER OF CONSECRATION

> The third great power of the priestly office is the climax of all. It is the power of consecrating. "No act is greater," says St. Thomas "than the consecration of the sacred body of Christ." In this essential phase of the sacred ministry, the power of the priest is not surpassed by that of the bishop, the archbishop, the cardinal or the pope. Indeed it is equal to that of Jesus Christ. For in this role the priest speaks with the voice and authority of God himself.

Since it is affirmed that this is a great power belonging to the priestly office, and that it represents the grand climax of all sacerdotal demonstrations, it will be in order for us to investigate it to the extent our limited space will allow. Rome not only teaches that the bread is the real body of our Lord and the cup is His real blood, but she demands under threat of anathema that her superstitious followers also believe that each particle of bread when separated, and each drop of the wine, is in itself the entire Christ.

The Council of Trent says: "Canon 3:— If any one shall deny that the venerated sacrament of the Eucharist, entire Christ is contained in each kind, and in each several particles of either kind, when separated, let him be accursed." If the consecrated bread became divided into ten thousand crumbs, each crumb would in and of itself be the entire Christ or if the consecrated fruit of the vine became separated into uncounted drops, each drop would be the entire Christ.

And if this were not too much for those who were nurtured on the pap of gullibility and blind credulity, the Catholic must also believe that he crunches between his teeth the very bones and nerves of the Son of Man. "Not only the true body of Christ, and whatever appertains to the true mode of existence of a body, and the bones and nerves, but also that entire Christ is contained in the sacrament."

Upon what foundation does this monstrous fabrication, with all of its ramifications, find rest? Upon the simple words of our Master, "This is my body; this is my blood," and the instruction, "Do this in memory of me." How did the apostles understand these words? They were all Jews, who knew it was contrary to the law to drink the blood of animals, much more human blood. They were rigorous in their observance of the law with reference to eating the flesh of only certain kinds of animals. They would have abhorred the very idea of cannibalism, the eating of human flesh, bones and veins. Yet, not a word escaped their lips upon this night. The impetuous Peter asked no question about the Lord's statement. Surely they knew that the living and real Christ was giving them only a memorial consisting of two elements. They did not believe that the living Christ took His literal body, and dividing it into the numerous parts, made of each a literal and entire Christ.

Can the words upon which Rome stakes so much, be understood figuratively? If I hand you a photograph saying, "This is my mother," do you conclude that I mean that the piece of sensitized photographic paper is my mother in a literal sense? If I walk through a public park with a friend, and he points to a statute, saying, "This is George Washington," do I suppose that he means the piece of bronze is the literal general of the Revolutionary Army? Did Jesus ever use symbolic language with reference to himself? He said, "I am the vine" (John 15:1). Shall we conclude that he was transmuted into a grapevine, and that each twig when separate was the entire Christ? He said, "I am the door" (John 10:9). Did he infer that he was a literal door?

Even Rome has difficulty in explaining her position, insomuch that some of her outstanding scholars recognize the problem. The Catholic bishop, Tonstal, admitted: "Of the manner and means of the real presence, how it might be either by transubstantiation or otherwise, perhaps it had been better to leave any one, who would be curious, to his own opinion, as before the Council of Lateran it was left" (The Eucharist, Book 1, page 46).

Cardinal de Alliaco said: "That manner and meaning which supposeth the substance of bread to remain, is possible; neither is it contrary to reason, nor to the authority of the Scriptures, nay it is more easy and more reasonable to conceive, if it could only accord with the Church."

The very language of the apostle detailing the observance of the feast, proves that it is a memorial for one who is absent, and not a recognition of the bodily presence of that person. The expression, "Do this in remembrance of me" surely points to the fact that the one thus commemorated is not present. Why should one do something in remembrance of Jesus, if the real Christ is present in body, blood, bones and nerves? Moreover, we are told that in eating and drinking, we "proclaim the Lord's death *until he comes." Does this not indicate that He has not already literally come? If the real Christ is upon the altar, and visible to the communicants, as Rome teaches, how can the priest explain the term "until he comes"?

In the very same connection which Rome declares Jesus consecrated the bread and wine by saying, "This is my body; this is my blood," He also took the cup saying, "This cup *is the new testament." He did not say that it represented or adumbrated the new testament. He said it was the new testament. Is this to be taken literally? Rome does not believe so. She accepts it as a figure of speech. By the same identical reasoning, we accept what our Lord said about the bread and fruit of the vine figuratively.

The host (bread) is made of wheat flour and water and is unleavened. It is baked with heat. Rome teaches that when the priest utters the words "Hoc est corpus meum" this unleavened bread is converted into the real Christ. Thus a god is produced by the work of men's hands, and men bow and acknowledge the host is "God over all" when it is elevated by the priest. This is contrary to the revelation of God, which amply shows that nothing can become God which is made with men's hands. Demetrius said, "You see and hear that not only at Ephesus but almost throughout all Asia this Paul has persuaded and turned away a considerable company of people, saying that gods made with hands are not gods" (Acts 19:26).

The prophet Isaiah condemns those who "bow down to the work of their hands, to what their own fingers have made" (2:8). The sweet psalmist of Israel declared,

"The idols of the nations are silver and gold,

The work of men's hands" (Psalm 135:15).

The Romish priest cannot deny that the wafer which he presumes to consecrate is made by the hands of men, and that he teaches that it is converted into very Christ and is worshipped as God.

> When the priest pronounces the tremendous words of consecration, he reaches up into the heavens, brings Christ down from his throne, and places Him upon our altar to be offered up again as the victim for the sins of man. It is greater power than that of monarchs and potentates. It is greater than that of saints and angels, greater than that of Seraphim and Cherubim. Indeed it is greater even than the power of the Virgin Mary. For, while the Blessed Virgin was the human agency by which Christ became incarnate a single time, the priest brings Christ down from Heaven, and renders Him incarnate on the altar as the eternal Victim for the sins of man— not once but a thousand times! The priest speaks and lo! Christ, the eternal and omnipotent God, bows His head in humble obedience to the priest's command.

The above paragraph is a positive denial of the truth as revealed in God's Word. It is a clear demonstration of the extent to which a boastful priestcraft will go to delude and deceive a superstitious following. Let us note the fallacious reasoning in the boastful assertions.

Does the priest "reach up into the heavens, and bring Christ down from His throne?" The inspired apostle declares, "The righteousness based on faith says, Do you say in your heart, 'Who will ascend into heaven?' (that is to bring Christ down)" (Rom. 10:6). Surely, according to Roman Catholic admission, they do not have the righteousness which is based on faith. Jesus was elevated to His throne by the power of God. Shall he be removed from it by the power of men? "We have such a high priest, one who is seated at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in heaven" (Heb. 8:1). Now Christ cannot be on His throne, if he is brought "from His throne" by every Catholic priest; He cannot be in heaven if He is "brought down" by one who "reaches up into the heavens." But since our "hope that enters into the inner shrine behind the curtain, where Jesus has gone as a forerunner on our behalf" (Heb. 6:19, 20) is predicated upon His remaining "exalted above the heavens" (Heb. 7:26) no Roman Catholic can have the hope of eternal life during the time that the priest is "consecrating the Eucharist."

Can the priest place Christ "upon an altar to be offered again as the victim for the sins of men?" We answer in an emphatic negative. Such a preposterous theory gives the lie to the whole plan of God. To justify her special priesthood, Rome has to run counter to the divine scheme of the ages. Jesus Christ is no longer "a victim for the sins of man." "He has no need, like those high priests, to offer up sacrifices daily, first for his own sins and then for those of the people; he did this once for all when he offered up himself" (Heb. 7:27). Christ is not a daily victim; He does not have to suffer repeatedly. He does not require to be sacrificed daily for sins. "Nor was it to offer himself repeatedly, as the high priest enters the Holy Place yearly with the blood not his own; for then he would have had to suffer repeatedly since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself" (Heb. 9:25, 26).

Notice the word "again" in the priestly language which says, Christ is "offered up again as the victim for the sins of man." Here is a good place to hinge the controversy between the false claims of Rome and the truth of heaven. Roman Catholicism teaches that Jesus must be offered again— "not once but a thousand times." The Bible says, "But when Christ had offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God, then to wait until his enemies should be made a stool for his feet. For by a single offering he has perfected for all time those who are sanctified" (Heb. 10:12-14). Rome says "again"; the Bible say "only once." Rome says "a thousand times"; the Bible says "a single sacrifice for all times."

The boasted power over monarchs, potentates, saints and angels, is nothing but a myth, a fictitious fancy of a fertile, ingenious priestcraft, to make serfs and vassals of their fellowmen. "Priestcraft in all ages and all nations has been the same; its nature is one and that nature is essentially evil; its object is self-gratification and self-aggrandizement; the means it uses— the basest frauds, the most shameless delusions, practiced on the popular mind for the acquisition of power; and that power once gained, the most fierce and bloody exercise of it, in order to render it at once lawful and perpetual. Nothing is so servilely mean in weakness, so daring in assumption, so arrogant in command: earth, Heaven, the very throne and existence of God himself, being used as but the tools of its designs, and appealed to with horrible impudence in the most shameless of its lies." (History of Priestcraft in All Ages and Nations, by William Howitt, pages 14, 15).

Does Christ "bow His head in humble obedience to the priest's command"? Such insolence should cause every humble member of the Roman Catholic Church to tremble in every fiber at the thought of upholding such a blasphemous institution. God raised Christ from the dead "and made him sit at his right hand in the heavenly places, far above all rule and authority and power and dominion, and above every name that is named, not only in this age but also in that which is to come; and he has put all things under his feet and has made him head over all things for the church" (Eph. 1:20-22). Our Lord bows His head at the command of no man. He is the Commander, not the commanded. He is not to humbly obey the dictates of any man, but all men must humbly obey His dictates.

The sacrifice of our Lord has been made. It cannot be repeated. Once He was crucified; now He is glorified. Once He was humiliated; now He is exalted. He cannot be humiliated again. "Being found in human form He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (Phil. 2:8, 9). The idea that a man on earth can reach up to heaven and take Jesus from His throne, and once more debase Him as a victim for sins, is horrifying to one who really believes in God. Truly it can be said, "They then commit apostasy, since they crucify the Son of God on their own account and hold him up to contempt" (Heb. 6:6).

The Roman Missal says, "If the priest vomit the Eucharist, if the species appear entire, let them be reverently swallowed, unless sickness arise: for then let the consecrated species be cautiously separated and laid up in some sacred place, till they are corrupted; and afterwards let them be cast into the sacrarium" (Roman Missal, Mechlin, 1840). If you remember that the Romish teaching is that the consecrated bread is entire Christ, the abominable thought that Christ may be vomited up by a priest, who must thereupon rescue Him from the vomit and swallow Him again, unless nausea results, whereupon the entire Christ is to be fished out of the mess and laid up until corrupted, should be enough to turn the stomachs of all believers. Even the Pagan Roman soldiers did not subject the body of God's Son to more profane treatment than that required of the Romish priests.

As a further degradation, the common members of the Catholic Church were given the prayer which follows: "May thy body, O Lord, which I have received, and thy blood which I have drunk, cleave to my bowels, and grant that no stain of sin remain in me, who have been fed with this pure and holy sacrament. Who liveth and reigneth forever and ever. Amen." Is it possible that the literal body of our Lord should cling to the bowels of a man on earth, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth?

> Of what sublime dignity is the office of the Christian priest who is thus privileged to act as the ambassador and the vicegerent of Christ on earth. He continues the essential ministry of Christ— he teaches the faithful with the authority of Christ, he pardons the penitent sinner with the power of Christ, he offers up again the same sacrifice of adoration and atonement which Christ offered on Calvary. No wonder that the name which spiritual writers are especially fond of applying to the priest is that of "alter Christus." For the priest is and should be another Christ. The priesthood is a sublime ministry, more meet for angels than for weak and sinful men. Truly indeed did Isaiah proclaim with prophetic insight six hundred years before Christ the grandeur of the Christian priesthood in these inspired words: "How beautiful on the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings and that preacheth peace; of him that showeth forth good, that preacheth salvation, that saith to Sion: Thy God shall reign" (Isaiah 52:7).

We have shown by indisputable testimony that Romish priests are not ambassadors or vicegerents of Christ. We have established it as factual that they are not authoritative teachers, they cannot pardon sinners, and cannot offer up the sacrifice of Christ. These are the foundations of the hierarchical priestcraft, and we have swept them all away. Any power claimed by the priests on the basis of the Catholic contention is usurpation, and without divine warrant. Every child of God is a priest. Any person claiming special sacerdotal powers is a religious counterfeiter.

The priest is not "alter Christus"— another Christ. There is one Christ. "Then if any one says to you 'Lo, here is the Christ!' or 'There he is!' do not believe it. For false Christs and false prophets will arise and show great signs and wonders, so as to lead you astray, if possible, even the elect" (Matt. 24:23, 24). "For although there may be so-called gods in heaven or on earth — as indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords'— yet for us there is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist, and one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom are all things and through whom we exist" (1 Cor. 8:5, 6).

The apostle speaks of rebellion in which "the man of lawlessness is revealed, the son of perdition, who opposes and exalts himself against every so-called god or object of worship, so that he takes his seat in the temple of God, proclaiming himself to be God" (2 Thess. 2:3, 4). We deny that the priest is and should be "another Christ." This is the language of apostasy, a part of the bold effrontery with which men are silenced and the voice of conscience is stricken dumb. The words of Isaiah were not spoken of a covetous, pretentious and ambitious clergy, but of humble preachers of the gospel as shown by the fulfillment in Romans 10:14, 15. This is but another sample of the twisting of God's Word to justify an unholy and ungodly system by which men are exploited for gain.

Priesthood and Worship

Contents

It is the position of Rome that worship to God must be dependent upon a special clergy. This negates the purpose of God as respects the Christian dispensation, and takes the world back to the shadowy representations of the Jewish dispensation. It belongs to the "weak and beggarly elemental spirits" which enslave men (Gal. 4:9) and from which we were freed by Him who was "born of woman, born under the law."

ALTAR AND PRIEST

> Is it not apparent to every person, regardless of religious affiliation, who has followed this discussion with an open mind, that the Christian priesthood is an institution founded by Jesus Christ whereby men receive the power and authority to preach the gospel, to reconcile sinners and to offer sacrifice to the Most High? When Luther discarded the office of the priesthood, the confessional as a tribunal for the reconciliation of sinners and the altar with its august Sacrifice of the Mass disappeared. Now in the churches of our separated brethren there remain but the four bare walls and a pulpit. While the highest element of worship, the offering of sacrifice has completely vanished, even the other elements of worship are fast disappearing. Listen to the words addressed by Dr. Edmund S. Conklin to the ministers of our country: "After no small amount of observation, reading, and careful inquiry, I am forced to the conclusion that worship as a religious exercise is disappearing from Protestant Churches." (The Disappearance of Worship, The Christian Century, July 11, 1934).

Is it not apparent that this decay of worship in the Churches of our non-Catholic friends is due primarily to their abandonment of the priestly office? Is it not also apparent that the great decline in church attendance deplored by ministers throughout the country is traceable to the discarding of the priesthood and the consequent disappearance of sacrifice and worship? More and more such churches are ceasing to be temples for the worship of God and are becoming lecture halls for the discussion of political, social and economic problems. But man does not live by bread alone. In the unfathomable depths of his nature, he strives now, as in the days of Cain and Abel and of Melchisedech, to offer sacrifice and worship to his God and Maker. Deep still calleth unto deep.

In the priesthood of the Catholic Church he will find a divinely established agency, through which that deep and ineradicable hunger of his nature will find adequate satisfaction. In that Church the searcher after truth will find not only preaching and prayer and the singing of hymns, but more than that— altar and priest, worship and sacrifice. For in the memory of the priest within that Church there echo the solemn words addressed by Jesus Christ to His first priests, the Apostles, at the Last Supper: "Do ye this in commemoration of me." In faithful compliance with that divine command, the priest offers up each day in all the countries of the world the august Sacrifice of the Mass saying the words of the psalmist: "I will take the chalice of salvation and I will call upon the name of the Lord."

We are sure that if the Romish priest could make mere assertion to act as positive proof his arguments would sound weighty and convincing. However, it must now be apparent to every person regardless of religious affiliation, that Jesus Christ founded no special priesthood possessed of the powers which are claimed by the hierarchy. On the contrary even Roman Catholics who are honest, if they were permitted to read our dissertation, would conclude that the priesthood which lords it over their minds does so with no trace of scriptural warrant.

Men need not depend upon a clergy for power and authority to preach the gospel. This is an inalienable right of every citizen of the kingdom of priests. Rome claims that the apostles were the first priests and were so constituted to enable them to preach the gospel. But in Acts 8:1, we read that "a great persecution arose against the church in Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad throughout the region of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles." Verse 4 declares, "Now those who were scattered abroad went about preaching the word." If they were all scattered except the apostles, and it was those who were scattered who did the preaching, then it appears that "preaching the word" is the duty of every disciple.

The apostles did not forbid this preaching by others or claim an exclusive right to do it. Instead "when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent to them Peter and John." These two merely commended and confirmed the preaching done by non-apostolic labor. Nor can we help remarking that Peter did not do the sending. He was one of two men "sent by the apostles." Where is the vaunted papal authority about which Rome boasts for the "see of Peter"?

Again it is said, "Those who were scattered because of the persecution that arose over Stephen traveled as far as Phenicia and Antioch speaking the word to none except the Jews. But there were some of them, men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who on coming to Antioch spoke to the Greeks also, preaching the Lord Jesus. And the hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number that believed turned to the Lord" (Acts 11:19-21). When news of this came to the ears of the Church in Jerusalem, they sent Barnabas to Antioch, not to forbid them to preach, for

"when he came and saw the grace of God, he was glad; and he exhorted them all to remain faithful to the Lord with steadfast purpose." The proclamation of the gospel message is not the right of an exclusive caste. "Let him that heareth, say, Come."

Martin Luther did not discard the office of priesthood. He merely restored the scriptural idea regarding it, and assayed to give it to its rightful owners. Luther declared, "It has been said that the pope, the bishops, the priests, and all those who people the covenants form the spiritual or ecclesiastical state; and that the princes, the nobility, the citizens, and peasants, form the secular or lay estate. This is a fine story. Let no persons, however, be startled at it. All Christians belong to the spiritual estate, and there is no other difference between them than that arising from the function which they discharge. We have all one baptism, one faith; and this it is which constitutes the spiritual man. The unction, the tonsure, ordination, consecration by the bishop or the pope, may make a hypocrite, but never a spiritual man. We are all consecrated priests by baptism, as Saint Peter says, 'Ye are priests and kings,' although it does not belong to all to exercise such offices, for no one can take that which is common to all without the consent of the community."

Certainly the restoration of the idea of a kingdom of priests, all of whom are upon an equality as pertains to priesthood, would destroy the idea of a tribunal of conscience in which one elevates himself to the place where he can assess penalties and act as a supreme judge over others. There is but one high priest, who alone is able to forgive sins, and unto Him appeal must be made. "There is one lawgiver and judge, he who is able to save and to destroy" (James 4:12).

As to the subject of the mass, Martin Luther said in the Augsburg Confession: "But as the mass, prior to this time, was abused in various ways; as it is clear, that an annual traffic was made out of it, that it was bought and sold, and that it was celebrated for the most part in all churches for the sake of money, such abuse had been repeatedly censured, even before this time by individuals of learning and piety. Now, as the ministers among us have preached concerning this thing, and the priests have been reminded of the terrible menaces which should justly move every Christian, that whoever partakes of the Sacrament unworthily, is guilty of the body and blood of Christ (1 Cor. 11:27) in consequence of this, these sordid and solitary masses, which hitherto have been celebrated out of compulsion, for the sake of money and preferments, have ceased in our churches."

Philip Melancthon, brilliant young friend of Luther, in his "*Apology for the Augsburg Confession" says: "Now, as no one under the Old Testament obtained remission of sins through the sacrifices, they having only signified the one sacrifice of Christ, it follows that there is only one offering, namely, Christ, who made payment and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. In the New Testament, consequently, there is no sacrifice to be made as a recompense for sin, except only the death of Christ, who was offered once upon the cross. When they therefore assert that under the New Testament there must be a priest to offer sacrifice, this can be conceded with reference to Christ alone. The whole Epistle to the Hebrews strongly urges and confirms this view. It would really be setting up another mediator besides Christ, were we to admit any other satisfaction for sin, or any reconciliation but the death of Christ."

He further states: "Our antagonists cannot produce a particle of proof from the Scripture in confirmation of these dreams and fables, which they preach with the greatest assurance, although without the authority of the church or the Fathers. They are ungodly, perverse men, who knowingly reject and trample upon the plain truth of God." No wonder the reformatory movement aroused such a stir in men's hearts, with such courageous leaders in the vanguard of the army.

The statement regarding Protestants, that "in the churches of our separated brethren there remain but four bare walls and a pulpit" deserves a few remarks. The dragon now speaks with the voice of a lamb. "Our separated brethren" of today were those branded as "infamous heretics" yesterday, and brutally treated and even killed by papal persecutions.

Dominus Dens says:

"Are heretics justly punished with death?"

Answer: "Saint Thomas answers in the affirmative because forgers of money, or others, disturbing the republic, are justly punished with death. Therefore, also heretics who are forgers of the faith, and, experience being the witness, greatly disturb the republic."

Pope Martin (1418) gave his approval to the Council of Constance in which heretics were condemned to be burned as "morbid sheep." Urban IV (1262) issued a bull for the appointment of officers to discharge the functions of the Inquisition against heretics. When Martin Luther laid down the proposition, "It is contrary to the will of God to burn heretics," Pope Leo X (1520) published a bull in which he condemned the proposition. Rome accommodates her tactics and methods to the time and place where she works. In an enlightened America with religious freedom, she becomes tolerant, and speaks of "our separated brethren," but in places where she is in the majority, she shows her true tyrannical and despotic nature. Rome always has an axe to grind, and she turns the political grindstone to throw sparks in whatever direction will accomplish her purpose.

Yet there is a hint even in the accusation of Rome that Protestantism does not represent the restoration of simple New Testament Christianity. In the primitive church no pulpit was found. The early Christians sat around a table, the modern congregation sits before a pulpit. The first disciples met to minister to each other, the present day disciples meet to be ministered unto. For three hundred years the congregations owned no distinctive buildings, but met in upper rooms and in private homes. The familiar expression, "The church which is in thy house" was characteristic of the New Covenant epistles. In such simplicity was it necessary to have an elevated stand in each home? We do not condemn the use of a speaker's platform, but "the pulpit" has certain connotations. It has been borrowed from Rome by her "separated brethren" because they still have the false and unscriptural distinction between the clergy and the laity. The pulpit is the exclusive realm of a special caste. Humble saints are deemed unworthy of invading its sacred precincts unless by condescension, the priestly occupant invites one of the flock to share it with him to direct a prayer from its sacerdotal heights.

It is deemed a distinctive honor to "sit in the pulpit" by the side of "the minister." Mothers covet this glory for their sons, and simper with fawning gratitude when one of their offspring is invited to participate in the service. How tragic is this attitude which indicates so great a departure from the divine ideal of the regal priesthood with its absolute freedom of the platform protected for every faithful and able brother in the assembly of the saints.

Rome cannot conceive of a spiritual worship. She must walk by sight because she cannot walk by faith. She can no more visualize a congregation at worship without a visible, tangible altar and its officiating priest, than the Protestants can visualize a congregation at worship without a pulpit occupied by the minister. Yet the primitive church had neither of these. Both extremes are departures from the plan of God; both originated with and are perpetuated by the clergy. Neither system can restore to this world of sin the congregation as given by our Lord through His apostles.

Dr. Conklin is correct. Worship as a religious exercise is disappearing from Protestant churches. But it is not disappearing due to the lack of a special priestcraft. It is disappearing because of the Protestant counterpart thereof, the clergyman. Worship is not now a corporate action of the body in which all engage. It is rather a special function relegated to a certain caste. It is now something performed for them. It is no longer religious worship, but a religious performance. The pulpit has become a stage on which polished actors present a dramatic performance for a stipulated fee.

The decay of Protestantism is not due to abandonment of the priestly office, but to the fact that a watered down version of it is still maintained. When the Romish priest speaks about "churches ceasing to be temples" he uses both words in a sense that no inspired apostle ever employed when talking about the kingdom of heaven. The word "church" was never applied to a material structure in the Sacred Scriptures; nor did God ever in the New Covenant sanction "a temple" made of wood and stone. The "house of God" is made up of living stones. The children of God do not go to God's house— they are God's house! We are "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone, in whom the whole structure is joined together and grows into a holy temple in the Lord."

The priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church is not a divinely established agency. It can satisfy no real spiritual hunger, although it may serve to allay the fears of superstitious ignorance. It does not provide the bread of life, but stands between the hungry soul and Him who has that bread. It obscures the true meaning of God's altar and sacrifice, His priesthood and worship. The priestcraft of Rome is a burlesque upon God's holy provision, a deliberate attempt upon the part of sinful man to rob God's family of their paternal rights. It is destitute of divine authority, an arrogant usurper, and an unholy claimant of divine rights. May God deliver the people from this blight!

A Sincere Appeal

When Ezekiel was carried a captive into Babylon, the city of Jerusalem was not yet destroyed. One day the prophet was sitting in his foreign house with some of the elders of Judah, when he saw a dazzling vision. A man appeared who took him by a lock of his hair, and the Spirit lifted him up between heaven and earth, and transported him in a trance to Jerusalem. There he was forced to look upon the idolatrous practices carried out in secret and also openly on the very porch of the temple (Ezek. 8). The city was almost wholly filled with worshippers of pagan deities.

As the prophet contemplated the wretched scene, he saw seven men approaching from the direction of the upper gate. Six of these held drawn swords, the seventh had a writing case at his side. They marched solemnly into the temple precincts and stood beside the bronze altar. A voice called out instructions to the man with the writing case, "Go through the city, through Jerusalem, and put a mark upon the foreheads of the men who sigh and groan over all the abominations that are committed in it." The other six were then ordered to pass through the city behind the first, and to slay outright, without pity, all who were not marked in their foreheads. They were told positively to "touch no one upon whom is the mark." And they were likewise told to "begin at my sanctuary."

We believe that idolatry, worldliness and apostasy characterize much of the religious world in these days. The leaders are like the false prophets in the time of Ezekiel. "They have spoken falsehood and divined a lie, they say, 'Says the Lord,' when the Lord has not sent them, and yet they expect him to fulfill their word. Have you not seen a delusive vision, and uttered a lying divination, whenever you have said 'Says the Lord,' although I have not spoken?" (Ezek. 13:6, 7). Yet there must be in this Babylon of religion, hundreds of honest and humble hearts who sigh and groan over the abominations committed in the name of worship. Surely the invisible mark on the forehead has been made by the one whose finger wrote on the temple walls of Belshazzar. "The Lord knoweth them that are his." The judgment of God will be upon this idolatrous generation. That judgment will begin in his sanctuary.

The sectarian spirit of today can never achieve the ideal of God. It can never answer the prayer for unity of Him "whom having not seen we love." Division, schism and strife are perpetuated by the clergy. The common people sigh for unity. They do not want to hate their fellowmen, but they are taught prejudice, animosity and fear by leaders who segregate them with human creeds as barriers to prevent them from thinking for themselves. The early Christians belonged to no sect. They had no other creed but Christ. They were not fractured into divers groups, each with a top echelon of clergymen who exploited them for gain and manipulated them for political prestige. They were all a kingdom of priests unto God, and they recognized no high priest but the Son of God, now coronated King of kings.

Greed for money is at the bottom of much of our sad plight. Men make a profession of dispensing the water of life which God has freely given to all. They then inaugurate a special caste to minister in this profession and demand support from the rest of God's children. Others see an opportunity to make gain and seize power by instituting organizations to produce and train the professional clergymen. Theological seminaries operating as specialized colleges are begun and again a tax is levied against the "clergy of God" to produce a special clergy which will steal the very privileges of those who pay tribute to this earthly handmaiden to produce them. Eventually the simplicity of God's original plan of priesthood becomes so obscure, that those who plead for a return to the old paths are derided, maligned and laughed to scorn.

Occasionally, men who love the cause of Christ and sigh for its purity rise up and sound the call to return to Jerusalem. The hearts of men are stirred for a brief time, and the weary marchers take up their burdens and face again toward the walls of Zion. But the love of popularity, the lust for pre-eminence, the desire for gain soon crush out the noble ambition, and once again a clever priestcraft under innocent titles takes over and the work bogs down in a morass of innovations.

L. F. Bittle, writing in Apostolic Messenger, September, 1918, said: "And when we look at the various reformations that have been started, we see that they all follow the same general course. Beginning with an enthusiastic love of truth and a willingness to sacrifice even life on its behalf, they soon degenerate into formalism and selfishness. The reformers left their creeds to bind the minds of their successors, but they could not leave their spirits to stir their hearts. Rescued from priestcraft, their followers soon made a priesthood of their own to repeat in another form the follies and frauds of the past.

"What has been called the Current Reformation is rapidly sharing the fate of its predecessors. The scriptural knowledge, the zeal for the primitive faith and order, the love and unity in the truth that characterized the earlier stages of the work, are passing away, and the desire to be like the sects around them is transforming the Reformers into a priest-led people who are hurrying down toward Babylon as eagerly as they once struggled up to Jerusalem. Such is the result of exchanging principle for policy and of adopting the suggestions of human wisdom instead of adhering strictly to the oracles of God. And the folly and wickedness of the procedure appear the greater when we remember the Reformers had the mistakes of their predecessors to warn them of the danger of going beyond the things that are written."

If this generation is to see any rapid strides toward restoration of the New Testament order it must begin with the elimination of the whole clergy idea, under whatsoever name or system that idea is perpetuated. Labeling poison by a harmless name does not change its nature, but makes it the more dangerous. There must be a purging from our very thinking of a clergy system which is repugnant to God. The humble and saintly David King said in a paper which he read at the annual meeting of the churches of Christ, in Leeds (England) in 1876: "Nothing seems more opposed to the genius of the Christian system than the recognition of a class of professionals paid for preaching, as are lawyers for pleading, and doctors for prescribing, irrespective of need." In the same speech he also declared: "Paying one man to fill the pulpit with a view to keep up preaching and worship acceptable to a stated congregation, whether that man be called evangelist or pastor, almost invariably exiles New Testament order." Again he remarks: "I have done so much preaching and am therefore entitled to so much pay whether needed or otherwise is both illogical and a burlesque of Christian propagandism."

But how shall we rid ourselves of the burden of an unscriptural clergy system? That the task will be difficult let no one doubt. The first step must be a firm resolution to examine the sacred Scriptures by each child of God for himself. Everyone who loves God must not only seek to derive spiritual food for his own growth, but he must have then a compelling urge to share his learning with his brethren for their good. Restoration must always be preceded by reformation— of life, thinking, attitude and heart. Let the glorious liberty which is ours in Christ Jesus be again understood and cherished. Let anything which will steal that liberty and bring us again into bondage be so obnoxious to us that we will not countenance even the faintest hint of it.

Men must reassert their right to "buy wine and milk without money and without price" (Isa. 55:1). They must resent with every moral fiber the idea of professionals "cashing in on the gospel" and selling back to them that which God gave equally to all mankind. They must be possessed of such an over-powering love for undying souls that they will all carry the glad tidings to loved ones, friends and neighbors. They must be willing to share in the problem of edifying the congregation both privately and "when the whole congregation is come together in one place."

It is not a question with real saints whether a thing will work or not. The only thing they question is whether or not it is God's will. If it is they must make it work. God's plan will work if we will work God's plan.

Many preachers are unwilling victims of a modern condition which they secretly detest and even openly question. They realize that the position which they occupy as "The Minister" in a local congregation is without scriptural warrant. Such men must through prayer and meditation strengthen their hearts and steel their convictions until they develop the courage to break away from tradition and cease to cater to that which will enslave the Church. This will require a tremendous faith, because of the adverse criticism, and the tug of so many considerations which may be sacrificed— money, power and prestige!

The wives of such gospel preachers will need to be saintly women. The feminine heart seeks security. There is a lure in a nice home made ready to the hands, in a regular check of ample proportions, in the social glory attending a profession. To turn one's back upon all such appeals and face the future is an acid test of fidelity to God. Yet in every age there have not been wanting faithful women who have encouraged their men to "stand fast in the Lord."

All must be made to realize that the task of bringing the world to Christ belongs to every saint. The realization of that fact overturned paganism in the first few centuries after Christ. It is the only thing which can do it again. "It is an interesting, but not a surprising fact, that the circumstances of the first planting of Christianity in places which later were among its most powerful seats, including Rome and Carthage, are not known. Visitors to Jerusalem at the great festivals, mechanics who changed their abode from place to place, and commercial travellers, might carry to their homes the faith which they had elsewhere received and form the nucleus of Christian communities. The gospel doctrine was transported from place to place, as seeds are blown from the trees and wafted abroad" (The Beginning of Christianity— Fisher).*

The first truly literary assailant of Christianity was Celsus, who about the beginning of the second century taunted God's congregation with the fact that "woolworkers, cobblers, leather-dressers, the most illiterate and vulgar of mankind, were zealous preachers of the gospel."

One historian declares: "If men were often, in the first instance, won without the word, they were won to the word, and to Him who gave it. And the word was nigh unto them. It dropped from the lips of those whose lives adorned it, and it is a most notable circumstance that, though there was a regular ministry from the beginning, there is scarcely anything said in the history of the second and third centuries of Christians who could, in any distinctive sense, be called missionaries. The trader on his journey, the soldier in the camp, the slave in the house, the philosopher among his disciples, as well as the friend among friends and the mother among her children: these all did their part in diffusing the knowledge of the truth which they felt to be of God, and to which, they were assured, God would give the victory" (The Early Church, by David Duff, M.A., D.D., LL.D.)

In the primitive church the saints met to worship and scattered to preach. The bench of the cobbler, the plowhandles of the farmer, the desk of the tax collector; these were the only pulpits known. The Christians took the good news to the world; they did not build houses and tell the world to come. The kingdom was spread like leaven works in the dough. Just as the yeast affects one particle of the mixture and it then permeates every other particle with which it comes in contact, so Christianity filled the hearts of men, and from them spread to other hearts as they came in contact in the pursuit of daily tasks. The slave girl whispered the story of freedom into the ear of her haughty mistress as she combed her tresses and applied the unguent; the bazaar keeper talked to the prospective purchasers as they examined his wares; the banker heard about the lowly Nazarene at the public bath; the clerk in his counting house; the farmer at the local inn. The Ethiopian treasurer learned of Christ as he rode along in his chariot; the jailer in his dungeon keep; Lydia out on the river bank. Everywhere men were persuaded by those who said, "We have found him of whom the prophets have spoken."

Those who were Christians did not speak of "entering the ministry." They were already in it. Everyone entered the ministry at baptism. To be in Christ was to be in the ministry. No one went away to study for "the Ministry." Each one began where he was and announced the Messiah who had come. People did not send for a preacher. They just began preaching. All who had been inducted into the kingdom could tell what they did and why they did it. Every Christian was a minister, everyone was a priest. The congregation was a priesthood— a royal priesthood composed of all believers.

Each week these priests gathered about a table. They ate of the bread and drank of the cup in memory of the Lord's death. As they were assembled they prayed. Their prayers were spontaneous. They did not pray because they were "on the program" or because they were "assigned to do it." They talked to God as a son speaks with his father. They bore their mutual burdens to the throne to find grace to help in time of need. They rejoiced in thanksgiving in the presence of God. They spoke to each other to build up, stir up and cheer up. Their talks were not formal or stilted sermons. A number of brethren participated, speaking one by one, that all might be edified and all might be comforted.

The pattern of religious worship in the early church was designed by God to meet the needs of the church in all ages. It requires no alteration, needs no amendment, and demands no improvement. The church of today can only be healthy if it follows this prototype. To produce it we must first alter our views concerning the word "member." We employ it today to designate one who has united with a specific congregation, or who has his name on the roster of the local church. We talk about "a member of the church" in the same sense that we refer to a member of the country club, a lodge or a farm bureau. The word is never so employed in the New Testament. There it always refers to one who sustains a vital, living connection with the spiritual body of our Lord, and who is thus in direct relation to Him as the head. And just as one does not confer about the problem of finding something for his physical hands, ears or feet, to do, so we should not have to discuss putting the members of Christ to work.

When a child, is born, we never once question how many of his physical members will be, or should be, employed in the growth of his body. We train him in the use of his members as he grows toward maturity, but if someone were to advance the idea that a majority of the members should be bound and not permitted to function lest they embarrass the rest of the members, such a person would be laughed out of court. It is only in the spiritual body that we devise schemes whereby the majority of the members can shift their responsibility to one hired to do the work. Such a system not only degrades God's spiritual institution, making of it a helpless, dependent and servile thing, but worst of all, it appropriates the privileges and abrogates the rights of those who are truly priests of God.

The call to a brighter and better day goes forth to all who are of a broken and contrite spirit. The way to liberty in Christ Jesus is the way of the cross. Men who plead for a complete restoration of the New Testament church must endure persecution and misrepresentation. An organization in its corruption never did, and never will, admit it. Its only feeling will be anger, not repentance. There is no hope of reforming a decadent movement as a body. The only hope is that men will arise who see the need to call forth those whose trust is stayed in God and once more start a move toward Jerusalem's broken down walls.

Our plea is to everyone who has a good and honest heart. Only on such fertile soil will the seed of the kingdom produce a bountiful yield. Regardless of religious affiliation in the past, of parental instruction, ecclesiastical tradition, or priestly doctrine, let us throw off the yoke which neither we nor our fathers were able to bear. Let us recapture the fountain of life so that its waters can once more flow free and freely, and restore to this earth the congregation as it was given by Him who is our great high priest at the right hand of God. Remember that "you also as living stones are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." May God bless the royal priesthood of all believers is our very humble and sincere prayer.

For a number of years it has been my wish to set forth my humble sentiments regarding the Kingdom of the Messiah. Other subjects of pressing importance have arisen to defer the work until the present, and now that I have written the book, I find that the research attendant upon its preparation has filled my heart with so many related matters, that I could write several more volumes and not incorporate all of the material. The reader will understand, then, that the subject under consideration has not been exhausted in its possibilities, but the suggestions made will, it is hoped, encourage other and better minds to present those ideas and interpretations which will enable us to "grow in grace and knowledge of the truth."

I have found my heart warmed repeatedly as I wrote, and the hours I have spent on the manuscript have been real "seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." One of my purposes will be achieved, if in your reading of the book, there is aroused within you a greater sense of appreciation for the eternal purpose of God as manifested in His Son, and if you are made to feel the importance of the individual in the plan of the ages.

I am indebted to many sources for the impressions received, which have been woven into the warp and woof of this material, and memory cannot recall all of those to whom I have been brought under tribute. Students of the restoration movement will recognize that I have been greatly influenced by the reasoning of Alexander Campbell and David King. The first of these reformers was born in Ireland, and did most of his teaching in our own land, to which he emigrated; the other carried the restoration banner in Great Britain. Both were profound thinkers, and I commend their writings to all eager searchers after truth. I have felt no servile obligation to them, nor to any other uninspired writer, but have sought to read objectively, and to form my convictions upon the basis of God's revelation, rather than what men have written about it.

One thing I would seek to impress upon the reader is that my presentation is not intended to be dogmatic or arbitrary. It does not contain the last word upon the themes considered. Especially in those parts of the book which deal with unfulfilled prophecy would I tread lightly and with becoming caution. If the great Jewish teachers so far misunderstood the prophecies of God as to be disappointed in Jesus of Nazareth when he first came, he may just as effectively disappoint the commentators with his second coming. However, since we do entertain certain definite views as to the future destiny of the kingdom, it would hardly be fair to the reader to refuse to state them. Rather, by having them published and exposed to criticism I may be able to ascertain any errors in my reasoning and make proper correction in my thinking.

The views advanced must certainly cut across those of many other sincere students of the sacred scriptures. So varied and divergent are the ideas of modern scholars, relative to our subject, that it would be impossible to write in such a manner as to avoid conflict. For that reason, I have sought to abstain from writing to refute opposition, and have rather tried to make the work a positive presentation. How well I have succeeded must be left to the reader to determine.

It will be observed that I have not limited my quotations of holy writ to any particular version of the Bible. I have used various translations, according as I felt that the purity of the original was best served. Many of the quotations are from the Revised Standard Version, and these are used by special permission of the copyright owners, The National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States of America.

It is our hope that those who read will be sufficiently interested in the magnitude of the subject that, despite its humble portrayal, they will make the book available to their relatives and friends, sharing its contents with others, that more men and women will be motivated to live for the Messiah, and to acknowledge His sovereignty over their lives. If some weary soul is thus led to discover that peace which passeth all human reason, we will consider that our efforts have been sufficiently rewarded.

The Reign of God

Contents

The kingdom of heaven! This is the theme which engrossed the prophets of old, and formed the basis of the revelation of our Lord and his holy apostles. The rule of God's anointed was the hope of the former, "and all the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days" (Acts 3:24). The inauguration of that reign constituted the foundation of the proclamation of the latter. As soon as our Lord had been immersed in the Jordan, and had grappled with the tempter in the wilderness, he launched into his mission. "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 4:17). When he sent forth his twelve envoys, he commissioned them as follows: "And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 10:7).

It is not too much to say that this challenging subject has occupied the attention of all the intelligent beings of the celestial and infernal realms in all ages, and should form the chief topic of meditation and consideration of all accountable beings who inhabit this terrestrial globe. Our heavenly Father is concerned in the matter as the source of all power or authority (Rom. 13:1), and the Son is equally concerned as the present King, "For he (God) hath put all things under his feet" and he must reign "until the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and authority and power" (1 Cor. 15:24, 27). The holy angels are involved as they shall share with the Son in his glory, when he shall sit upon the throne of his glory (Matt. 25:31), and they are the reapers whom he will send forth to gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity (Matt. 13:41).

In the apocalyptic vision, John was permitted to view a conflict in heaven, wherein Michael and his angels fought against Satan and his angels. When the latter forces were routed, and flung over the ramparts of heaven, the aged apostle, "heard a loud voice saying in heaven. Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ." It should be noted that the same voice expressed a woe for the inhabitants of earth, "for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time" (Rev. 12:7-12).

How startling it is then to contemplate the indifference of mankind toward this momentous subject. When we are aware that the residents of heaven above and hell beneath are continuously motivated by it, how tragic it is to realize that those who are so vitally involved on earth, are oblivious to the import of a question which will spell out their final destiny. It is with a sincere desire to stimulate thought in the spiritual realm that we present the facts found in this book, and trace with you the kingdom of God as portrayed in the divine revelation.

Scope of the Term

Before we can apprehend the teaching of the Holy Spirit upon any subject we must first understand the meaning of the terms employed. The communication of the divine will in order to constitute a revelation to man was by necessity given in that medium of expression common to man, that is, in human language. In such language, words are used as symbols of ideas. But the same words are often used to express different concepts. Words have acquired and extended significations as well as radical and limited meanings. We cannot assume that because the same expression, or a kindred one, is used, that the connotation is always identical.

The language of revelation must be submitted to the same laws of interpretation which govern the documents written by men in the same language, to the same persons, in the same age. It is essential that we observe the variety of bearings of any given term, and seek to determine from the context, either adjacent or remote, what is implied in any specific place. Leaving the special New Testament sense of the expressions "kingdom of God" and "kingdom of heaven" to demand our attention later, let us now note a few general facts about them.

The term "kingdom" has to do with government, or the exercise of control, power, dominion or restraint. As applied to God, it signifies a rule or reign manifested in a certain realm or domain by the Eternal One. But inasmuch as God governs in providential and moral aspects, as well as in an evangelical domain, the term "kingdom of God" has a varied content, dependent upon that phase of government under discussion at a given time or place. The radical idea of rule or government is always present, but the subjects and circumstances determine the nature and extent of that rule.

1. Universal

The writers of the old covenant scriptures recognized and affirmed the sovereignty of God over the entire universe, embracing both heaven and earth, and things animate and inanimate. The psalmist David expressed the idea thus: "The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all" (Psa. 103:19). In his public benediction, David said, "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all" (1 Chron. 29:11).

The thought is reiterated in Psalm 47:2, "For the Lord most high is terrible; he is a great king over all the earth." That the nations other than Israel were conceived to be under this moral jurisdiction is evidenced in verse 8: "God reigneth over the heathen: God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness." Again, "For the Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods. In his hand are the deep places of the earth: the strength of the hills is his also" (Psalm 95:3, 4).

It was upon this basis that the prophets asserted the supremacy of God over the various governments of the earth, and declared that he ruled in the kingdoms of men. When Daniel was summoned before Nebuchadnezzar to interpret the dream of the Babylonian king relating to the vision of the great tree which was chopped down until only the stump remained, the haughty monarch related the words he had heard, "This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones: to the intent that the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men" (Dan. 4:17). The prophet confirmed the truth of the declaration by asserting that the dream was a revelation from God to the effect that the king would be humbled by dethronement and debasement for seven years until he learned "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will" (verse 25, 32). At the end of his period of punishment, Nebuchadnezzar issued a decree of praise and honor to God, "whose domain is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom from generation to generation, and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing: and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" (verses 34, 35).

This further explains the statement of God in Proverbs

8:15, 16: "By me kings reign and princes decree justice. By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth." As Daniel phrases it, "He changeth the times and seasons: he removeth kings and setteth up kings" (Dan. 2:21). We shall subsequently learn that the nation of Babylon was the first of four great universal monarchies with which God's elect came in special contact either through enslavement or otherwise, and it is significant that to the mighty ruler of the first of these, was given the great lesson of God's supreme sovereignty in the kingdoms of men.

God has not abdicated from this throne, nor has he been deposed by a superior force or greater intelligence, seeing that he is the fountain of both power and wisdom. The universe is his by right of creation. Of him who is the invisible God it is affirmed that all things were not only created by him, but for him, and they are maintained by him (Col. 1:16, 17). He made all things by the power of his word (John 1:3); he upholds all things by the word of his power (Heb. 1:3). He is not inactive in the rulership of the universe, for "the laws of nature" cannot uncrown him who decreed the laws. Laws without an enforcing or regulating agent are inconceivable. His government extends over every product of his creation and is both natural and moral, as it affects that which is material and immaterial, unaccountable and responsible.

Kingdom of God and Israel

God has not abdicated from this throne, nor The concept of an eternal and general rule of heaven, in the minds of the ancient seers, did not conflict with the view of a specialized and restricted reign, limited to a chosen nation. When God brought the former bondmen from Egypt to the foot of Sinai which was to be his awe-inspiring rostrum from which to announce their constitution, he proclaimed, "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure to me above all people: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (Exo. 19:5, 6). While all of the earth belongs unto God and was therefore subject unto him, he now proposed to set up a special kingdom or nation, composed of those who occupied a distinctive covenant relationship, which would exalt them to a position of special dignity above all other peoples.

This was later called "the kingdom of the Lord in the hand of the sons of David" (2 Chron. 13:8) because "The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and to his sons by a covenant of salt" (verse 5). It is interesting to note the terms describing the throne of Solomon, the son and successor of David. "And Solomon sitteth on the throne of the kingdom" (1 Kings 1:46). "Then sat Solomon upon the throne of David" (1 Kings 2:12). "I am risen up in the room of David my father, and sit on the throne of Israel" (1 Kings 8:20). "Upon the throne of the kingdom of God over Israel " (1 Chr. 28:5). "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king" (1 Chr. 29:23).

It is evident that the kingdom of God over Israel is much more limited in extent than the sovereignty of the whole universe. However to the extent of limitation it is deepened in spiritual values and relationships. The maintenance of the relationship was contingent upon continued obedience to the terms of the covenant, which terms were accepted by the nation when initially promulgated (Exo. 24:7) and ratified by the blood sprinkled both upon the book and the people (Exo. 24:8).

That the people of Israel knowingly violated the terms of the covenant and wilfully broke it is amply attested by the holy scriptures. "They are turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers, which refused to hear my words; and they went after other gods to serve them: the house of Israel and the house of Judah have broken my covenant which I made with their fathers" (Jer. 11:10). "But they like men have transgressed the covenant: there have they dealt treacherously against me" (Hosea 6:7). In view of this God declared that he would make a new covenant, not according to the former one which was broken (Jer. 31:31, 32).

Since the special kingdom of the Lord in Israel was conditioned upon the covenant, and since a new covenant was decreed, we may expect that the "kingdom of God" in a special sense will also be altered in nature and scope to conform to the character of the new covenant. Accordingly, we are not surprised to hear Daniel say, "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms and it shall stand for ever" (Dan. 2:44).

Thus, when John the baptizer, came, he announced upon "his showing unto Israel" (Luke 1:80) that "The kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 3:2). It would be incompatible with God's purpose to have two diverse special kingdoms in existence simultaneously, so with the advertisement of the approach of the new reign, Jesus the Christ, informed the leaders of Israel, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. 21:43). Thus we have introduced unto us a third usage of the term "kingdom of God" and this will form the basis of our study in the next chapter.

The Kingdom in the New Covenant

Contents

The prophets of God under the Mosaic economy freely predicted a coming state of affairs in which the Messiah would reign and which they designated as "the kingdom which God would set up." Micah affirmed that the mountain of the Lord's house would be established in the last days, and would be the goal of heathen nations, whose citizens would invite and encourage each other to go up to it for instruction in the law of God that they might walk in his ways. Peace would be effected when such nations submitted their disputes to God for arbitration, and accepted his chastisement, so that war as a means of international discipline would no longer be requisite. In peace and quiet each man would sit in the shade of his own vine and fig tree, without fear of molestation or disturbance of his domestic tranquillity. Those who had suffered affliction would no longer have to endure such an ordeal, but God having removed the trials would "reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even for ever" (Micah 4:1-7).

It was this kingdom of which John was a harbinger, specially sent from God (John 1:6). During his earthly sojourn Jesus also heralded its approach, and sent out at one time, twelve; and at another time, seventy, messengers, all of whom were commissioned to declare the same message. During the forty days of interval between his resurrection and ascension Jesus made his topic of conversation with his chosen envoys, the kingdom of God (Acts 1:3). It behooves us to study carefully the connotation of a term so important as to be the subject of divine revelation and consideration.

The word "kingdom" is found 161 times in the common version of the new covenant scriptures, and is, without exception from basileia. The expression "kingdom of God" occurs 72 times, while the expression "kingdom of heaven" occurs 32 times. The word basileia is defined as a "kingdom, realm, the region or country governed by a king; kingly power, authority, dominion, reign, royal dignity, the title and honor of a king."

Even the casual student will instantly observe that the Greek term is much wider in scope than the English word "kingdom," for basileia has at least three meanings. These may be expressed by realm, reign and rank. The first has to do with the territory or place over which the sovereignty extends, the second has to do with the duration or time of such sovereignty, and the last with the honor accruing to the regnant monarch.

The term "kingdom" is too limited in significance to express all of these phases, and for that reason it is not a proper rendering in some places. When the nature of the statement or the context shows that it is the beginning of a period of sovereignty, or the duration of such an epoch that is being considered, "kingdom" is not an appropriate rendering, and may actually be incongruous. "Kingdom" has to do with the place, locality or province governed by a monarch, and does not express time or endurance. Upon such occasions the word "reign" is far superior to the other. In the new covenant scriptures, the allusion is much more frequently to the time, than to the place, yet the King James Version invariably translates by the word "kingdom" rather than "reign."

This version was given to the English speaking world in 1611 by James I, and has been hallowed by long generations of usage. Familiarity with its language, and reverence for its phraseology, will cause the pious reader to become insensible to expressions which in other documents would be immediately discerned as inappropriate. We cite as examples the following passages. Jesus taught his disciples to pray "Thy kingdom come" (Matt. 6:10). He said to the critical Pharisees, "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you" (Matt. 12:28). He declared that some who stood in his presence "would not die until they had seen the kingdom of God come with power" (Mark 9:1). It was said that a certain Arimathean "waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43).

In every one of these, the term "kingdom" is inappropriate. One may wait for a reign to commence but not for a place. He may come to a place, but it is surely conceded that a place cannot come unto him. We may properly pray for a rule or authority to come or start, but not for a territory or region to do so. The difference between reign and region can readily be seen. We can ascribe motion to the first as it comes, continues and is protracted, but not so with the second, for it is by nature stationary and immovable. Those who plead for "sound speech which cannot be condemned" should understand that John proclaimed, "Reform, for the reign of heaven is approaching." This is sensible and correct.

Summarizing the rule for correct interpretation of basileia, it can be said quite simply, that when it indicates time it should be rendered "reign," but when the place is signified, it should be rendered "kingdom." In every case where the word is employed in conjunction with the word "preached" it should, without exception, be translated "reign." For example, "From that time Jesus began to proclaim, saying, Reform, for the Reign of Heaven approaches" (Matt. 4:17). "Then Jesus went over all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and proclaiming the glad tidings of the Reign" (Matt. 4:23). "As you go, proclaim, saying, The Reign of Heaven approaches" (Matt. 10:7). These are here given exactly as found in the translation from the original Greek by Dr. George Campbell of Glasgow, Dr. James Macknight of Edinburgh, and Philip Doddridge of England, and published with certain additions in the United States, by Alexander Campbell, generally under the title "Living Oracles." The words translated by our English word "preach" in their original usage by the Holy Spirit, meant something far different than the modern meaning attached to "preach." The idea of announcing or heralding was ever present in them.

When we speak today of "the Kingdom of Great Britain" or "the Kingdom of Norway" we visualize the territory or realm over which the Queen of England or the King of Norway has jurisdiction. Our employment of the word "kingdom" followed by a place name automatically leads us to associate the monarchy with the place or territory. This cannot be true, however, in the expression, "kingdom of heaven," for heaven is not the territory governed to the exclusion of other parts of the universe. Far from being so, the kingdom of heaven was proclaimed on earth to men, and they were told it was approaching them and would actually be among them on earth. It is obvious, then, that the expression "kingdom of heaven" would confuse and perplex the sincere student of the English language, for it is not used in the sense in which he is accustomed to use the word "kingdom." The words "rule" or "reign" as a translation of basileia under such circumstances, relieve us of the difficulty.

While it is a digression from our main theme, the fact that we have instigated a critical study of basileia in our attempt to fathom the meaning of the holy scriptures, makes it rather imperative that we point out that there are occasional uses of the word "kingdom" where neither "reign" or "kingdom" expresses the thought. Dr. George Campbell correctly cites two of these. One is in Luke 19:12, 15. This concerns the parable of the pounds, which is not to be confused with that of the talents. This one was voiced because of the proximity of Jesus to Jerusalem and due to the prevailing idea that the coming of the kingdom of God was imminent. The narrative concerns a certain nobleman who made a journey to a remote country to secure a kingdom, and who returned after having obtained it.

This is clearly a reference to the political situation of the Jews at the time, when Judea was tributary to Rome, after having been subjugated by Pompey. In order to obtain certification of his right to govern, the local ruler had to journey to Rome and receive the authoritative approval of the reigning Caesar. This was the case with Archelaus, son of Herod the Great, who reigned in his father's stead, a fact which caused Joseph and Mary to turn aside into Nazareth upon their return from Egypt. The Jews sent a deputation of fifty men to Rome, who joined with eight thousand Jews then living in that city, in an appeal to Caesar at the temple of Apollo, that Archelaus not be allowed to reign over them. Caesar listened to the appeal and reduced Archelaus to the status of ethnarch. The term "kingdom" in verses 12 and 15 clearly refers to regal dignity or royal authority.

In Matthew 18:23 is introduced the parable of the unjust and unscrupulous debtor. The context shows that "kingdom" here relates to a mode or form of governing, or to a type of administration. It does not refer either to the realm or reign of a monarch, but to the method of dealing with those who are under his control.

The term "kingdom of heaven" is used more frequently by Matthew than any of the other writers of the New Testament, who seem to prefer "kingdom of God." Matthew uses both terms, and in such a manner as to show they are interchangeable. He records the words of Christ, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20). In the very next chapter he has "But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness" (Matt. 6:33). Moreover, in recording the same events, where Matthew uses "kingdom of heaven," the other writers have "kingdom of God." A case in point concerns John, the baptizer. Matthew has it, "He that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he" (Matt. 11:11). Luke writes "He that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he" (Luke 7:28).

Moreover, the expression "kingdom of heaven" does not occur at all in Acts of Apostles, the epistolary writings, or in Revelation. It is apparent that there was something distinctive about the purpose of Matthew, or the ones to whom he wrote, which would make him use so frequently an expression which other writers do not employ. The answer can no doubt be found in the fact that while Mark wrote especially for the Romans, and Luke wrote to a Greek and for Greeks, Matthew's account was designed for the Jews. God always adapts his revelation to the needs and condition of those to whom it is addressed.

The Jewish world at that time was in a state of great expectancy. All were looking for a restoration of the kingdom to Israel, and the ushering in of a golden age by the Messiah of whom the prophets had spoken. Jerusalem, as the capital of the new regime, would be world famous. The Gentiles would become tributaries and would converge upon the Jewish commonwealth with gold and silver in abundance. Much of the thinking centered around a materialistic and earthly speculation. Matthew's account was addressed to the Jews to prove that the Nazarene was the Messiah. The term "kingdom of heaven" was employed to distract their minds from the idea of an earthly prince leading a victorious army. It was intended to point their minds upward and to recognize a higher source of origin and a different type of sovereignty. An appeal of a different nature was necessary to reach the non-Jewish hearers of that day.

A Fourth Use

God's revelation has been on a progressive basis as his divine purpose has been manifested on an ever ascending scale. Thus it is, that although we are said distinctly to be citizens of the kingdom of God at present, there is held out to us the bright prospect of entrance into another phase of the kingdom more glorious than any we can experience here. Peter cites numerous requirements of the Christian vocation essential to making our calling and election sure, and declares, "So an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. 1:11). At the judgment when the wicked are severed from the good, Jesus will say to the latter, "Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world" (Matt. 25:34). Paul declares that those who walk after the flesh "shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

Summarizing our findings thus far, we have found the following implications of "the kingdom of God":

1. The kingdom universal and unlimited.

2. The kingdom before our Lord died for the sins of men.

3. The kingdom over which the Messiah now reigns.

4. The kingdom in a more glorious state in a dispensation to come.

It is essential to a correct understanding of the Bible that we keep in mind these four distinctive usages of the expression "kingdom of God." Those who do not properly distinguish them, often become guilty of perverting the scriptures to sustain a particular kingdom theory. They read a passage which speaks of the kingdom yet to come as an inheritance, and conclude that in no sense has the kingdom yet come. To sustain such an assumption they must twist or wrest those passages which refer to the kingdom in the past, or to the present rule of Christ. The true student has no recourse to such methods. He realizes that ancient Israel composed the kingdom of God, and that God took out of the way their law, priesthood and kingdom, and established another reign upon a more elevated plane, and that there is yet another more glorious and eternal kingdom to come. And prior to all of these phases, everything was ruled by God, as it still is, in a great universal sway over all creation.

If we except the first in our numerical catalog above, it is possible that the last three are co-related and are a manifestation of the unity existing in God's plan of the ages. In the reign over Israel we have introduced unto us the terminology and language by which God proposed to describe our relationship in the present kingdom. No one can apprehend to its fullest the teaching of God with reference to the present reign of heaven if he ignores God's dealings with Israel. Hardly a phase or feature of our worship, service, sacrifice or religion was without its type or shadow in the prior dispensation. Neither can be fully understood without studying the other.

And just as the language, elements and relationships of ancient Israel served to depict those of God's children under the present regime, so do those of the present look forward and explain those of the future yet to be revealed in culmination of this age. And the final phase of the kingdom is related to the first, for as earthly Jerusalem was the holy city to which all came to worship and serve, so in the last, "the great city, the holy Jerusalem" lying foursquare, with its walls of jasper and its twelve gates of pearl, will be the dwelling place of the saints, and they shall bring the glory and honor of nations into it.

Because of the close relationship of the various aspects of the kingdom, it is not surprising that the inspired writers often speak of them in the same context. One who reads the parable of the tares will note that our Lord says it is a likeness of the kingdom of heaven. But the first part deals with the events in this age, while the harvest is distinctly said to be the end of the world, or the conclusion of this state. When the angels have gathered out all seducers and iniquitous persons "then shall the righteous shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Matt. 13:36-43).

The past condition and present status of the reign of heaven are both dealt with in the parable of the vineyard as related by our Lord in Matthew, chapter 21. The leaders of the Jewish nation are depicted as rebellious and murderous husbandmen, who despised and stoned the prophets and others sent by the owner to secure fruits. When he sent his son, expecting them to properly respect him, they reasoned that since he was the heir, they could kill him and keep possession of his inheritance. The parable concludes with the statement, "Know, therefore, that the kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation who will produce the fruits of it." That there is a connection between the administration of God over the fleshly seed of Abraham and the kingdom embracing the spiritual seed of Abraham, there can be no question. Yet we must distinguish between them as we differentiate between a man and his shadow.

Our concern in this book is chiefly with the kingdom of God as now manifested, and with its fruition in the everlasting phase awaiting all of the faithful of all ages. We shall concern ourselves with the prophecies of that kingdom and then deal at length with its nature and with our relationship as citizens thereof. To such a voyage of discovery, with the foundation thus laid, we invite all of you to go along as our guests through succeeding pages.

Patriarchs and Judges

"Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning" (Rom. 15:4).

The word of God is not a compilation of unrelated passages. It contains a revelation of the divine will in a manner which was purposeful, profitable and progressive. Three dispensations of time are covered in the Bible. In each of these God ordained a system of religion adapted to the circumstances and conditions of those to whom the revelation was afforded. The three dispensations of the world's religious history, correspond to the three ages or stages of individual life, for as each person is first an infant, then a child, and finally a mature adult, so mankind had its infancy, childhood and maturity. And just as it is difficult to appreciate a man without a knowledge of his background and development, so one cannot ignore the plan of God in its unfolding process and perceive the fulness of truth relative to the kingdom of God.

Every nation began with a single family which then developed into a clan and finally into the nation as such. In the infancy of the world, God ordained a system of religion which was apposite to the state of man at the time. Having created man and his counterpart, God sanctified the marriage institution for the good of mankind and the multiplication of progeny to populate the earth. At the head of the organized unit thus formed was placed the man as husband and father, to rule over the little society formed by his union with another. With respect to God, man as the governor of his own household, was also their prophet, priest and king.

In the first of these roles, he received the messages of heaven, either directly if occasion demanded, or later by word of mouth from his progenitors, and he conveyed them to his children, instructing them in the ways of righteousness, and warning them to continue therein. As a priest he officiated at the altar in behalf of his increasing congregation, offering in their behalf sin offerings, trespass offerings and thank offerings. Thus did Noah upon his exit from the ark of his salvation (Gen. 8:20); and so acted Abraham upon his entrance into Canaan (Gen. 12:7, 8). Job performed as a priestly officiant in behalf of his sons (Job 1:5) and at the direct instigation of God he interceded in behalf of his friends when they sacrificed at their own altars.

When men began to multiply upon earth, the tendency was to remain close to the family altar, and succeeding generations developed into tribal units over which the father, as a tribal chieftain, presided as king. Such tribes became small monarchies, although not of a constitutional nature. God was respected as the great ruler of the universe and the head of the clan was regarded as king by divine right and primacy, seeing that it was by heavenly fiat that the father was given the right to rule his own domain. The age is therefore called patriarchal, a combined form of the words for "father" and "chief."

Egypt early had her Pharaoh, a title apparently derived from "the sun," the hieroglyphic symbol of which was written over the name of the king. Many ancient monarchs associated their glory with that of the sun which was regarded as the ruler of the natural universe. When the Pharaoh of the time appropriated the wife of Abram for his harem at the suggestion of his princes, the Lord chastened him directly for his indiscretion (Gen. 12:14-17).

The kings of certain areas in primitive times occasionally made forays into the territories of others and brought them into subjection. For twelve years the kings in the vale of Siddim were under the dominion of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. When the five kings in Siddim Valley then rebelled, a combined army of four kings fought against them and overthrew them. One of the four was identified as a "king of nations" indicating that he was the chief of several confederated tribes. Due to their capture of Lot and the confiscation of his personal property, Abram led an attacking expedition of his own militia, consisting of more than three hundred trained servants whom he had raised from birth. After a successful combat in which he manifested a considerable degree of military strategy, Abram returned and was met in the king's dale by the king of Sodom. There came to meet him also the patriarch of the Jebusites, Melchizedek, who combined the functions of king of Salem and priest of the most high God (Genesis 14).

All of this demonstrates quite conclusively that long before the days of Abram, a petty sovereignty existed in every part of the populated earth. Such a development was a natural result of the primacy of the father as ordained by God, when descendants became sufficiently numerous as to justify a consolidated government. And while God made a special covenant with Abraham, which was established unto Isaac, he also promised that Ishmael would beget twelve princes, and be made a great nation (Gen. 17:20) although Ishmael was not in the covenant.

As a sovereign, Abraham commanded his children and his household after him (Gen. 18:19), negotiated peace pacts with neighboring kings and their chiefs of staff (Gen. 21:22-32), arranged for purchase of territory with guarantee of title, and insurance of the same for protection to posterity (Gen. 23), and disposed of personal property on the basis of his own will (Gen. 25:5, 6).

In ordaining the patriarchal system, the Lord arranged for a successor to the ruling father, to assure that in his absence or death the divine service would not be neglected. The oldest son was given the responsibility of mediatorship in behalf of the remainder of the family. That this right of primogeniture was known even to the sons of Adam is evident in the words of the Lord to Cain, who was angry because his sacrifice was not recognized as valid, "Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted . . . And unto thee shall be his (Abel) desire, and thou shalt rule over him" (Gen. 4:6, 7). It was his despisal of this sacred obligation which caused Esau to be branded irreligious as well as immoral, when he bartered his birthright for a mess of pottage (Heb. 12:16). As a compensation for his increased accountability the oldest son was granted a double share of the patrimony upon the death of his father.

The first dispensation continued for twenty-five hundred years before it was replaced with the introduction of a system of national religion to the posterity of Abraham. During its long tenure the foundation was laid for succeeding dispensations. Even with the giving of the constitution to Israel at Sinai the only ones affected were the children of Israel, the remainder of the nations continuing under the provisions of the original arrangement. And since the family constituted the basis of the nation of Israel, the social worship under the guidance of the father was destined to continue in each family, although all of the tribes in the aggregate formed one large family bound together by consanguinity, and with each man wearing the distinctive mark of circumcision.

The theocracy continued in the Mosaic economy, although now the Lord was recognized as the peculiar king of his chosen heritage. The national constitution was first announced orally at Sinai and then written down for future reference. The people did not elect delegates, nor pass their own laws, but the statutes and judgments were delivered from heaven, the royal city. Although human agents were used to execute and enforce the constitutional law, it still remained that the Lord was supreme director of national affairs.

In the wilderness sojourn, Moses and Aaron were the recognized custodians of the public welfare. No attempt to supplant them was tolerated, and those who conspired to do it were publicly charged with being "against Jehovah" (Num. 16:11). When Moses was apprised of his approaching death, he petitioned God to name his successor to lead the people after his decease, so they would not be as sheep without a shepherd (Num. 27:16, 17). He was instructed to see that Joshua was publicly acclaimed with a becoming ritual. "Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders who prolonged their days after Joshua, and who knew all the work of the Lord which he did to Israel" (Josh. 24:31).

"And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died at the age of one hundred and ten years . . . and all that generation were also gathered to their fathers; and there arose another generation after them, who did not know the Lord or the work which he had done for Israel. And the people of Israel did what was evil in the sight of the Lord and served the Baals; and they forsook the Lord, the God of their fathers, who had brought them out of the land of Egypt" (Judges 2:8-12).

"So the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he gave them over to plunderers, who plundered them; and he sold them into the power of their enemies round about, so they could no longer withstand their enemies . . . Then the Lord raised up judges, who saved them out of the power of those who plundered them. And yet they did not listen to their judges; for they played the harlot after other gods and bowed down to them" (Judges 2:14-17).

"Whenever the Lord raised up judges for them, the Lord was with the judge, and he saved them from the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge; for the Lord was moved to pity by their groaning because of those who afflicted and oppressed them. But whenever the judge died, they turned back and behaved worse than their fathers . . . they did not drop any of their practices or their stubborn ways" (Judges 2:18, 19).

The period of the judges is one of the most interesting, yet one of the most difficult to comprehend of all the eras in the checkered career of Israel as a nation. The problem is made more acute due to the sparsity of material in the inspired record, which introduces them in rapid succession, paints a picture of their exploits and ushers them off the stage before the observer has had a chance to study them. It is often possible to grasp significant facts about an office or function among God's people by comparison or contrast with a similar office in contemporary nations, but in this we are at a total loss. Other nations had their elders, kings, captains of the host, secretaries, priests and tribal heads, as did Israel, but the latter stands alone in ancient history as far as the judges are concerned.

These shophetim, as the original Hebrew would have it, from the meaning of the term, were "rulers of the people." Perhaps the people generally had a voice in their selection. This was true in the case of Jephthah, the outcast son of a harlot, who collected about him a group of worthless fellows as marauders and raiders. When the Ammonites declared war on Israel, the elders of Gilead went to the hide-out of Jephthah with the invitation, "Come and be our leader." Jephthah naturally pointed out that in his distress they had driven him from his father's house, and asked, "Why have you come to me when you are in trouble?" Upon receiving assurance of their recognition of his ability, Jephthah said, "If you bring me home again to fight with the Ammonites, and the Lord gives them over to me, I will be your head." To this stipulation the elders agreed with Jephthah, who then accompanied them, "and the people made him head and leader over them" (Judges 11:1-11).

It should be noted that the judges recognized themselves as being mere instruments of God, and even Jephthah the raider, acknowledged the power of victory belonged to the Lord. It is interesting to recall that "Jephthah spoke all his words before the Lord at Mizpah," which simply means that at this holy place God was called upon to witness the agreement made with the elders and to ratify it. Thus the theocratic government was not disturbed by the arrangement for these special rulers under divine sanction. This fact is emphatically emphasized in the case of Gideon. After his notable victory over the kings of Midian, the men of Israel attempted to set up a dynasty, with the words, "Rule over us, you and your son and your grandson also." But Gideon said to them, "I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you; the Lord will rule over you" (Judges 8:22, 23). This is enhanced by the New Testament reminder of Gideon, Barak, Samson and Jephthah, "who through faith conquered kingdoms and enforced justice" (Heb. 11:32, 33).

At this juncture of our study of the unfolding of God's plan it will be wise for us to pause for orientation of our thinking. During the patriarchal dispensation, the realm of mankind was under a theocracy (rule of God). This was effective as a restraining influence only so long as the growing nations recognized and worshipped the one true and living God. However, the worship of a plurality of gods, imaginary, natural, and artificial, became almost universal. At the time when all the nations had selected their gods, the God of heaven selected a nation, for the specific purpose of keeping alive the monotheistic concept on earth, that he might achieve his purpose in the salvation of men.

Calling an individual out from the idolatrous practices to which his father was already addicted, the Lord promised to make of him a great nation. When a sufficient posterity had accumulated under bondage in Egypt, they were led forth with no military might being manifested, and were confirmed as a constitutional theocracy before being given the territory which had long since been designated as their own.

The provisions of the constitution at Sinai were wisely designed to strengthen the theocracy. All males were required to appear before the Lord thrice annually (Exo. 23:17). After six years of cultivation the land was to lie fallow for one year during which the people all assembled at Jerusalem before the Lord at which time the entire law was read in their hearing. Twice each day a sacrifice was to be offered at the place where God said he would meet and speak to them. He further declared, "I will dwell among the people of Israel, and will be their God. And they shall know that I am the Lord their God" (Exo. 29:42-45).

If a slave wanted to remain with his master, the master had to "bring him to God" and bore his ear through with an awl (Exo. 21:6). If it was alleged that something left in trust was stolen, the owner of the house was required to "come near to God" and exonerate himself from implication (Exo. 22:8). In event of any breach of trust both parties had to "come before God" and the one whom God condemned had to pay double indemnity (Exo. 22:9). In any case requiring expert decision in matters of homicide, civil rights, or aggravated assault, the parties had to repair to the place chosen by God, and submit the case to the Levitical priests, and to the judge who was currently in office, and when a decision was rendered it had to be accepted without recourse to further appeal, upon penalty of death (Cp. Deut. 17:8-12). All of this was calculated to augment the theocratic government in the eyes of the people.

Unfortunately, however, because of the indifference, unconcern, and stubborn attitude of the people, the government was not carried out to its furthest extent as intended. After the decease of Joshua there was a relapse into tribal divisions with each tribe on its own, and with no real adherence to the rules relative to a strong central government. There was no enforcing agency for the laws, and no punitive power for violation of them. Israel could not seem to grasp the concept of a King who was omniscient, omnipotent and eternal. They did not appeal their cases unto him for his divine judgment. Since they had no strong central officer and did not recognize the majesty of God's kingship, conditions became chaotic, as indicated by the closing verses of Judges: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (Judges 21:25).

Certainly the provision for judges was better adapted to the maintenance of the theocratic system than any other. The judges were recognized as direct agents to enforce obedience to the Great King. They held office by divine appointment, receiving their commission either directly or by heavenly sanction, and thus were more dependent upon God than a monarch would be. They did not have a dynastic approach to government, nor seek to perpetuate themselves and their posterity in control, by force or political maneuvering. Their graver decisions were made with the cooperation of God through revelation, by means of the Urim and Thummim (Num. 27:21), and thus the authority of heaven was always recognized. They disclaimed royal privileges and prerogatives and constantly called Israel back to a trust in God and his word.

Nothing is more apparent than the fact that after settlement in Canaan, motivated by a fierce sense of tribal jealousy, Israel was separated into various segregated units. In time of national emergency the first thought would be for a central figure of strong personal influence, exalted as king to lead the people in war and to secure victory. To this system they would naturally gravitate through example of other nations about them, and by fear for their own survival. But it is easier to select a king than to dismiss one. And kings may continue a state of terror and emergency to perpetuate themselves in power.

Nations felt called upon through a sense of patriotic pride to maintain royalty in such splendor as to excel others about them. The sons of a king are often profligate by reason of their rearing in a state of pampered luxury. The permanency of a kingdom breeds arrogance and dictatorial supremacy. But the judges were raised up for a special need and were temporary in their functions. Perhaps it was this relation of the special deliverers and rulers to the theocracy which makes them without counterpart in other contemporary nations. If so, it is to be regretted that the system was ever displaced by a kingly rule.

Theocracy and Monarchy

Contents

The earnest student of the Bible is made constantly aware of the manner in which the Lord turns the perverseness and iniquity of men into instruments for accomplishment of his purpose. Thus the brothers of Joseph moved by envy and jealousy sold him into bondage, only to have him later tell them, "As for you, you meant evil against me, but God meant it for good" (Gen. 50:20). The psalmist declared, "Surely the wrath of men shall praise thee" (Psalm 76:10). A good instance of this is found in the clamor of Israel for their first king.

When Moses rehearsed the law, he anticipated that Israel would some day cry out for a monarch. They had lived for generations in Egypt under a king, and it would be natural for them to ascribe to the king, all of the wealth, power and prestige of this advanced and enlightened nation. Too, when there is danger of attack from a foreign power, men tend to turn to a strong leader, and it is a common thing for a military hero to be given prominence when victory is won. As a safeguard for the theocratic government in such an eventuality, Moses laid down certain stipulations governing the election of a sovereign ruler. These may be found in Deuteronomy 17:14-20 and are as follows:

1. No one must be chosen as king who was not a native born Israelite. A foreigner could never be designated as king and this was a very wise arrangement, for Israel was to be segregated from other peoples to prevent amalgamation and loss of national identity. One who was an alien might not appreciate God's purposes in this regard, and a foreigner might think more of his native land and its customs and habits than of the preservation of the ideals of the elect nation.

2. They could set as a king over them only one "whom the Lord your God will choose." This would tend to eliminate rivalry, political maneuvering and the installation of those who would exploit the people for personal gain. The first king was chosen by lot at Mizpah when Samuel assembled all Israel for the public selection, but the acceptance was not unanimous at first, some worthless fellows deprecating Saul's ability (Cp. 1 Sam. 10:17-27). In the case of David, the Lord ratified his choice by saying, "Arise, anoint him, for this is he" (1 Sam. 16:12). With the introduction of this family into royalty God made the throne hereditary, that the Messiah might establish his right to David's throne.

3. The king was instructed that "he must not multiply horses for himself, or cause the people to return to Egypt in order to multiply horses, since the Lord has said to you, 'You shall never return that way again.'" The purpose of this prohibition was dual in nature. It should be remembered that the ancients did not use the horse as a beast of burden. The ox and the ass were used for menial service. The horse was used exclusively for warfare and became a prophetic symbol of war, either literal or spiritual. Israel was permitted by divine constitution to maintain a standing army for resistance of aggression, but as the land was subdued by infantry it was to be so protected and defended. Ancient nations with highly organized cavalry units became aggressors and sought the lands of others, but God wanted his people to be satisfied within their own boundaries, where he promised them "milk and honey" to sustain them.

Another reason for this restraint was found in the fact that Egypt was the great horse mart of the world, and the Lord did not want his people to engage in traffic with the Egyptians, lest by their interchange of trade pacts, exports and imports, and general bartering back and forth, the people of Israel be persuaded to return to this land of their former degradation, and adopt the idols thereof as they did in the case of the golden calf of Aaron's construction, undoubtedly a reproduction of the Egyptian bull god Apis, with which they were so familiar.

4. The king was further forbidden to "multiply wives for himself, lest his heart turn away." Most of the oriental monarchs maintained harems for gratification of carnal lust. The tendency to strengthen political position by marrying foreign women of royal extraction is well known to every student of history, both sacred and profane. Such women brought with them their foreign deities, and often seduced the king to worship such, using all of the wiles of feminine flattery and appeal.

5. Again the king was not to "greatly multiply for himself silver and gold." The accumulation of wealth leads to avarice and luxury, which in turn breeds sensuality and licentiousness. The people become impoverished through the heavy burden of taxation, pampered princes are rendered incapable of ruling justly, and decadence of morals obtains at a time when the gold and silver are piled highest in the realm.

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey;

Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

It was further required that upon accession to the throne, the king had to personally copy down in a book the complete law, securing for this purpose the original which was kept in trust by the Levitical priests. This copy he had to keep with him and "read in it all the days of his life," thus constantly refreshing his memory relative to the statutes and commandments of God. This is an important factor for it is proof that the theocracy was not discontinued from the accession of an earthly monarchy, but the kings were to be recognized as mere envoys of the Lord.

They could not enact laws, nor could they repeal or revoke old ones. All legislative power remained with God, and the king was not absolute in authority, but merely an executive to enforce the laws of the Lord.

7. The solemn charge was given to the king that he was not to be proud or arrogant, and his heart was not to be lifted up above his brethren. With this judicious restriction upon him, the king would recognize himself as a special servant of the brotherhood rather than a despot over slaves. Conscious ever of his own shortcomings and of the standing and position of his friends, he would not assume cruel and dictatorial attitudes. It is worthy of remark that when the first king was anointed, "Samuel told the people the rights and duties of the kingship, and he wrote them in a book and laid it up before the Lord" (1 Sam. 10:25).

The First King

The eventuality for which Moses prepared the people finally came to pass. Samuel, the first national prophet, in his old age, anointed his sons Joel and Abijah with him as judges and administrators, with headquarters in Beer-sheba. These sons were unlike their father in character, and being greedy for gain, they accepted bribes and perverted justice. Their malfeasance in office gave Israel an occasion to petition for a king. Their real reason seems to have been a national pride which demanded a king to be like the nations around them.

Samuel was greatly perturbed when all of the elders of Israel presented their demand at Ramah, but God told him to grant their request for it was he whom Israel had really rejected from being king over them. After the prophet had predicted that the choosing of a king would result in a forced military draft, excessive taxation and virtual enslavement of the populace, all of them even more vociferously demanded such a monarch.

Accordingly, a Benjamite named Saul, the son of Kish, was notified at the conclusion of a private feast that he would become king. Shortly afterwards, in a great conclave at Mizpah, he was designated by divine lot, and Samuel said, "Do you see him whom the Lord hath chosen?"

Although a few dissented and despised Saul, he soon became a national hero as the result of a victory over Nahash, an Ammonite king, but refused to exercise vengeance upon those who had previously derided him. At this time Saul gave credit to the Lord, declaring that he had wrought deliverance in Israel. After this victory, Samuel summoned all of the people to Gilgal where he publicly and solemnly anointed Saul, and took advantage of the occasion to recount the deeds of God, justify his own conduct in office, and demand that even the slightest deviation from the path of rectitude as a judge be pointed out. When the multitude acknowledged the purity of his administration he censured them severely for demanding a king, but said, "If you will fear the Lord and serve him and hearken to his voice and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord, and if both you and the king who reigns over you will follow the Lord your God, it will be well; but if you will not hearken to the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord, then the hand of the Lord will be against you and your king" (1 Sam. 12). The abdication of Samuel and the transfer of duties to the new regime officially ended the period of the judges, although Samuel continued in the office of national prophet.

Mistakes of Saul

Saul had been fully informed of the nature of his rule, and it was impressed upon him by Samuel that he was merely a viceregent of the Lord. Under no circumstances was the king to be permitted to make laws, or to alter, amend and suspend them. He was to receive the word of God upon every occasion through the mouth of the prophet and act in accordance with the divine communication. But at the first real test, Saul failed. His son Jonathan, who was a lieutenant with a thousand men under his command, captured a Philistine fortress, whereupon Saul summoned the people to Gilgal for a general attack. But when the Philistines put a large force of both infantry and cavalry in the field, the Israelites crept like cravens into caves, cisterns and tombs, and scattered from Saul. The king had been told by Samuel to wait for him seven days at Gilgal, but on the seventh day when Samuel had not appeared, Saul became frantic and intruded upon the office of the priests by personally offering sacrifices. No sooner had he done so than Samuel appeared.

Saul demonstrated by his own language that he had acted in full knowledge of his sin, and Samuel said, "You have done foolishly; you have not kept the commandment of the Lord your God which he commanded you; for now the Lord would have established your kingdom for ever. But now your kingdom shall not continue; the Lord has sought out a man after his own heart; and the Lord has appointed him to be a prince over the people, because you have not kept what the Lord commanded you" (1 Sam. 13:13, 14).

It is apparent that Saul either never fully grasped his relationship to the theocratic government, or was so self-willed and obdurate as to render it impossible for him to properly function in such an arrangement. Motivated by political aspirations, influenced by fear of the people, and nervously upset by any temporary hitch in his plan, he acted impulsively and impetuously.

The character of Saul was forcibly manifested in another test of his willingness to conform to God's arrangement. He was given a direct order from the Lord to completely destroy the Amalekites, and to eradicate both man and beast among them. However, Saul and the people retained the choicest sheep and oxen and also spared the life of Agag, the king. When Samuel came to him at the instigation of the Lord, he asked him, "Why did you not obey the voice of the Lord? Why did you swoop on the spoil, and do what was evil in the sight of the Lord?" (1 Sam. 15:19). After an ineffectual attempt to argue the case, Saul said, "I have sinned; for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord and your words, because I feared the people and obeyed their voice."

The final demonstration of headstrong disregard of divine commands, caused the Lord to repent that he had made Saul king (1 Sam. 15:11). Samuel said to the cringing and disobedient monarch, "The Lord has torn the kingdom from you this day, and has given it to a neighbor of yours, who is better than you." After this Samuel did not see Saul again until the day of his death, but he continued to grieve over Saul.

With the end of this initial dynasty approaching we should recapitulate and refresh our minds concerning the rule of God over Israel.

1. The termination of the judges and the introduction of the kingship did not affect the theocratic principle. The chief difference seems to have been that while the former received their instruction by consultation with the Urim and Thummim, the latter were apprised of the will of God by prophets.

2. The regnancy of Benjamin, the smallest tribe, through the family of Saul, could have been established over Israel during the whole Mosaic Dispensation (1 Sam. 13:13).

3. The forfeiture of this right through the stubbornness of Saul, provided an opportunity for the Lord to achieve his will in establishing the tribe of Judah in the kingship; just as the wilfulness of the whole nation in demanding a king, made possible the introduction of the system which was a prelude to the reign of the Messiah, which was to grow out of the theocracy.

4. The successor to Saul, David, was a man after God's own heart, and better than Saul, because of his proper concept of relationship in the kingdom. As an individual, David had many private shortcomings, but in his official standing in relationship to the rule of God, he was faultless. Although guilty of great and grievous personal crimes, he was without flaw in his official concept of the theocracy.

5. David demonstrated this even prior to his coronation. Saul constantly sought to kill him and "was David's enemy continually" (1 Sam. 18:29). Once, when David and his men were sitting in a cave, Saul entered alone to attend to the demands of nature, and David's men urged him to slay his enemy. Instead David cut off the skirt of Saul's robe, and then was filled with remorse, saying, "The Lord forbid that I should do this thing to my ruler, the Lord's anointed, to put forth my hand against him, seeing he is the Lord's anointed" (1 Sam. 24:6).

6. It was David's constant recognition as given in his own words, "The Lord is king for ever and ever" (Psalm 10:16) that enabled the Lord to say to him that his son should succeed him, "But I will not take my steadfast love from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before you. And your house and your kingdom shall be made sure for ever before me; your throne shall be established for ever" (2 Sam. 7:15, 16).

We are thus ready to begin our investigation of the accession of Judah to the kingship, and of the throne of David, upon which the Messiah was to sit. And we cannot but recall the words of the aged Israel as he summoned his sons to his dying bedside. "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs; and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples" (Gen. 49:10). That this is a prediction of the reign of the Messiah to come, both Jews and Christians have generally agreed. The Jewish Targums paraphrase it: "Until the time when the King Messiah comes to whom it belongeth." The following observations are in order.

1. With the investiture of the regal rights upon Judah there would be a guarantee that regardless of what defections might arise, there would be no absolute termination of the kingly prerogatives in the eyes of the descendants of Israel until the advent of the Messiah.

2. This would demand that regardless of the amalgamation and disruption of other tribes, the tribal identity of Judah would be maintained until the coming of the Messiah.

3. The destruction of tribal identity in such a manner as to render it impossible to trace the lineage or descent therefrom, would be positive proof that the Messiah had already come. No Jew upon earth today can designate or point out the tribe of Judah. Herein is found one of the greatest proofs that the Messiah has come.

4. The relationship of the rule of God over the fleshly descendants of Abraham to that of the Son of God over the spiritual descendants of Abraham is clearly shown. The sceptre was granted to Judah on a temporal basis only until he comes to whom it belongs.

5. No one can understand the rule of God's anointed by ignoring the rule of God under the prior dispensation. The roots of "the kingdom of God" reach far back into the past. It is with becoming reverence that we prosecute our research further into the divine purpose as revealed.

The Throne of David

Contents

It is not our purpose in this volume to investigate the private life or public affairs of David, the son of Jesse, except as his career is entwined with the subject of the kingdom of God. Upon the death of Saul, the captain of his army, Abner, conspired to have Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, inaugurated as king over the major part of Israel. Judah recognized David as king, and he reigned in Hebron more than seven years, during which time a war was carried on between his forces and those of Ish-bosheth, until the latter was assassinated while taking a mid-day siesta in his own home. Upon the death of Ish-bosheth David was made king over all Israel, and reigned thus for thirty-three years more.

David became conscience-stricken over the fact that he resided in a new house of cedar while the ark of the covenant was yet housed in a tent when in its sacred repository. So he announced his intention of erecting a suitable temple for the service of God, but was restrained from doing so by Nathan the prophet, who nevertheless gave him great comfort and assurance, by conveying the promise of God in these words, "When your days are fulfilled and you lie down with your fathers, I will raise up your son after you, who shall come forth from your body, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will be his father, and he shall be my son . . . And your house and your kingdom shall be made sure for ever before me; your throne shall be established for ever" (2 Sam. 7:12-16).

1. This is a good example of a prediction with a two-fold meaning. It is possible for him who knows all things from the beginning to use a contiguous event to shadow a remote one, and so to phrase his message that the language can apply to either.

2. The immediate revelation concerned Solomon, whose rule was to be assured after the death of David, and the house he would build for the Lord was the temple in Jerusalem.

3. The establishment of the house and kingdom of David was a guarantee that there would be no superseding of the dynasty by another, as in the case of Saul.

4. That there is a deeper meaning to be derived from the prophecy, and that it relates to the reign of the Messiah is definitely shown by the Holy Spirit, so that it is not reckless assumption to state that the Lord, through Nathan, was giving a pre-view of his kingdom purpose.

5. The apostle Peter, upon the first Pentecost after the resurrection of Jesus, applies the prophecy directly to him. "I may say to you confidently of the patriarch David that he both died and was buried, and his tomb is with us to this day. Being therefore a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that he would set one of his descendants upon his throne, he foresaw and spoke of the resurrection of Christ" (Acts 2:29-31).

6. Upon the basis of the statement to David, the angel Gabriel, in the annunciation of the birth of Jesus, declared, "The Lord God will give to him the throne of his father David, and he will reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there will be no end" (Luke 1:32, 33).

7. That the prophecy reaches far beyond Solomon is affirmed by the writer of Hebrews, who definitely quotes "I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son" (Heb. 1:5) as directly applicable to Jesus, as the Son of God.

A summary of the points set forth in this great prefiguration will show the following:

1. The Messiah was to be in the lineage, and a direct descendant of David.

2. The Messiah was to be raised up while David was still in his sepulcher. Thus the resurrection and exaltation of the Messiah was to be a special event prior to the general resurrection in which David would participate.

3. The kingdom of the Messiah was to be established on the throne of David, that is, it would be conditioned upon his succession as a member of the tribe of Judah and his relationship as an heir of David.

4. The Messiah would build a house for God in which God would dwell through the Spirit, even as he formerly dwelt in the tabernacle and temple through the Shekinah.

5. The kingdom of the Messiah was destined to continue for ever.

6. The Lord said to David, "He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever." But he added, "Your house and your kingdom shall be made sure before me." Thus the kingdom of the Messiah was to be directly related to that of David. Inasmuch as David was the first of Judah to wield the scepter, and he thus sat as the regal representative of the theocracy upon earth, it remains that this theocracy, as a rule of God, was to be transferred at some future date, while the body of David was in the tomb, to a descendant of his after the flesh, who would also be a Son of God. "I will be to him a father and he shall be to me a son." The theocracy vested in Judah would never be wholly supplanted "until he comes whose right it is."

The promise and purpose of God remained inviolate amidst the vicissitudes affecting the kingdom. The promise was repeated to Solomon, conditioned upon his fidelity (1 Kings 6:12), but when he became an idolater, the Lord told him, "I will surely tear the kingdom from you . . . However I will not tear away all the kingdom, but I will give one tribe to your son, for the sake of David my servant, and for the sake of Jerusalem which I have chosen" (1 Kings 11:11-13). This one tribe was to be given "that David my servant may always have a lamp before me in Jerusalem" (1 Kings 11:36). Even when succeeding kings became increasingly wicked, "the Lord would not destroy Judah, for the sake of David his servant, since he promised to give a lamp to him and to his sons for ever" (2 Kings 8:19).

Testimony of the Prophets

In the darkest days which the nation experienced, the prophets spoke of a brighter era to come, when God would raise up one as a witness, leader and commander for the peoples, and when he would make an everlasting covenant, which he designated "my steadfast, sure love for David" (Isa. 55:3, 4). Jeremiah predicted that the days were coming when a righteous Branch would be raised up for David. He was to reign as king, deal wisely, and execute judgment and justice. His regime was to be one of salvation and security. His name was to be called "The Lord our righteousness" (Jer. 23:5; 33:15). That this is a direct allusion to Jesus as the Messiah is proven by the two designations, "the Branch" and "the Lord." It was because of this that Jesus dwelt in Nazareth "that what was spoken by the prophets might be fulfilled. 'He shall be called a Nazarene'" (Matt. 2:23). The Hebrew word for Nazareth was Netzer, "a branch."

Ezekiel refers to the Messiah as David, and in his prophecy concerning the future welfare of Israel, declares, "I will set up over them one shepherd, my servant David, and he shall feed them: he shall feed them and be their shepherd. And I, the Lord, will be their God, and my servant David will be prince among them" (Ezek. 34:23, 24).

Again he quotes the word of the Lord, "My servant David shall be king over them; and they shall have one shepherd." God was to make a covenant of peace which was to be everlasting. He was to set his sanctuary in their midst for evermore, his dwelling place would be with them, he was to be their God, and they were to be his people (Ezek. 37:24-28). Surely this is a picture of Jesus and the church of God.

No consideration of the relationship of the Messiah to David and his kingdom would be complete without reference to Isaiah, chapter 9. The prophecy of this chapter in its primary sense is related to the circumstances existing at the time of its pronouncement, and begins with chapter 7. At the time, Ahaz was king of Judah, and Rezin and Pekah were the kings of Syria and Israel to the north. Tiglath-Pileser was king of the Assyrian nation and was bent on subjugating all of western Asia. To resist his advance, Rezin and Pekah formed a coalition, and conspired to overthrow the dynasty of David and install the son of Tabeal as king in Judah, so they could have a man more favorable to their purposes.

At this time, Isaiah was instructed to meet Ahaz at the conduit of the upper field on the highway to Fuller's Field, and encourage him to have no fear of the conspiracy. When Ahaz was requested to ask a sign from God, but refused, the prophet said a sign would be given anyway. A young woman would conceive and bear a son, and before the child reached the age of accountability, the land whose two kings were dreaded would be divested of any power to threaten. The immediate fulfillment was in the birth of Isaiah's own son, Maher-shalal-hash-baz, about whose birth, Isaiah was told to take a large tablet and write the facts, then seal up the testimony of his writing as a witness. When in dire distress, others would consult wizards and fortune-tellers, the faithful were to consult this teaching and testimony.

The introduction of chapter 9 portrays the fact that the land of Zebulun and Naphtali which lay far toward the north, adjacent to Syria, would be first overrun by Tiglath-Pileser, but in a brighter day would be restored. In a larger and spiritual sense this was applied to the personal ministry of our Lord in Galilee. "Leaving Nazareth he went and dwelt in Capernaum by the sea, in the territory of Zebulun and Naphtali, that what was spoken by the prophet Isaiah might be fulfilled:

"The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, toward the sea, across the Jordan,

Galilee of the Gentiles—

the people who sat in darkness have seen a great light, and to those who sat in the region and shadow of death light has dawned" (Matt. 4:13-16).

To assure Ahaz of the permanency of the rule of David, and thus to offset the fear of the conspirators to unseat him in favor of the son of Tabeal, a remarkable prophecy is provided:

"For to us a child is born, to us a child is given;

and the government will be upon his shoulders, and his name will be called Wonderful Counselor,

Mighty God;

Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace.

Of the increase of his government and of peace

there will be no end, upon the throne of David, and over his kingdom, to establish it and uphold it with justice and with righteousness from this time forth and for evermore" (Isa. 9:6, 7).

Thus the reign of the Messiah in a golden future age is depicted, when justice and righteousness shall govern for ever, when the expansion of benign rule and the growth of peace will be boundless, through the ministration of him who sits upon the throne of David.

"When the oppressor is no more,

and the destruction has ceased, and he who tramples under foot has vanished from the land, then a throne will be established in steadfast love and on it will sit in faithfulness in the tent of David one who judges and seeks justice and is swift to do righteousness" (Isa. 16:4, 5).

Despite the years of exile, spiritual destitution, and subservience to foreign powers, the hope was held aloft that regardless of the low estate into which the kingdom fell, there would be a glorious revival, and the dawning of a better and brighter day of peace, reclamation and restitution.

"In that day I will raise up the booth of David that is fallen and repair the breaches, and raise up its ruins, and rebuild it as in the days of old" (Amos 9:11).

Because of the prophecy related to this "that the rest of men may seek the Lord, and all the Gentiles who are called by my name," the apostle James, at Jerusalem, directly applied this to the church and successfully squelched the attempt to bind circumcision upon Gentile converts to the Christ (Acts 15:16-18). The tent of David which sagged through neglect and indifference, which was breached by idolatry and ruined by sin, has been rebuilt upon a far better scale, by the one who is "a minister in the true tent which is set up not by man but by the Lord" (Heb. 8:2).

It is no wonder, in view of all that we have thus learned, that the Messiah personally refers to himself as "the holy one, the true one, who has the key of David" (Rev. 3:7). The word "key" in prophetic symbolism signifies "authority," especially in granting or barring entrance, that is, in opening and closing. At some juncture between the time when the Lord promised David a son to sit upon his throne and the time when the apocalyptic vision revealed the Son of God with the keys, the kingdom of the Messiah became a reality, and the authority was transferred unto him "whose right it is." He is the "Lion of the tribe of Judah," and "the root and offspring of David" (Rev. 5:5; 22:16).

Testimony of David

The psalms of David bear personal witness to David's own faith in the Messiah. David is distinctly said to be a prophet (Acts 2:30), and it is affirmed that he was inspired by the Holy Spirit (Mark 12:36) and that the Holy Spirit spoke by his mouth (Acts 1:16; 4:25). To those who challenge the position that certain psalms are Messianic in content, we merely cite Luke 24:44 where Jesus declares that "everything written about me in . . . the psalms must be fulfilled."

One of the most interesting of the psalms of this nature is the second. In verses 1 and 2, kings, princes, Gentiles and the people, are pictured in conspiracy and tumultuous assembly for the specific purpose of thwarting the design of God and His Messiah. In verse 3 this motley horde of insurrectionists exclaim, "Let us burst their bonds asunder, and cast their cords from us." It is as if the nations resented the restraints imposed by God, and realized that the ascension of the Son to the throne would install him as a judge over the nations. To forestall this they attempt to prevent the coronation.

In verses 4-6, Jehovah is pictured as laughing in derision at the vain attempt of men to mock him and overthrow his eternal decrees. He then speaks out of his wrath, and terrifies them with his fury, "I have set my king in Zion, my holy hill." That the transactions here referred to are applicable to the plan of God relative to the Messiah is plainly demonstrated in the words of the Jerusalem congregation assembled for prayer. After quoting the first two verses of the psalm, they say, "For truly in this city there were gathered together against thy holy servant Jesus, whom thou didst anoint, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, to do whatever thy hand and thy plan had predestined to take place" (Acts 4:27, 28).

In verses 7-9 of the psalm, the Messiah personally speaks, reciting the decree of the Lord, as spoken unto him. "You are my son, today have I begotten you. Ask of me and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession. You shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." The language of verse 7 is quoted in Hebrews 1:5 as evidence of the superiority of Jesus to angels; and in Hebrews 5:5 as proof of his divine appointment to the priesthood of Melchizedek. The student should observe that "the day" in which he was begotten was not the date of his advent into the world, but of his resurrection from the dead. Paul declared in the Antiochan synagogue, "We bring you the good news that what God promised to the fathers, this he has fulfilled to us their children by raising Jesus; as also it is written in the second psalm, 'Thou art my Son, today have I begotten thee'" (Acts 13:32, 33).

The fact of the rule of iron, symbolizing firmness is attested to in Rev. 19:15, where a vision of Christ as "the Word of God" declares, "From his mouth issues a sharp sword with which to smite the nations, and he will rule them with a rod of iron; he will tread the winepress of the fury and the wrath of God the Almighty."

In view of this positive teaching that the Messiah was to be both the Son of God and His king, on what grounds do the Jews now reject him? Most of them seek to make the language of the psalm applicable only to David. This explanation fails upon several counts. First, there was no such general conspiracy or plot to keep David from becoming king as would warrant the language of the first two verses. Secondly, it was never the intent of God to make the nations the heritage of David, nor give him the remotest bounds of the earth for a possession. It is true that David defeated the nations adjacent to Palestine, and carried off gold and silver from Moab, Edom, the Ammonites, the Philistines, and Amalek. It is also true that "The Lord gave the victory to David wherever he went." But "David reigned over all Israel; and he administered justice and equity to all his people" (1 Chron. 18:11-14). The second psalm has reference to a greater and nobler king on the holy hill of Zion.

Psalm 16

This is another prophetic psalm with both a literal and extended meaning. In its primary sense it portrays the supreme trust of the author in God, who is declared to be his refuge, his sole delight, portion and cup. There is an interesting contrast in verses 3 and 4. The sole source of delight for the saints is God, but those who choose another god "multiply their sorrows." There are two sets of figures used. One is characterized by the words: portion, lot, lines, heritage. This is a reference to the subdivision of Canaan among the tribes and has to do with possession. God is affirmed to be the possession and dwelling-place of faithful saints. The other figure is found in the word "cup." The polytheistic heathen poured out their libations to their idols. The writer says "Their libations of blood will I pour out . . . The Lord . . . is my cup" (verses 4, 5).

In its remote sense, the psalm is a prediction of the triumphal resurrection of Christ, looking to his coronation. Peter quotes it on Pentecost to substantiate the fact that God had raised up Christ, "having loosed the pangs of death, because it was not possible for him to be held by it." This is predicated upon the statement of David, "I saw the Lord always before me, for he is at my right hand that I may not be moved; therefore my heart was glad, and my tongue rejoiced; moreover my flesh will dwell in hope. For thou wilt not abandon my soul to Hades, nor let thy Holy One see corruption" (Acts 2:24-27). Peter declares that David was a prophet and "foresaw and spoke of the resurrection of the Christ, that he was not abandoned to Hades, nor did his flesh see corruption" (verse 31).

Paul in his synagogue speech at Antioch, in Pisidia, quotes from both the psalms and the prophets (Psalm 2; Psalm 16; Isa. 55:3; Hab. 1:5). Speaking of Jesus, he says, "And as for the fact that he raised him from the dead, no more to return to corruption, he spoke in this way, 'I will give you the holy and sure mercies of David.' Therefore he says also in another psalm, 'Thou wilt not let thy Holy One see corruption.' For David, after he had served the counsel of God in his own generation, fell asleep, and was laid with his fathers, and saw corruption; but he whom God raised up saw no corruption" (Acts 13:34-36). Surely Psalm 16 is Messianic in nature.

Psalm 45

Passing over the beautiful and stirring Psalm 22, so descriptive of the agony and death of Jesus upon the cross, we notice Psalm 45, as more closely allied to the purpose of this book. The title designates it as "a love song" and the studious reader will observe that it is a song poem to celebrate the marriage of a king. The prelude is given in verse 1, where the writer declares he is "bubbling over" with a goodly theme, so that his tongue is as free with words as the pen of an accomplished scribe, when he addresses his verses to the king.

In verses 2-9, is a special ode to the bridegroom who "rides forth victoriously for the cause of truth and to defend the right." Verses 10-12 contain an address to the bride with the admonition that if "you will forget your people, and your father's house, the king will desire your beauty." A description of the pageantry in the bridal procession is furnished in verses 13-15, and a final address to the king culminates the song, so filled with beautiful Oriental imagery.

The psalm is of special interest in our investigation because it affirms to the king, "Your divine throne endures for ever and ever. Your royal scepter is a scepter of equity; you love righteousness and hate wickedness. Therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows" (verses 6, 7). The writer of the Hebrews appropriates through the Holy Spirit, this statement to advance his argument for the supremacy of the Messiah over the angels. After setting forth the idea that the Christ was superior because he had obtained a more excellent name than theirs, because angels were commanded to worship him, and because of the nature and mission of these celestial servants, he proceeds to establish it further by showing that Christ occupies the throne and wields the scepter in the kingdom. He clinches the argument with the citation that the anointing of the Messiah was beyond that of his comrades, i.e., his angelic associates in heaven. Of course, the character of the reign is shown in the fact that the scepter is one of righteousness, and its possessor one who loved righteousness, while detesting lawlessness.

We come now to consider one of the most remarkable of Psalms. Martin Luther declared it was "worthy to be set in a frame of gold and diamonds." It is a majestic tribute to one who was destined to be what David could not be, a combination of king and priest. The psalmist seems to be listening in on a conversation between God and His Son. He hears the former give an invitation, "Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool" (verse 1).

In prophetical symbolism, the "right hand" signifies a place of authority and power. The invitation is for Christ to occupy that place of authority. This indicates that the rule had previously belonged to God, else he could not transfer it. The theocracy is to give way to a Christocracy, a rule of God's anointed.

The transfer of power is to be for a specific time and a specific purpose. It is to be a rule of conquest. The enemies of God are to be conquered and subjugated. The authority is to be invested in Christ until that is accomplished. When the last foe has been rendered helpless and destroyed, the reign will cease. The term "footstool" as applied to an enemy comes from the ancient custom of a conquering chieftain forcing his vanquished foes to bow down while he placed his foot upon the prostrate forms and proclaimed his victory over them. You may read about this custom in Joshua 10:24.

It was this first verse of Psalm 110 which Jesus employed with such devastating effect against the Pharisees, after asking them, "What think you of Christ, whose son is he?" After the question and quotation "no one was able to answer him a word, nor from that day did any one dare to ask him any more questions" (Matt. 22:42-46; Mark 12:36).

Verse 2 says, "The Lord sends forth from Zion your mighty scepter. Rule in the midst of your foes." The former verse constitutes a report of a conversation or statement of God to His Son, but in this verse the Son is directly addressed. Again in verse 1, we read of the extension, nature, power and duration of the kingdom, but in this verse we learn of the place where the power will first be manifest, and from which it will go forth in universal dominion. It is for that reason loyal citizens of the heavenly regime are said to have "come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem" (Heb. 12:22). Here it is that the mighty scepter is wielded so effectively.

Verse 3 of the psalm affirms that the reign of the Messiah will not be manifested in an autocratic or despotic fashion. There will be no involuntary subjugation to the divine sway, upon the part of the subjects of the kingdom. "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power" is but an expression of voluntary submission to One who loved them and gave Himself for them. Contrary to the system under the old covenant which enrolled those who were infants and needed to be taught to know the Lord after enrollment, the arrangement under the Messiah requires that men first be taught to know the Lord, and then come to him by choice (Heb. 8:10, 11).

Verse 4 is one of great moment in the consideration of the divine purpose relating to the kingdom. It demonstrates that the Messiah was to occupy a two-fold position, being a priest as well as a king. "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek." Let us notice some of the points involved in this prediction.

1. It was so important in the divine plan that it was confirmed with a sacred oath. The Levitical priests were not inducted into office by oath, and the fact that the oath was a part of the inaugural ceremony of the Christ is urged as a proof of the superiority of his priesthood (Heb. 7:20-22).

2. The unchangeable and immutable nature of the prediction was manifest in the assertion that the Lord would not repent. This indicates an inflexible purpose, not subject to any alteration by virtue of condition or circumstance.

3. The promise here made implies a change of law. The Messiah was to be of the tribe of Judah "of which Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood" (Heb. 7:14). The Mosaic economy was to be superseded and abrogated. "For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law" (Heb. 7:12).

4. The priesthood of the Messiah would not be subject to change or be affected by law of succession. He was to be a priest "for ever." The Levitical priesthood was altered repeatedly by the demise of its occupants. "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death; but this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. 7:23, 24).

5. The priesthood of Aaron's sons was to be supplanted by that of the order of Melchizedek, who was so great that the patriarch Abraham honored him by presentation of tithes, and was blessed by him in turn (Heb. 7:4-6). Thus the Messiah was to be both king and priest upon his throne.

6. This fact is further predicted by Zechariah in his prophecy regarding the man whose name is The Branch (the Nazarene). It was declared that "He shall build the temple of the Lord; and shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest on his throne" (Zech. 6:13). Three facts are affirmed about his throne as follows: (1) He will sit on it; (2) He will rule on it; (3) He will be a priest upon it. When we find the Messiah sitting at the right hand of God, and acting in the capacity of a priest, we shall know he is upon his throne and ruling in his kingdom. One passage alone should be sufficient proof that the Messiah is now king and that the kingdom has come. "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (Heb. 8:1).

The temple of God has been erected. The tabernacle of David has been repaired and re-built. The scepter of Judah is even now in the hand of "him whose right it is." The reign of heaven is here. "The Branch" is sitting upon the throne of his father David. He is king and priest, mediator and intercessor, author and finisher of the faith, Alpha and Omega of our Hope. In him prophecy and history meet, and their united testimony confirms the eternal purpose.

The Stone that Became a Mountain

Contents

The book of Daniel provides a rich treasury of material for the student of the kingdom of the Messiah. Daniel was carried into exile in Babylon by the army of Nebuchadnezzar, in 606 B. C., when Jehoiakim, king of Judah was delivered into the hands of the Chaldeans. He was one of those youths who were "without blemish, handsome and skilful in all wisdom, endowed with knowledge, understanding learning, and competent to serve in the king's palace." Because of his fidelity, God gave him understanding "in all visions and dreams." The record bearing his name is a compilation of both prophecy and history. In it are found recorded not only the visions of Daniel, but also his interpretation of visions manifested to the heathen kings, Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar.

Our present purpose will not permit of an extended exposition of all the points in this remarkable book, and we must content ourselves with an analysis of one of the visions of Nebuchadnezzar, with occasional reference to other salient and relevant material. The reader is urged to read chapter 2 of Daniel, and to carefully note the contents.

Briefly the facts are these. Nebuchadnezzar had certain dreams which perturbed him greatly, troubled his spirit and drove sleep from his eyes. The actual dreams departed from his memory, so he summoned his court magicians and sorcerers, and demanded that they inform him of the dreams and then interpret them. Failure to do this would result in their being torn limb from limb, and their houses laid in ruins. The enchanters were in dismay, and said, "There is not a man on earth who can meet the king's demand."

This enraged the king who accused them of stalling for time, and in his fierce anger he ordered all of the wise men slain. Arioch, the captain of the king's guard, was entrusted with the mission of slaying the counsellors, which was to include Daniel, and his companions from the land of Judah. However, Daniel spoke with such prudence and discretion to Arioch, that he was permitted to go in and secure a reprieve for a stated time. Daniel returned to his house and with his friends petitioned God, who gave him the solution in a vision by night.

When Daniel was brought before the monarch, he made it clear that none of the Chaldean Magi could explain the mystery. He further declared that there was a God in heaven who revealed mysteries and had chosen this method of making known what would be in the latter days. This term, when used by the prophets, generally had reference to the age of the Messiah. That the dream and vision of the heathen king were prophetic, is evidenced by the following statement, "To you, O king, as you lay in bed came thoughts of what would be hereafter." We are about to study one of the most amazing revelations of the rise and fall of four great universal kingdoms, which were to be overthrown by a fifth world kingdom which would never crumble. The king to whom this was depicted was the head of the first of these, and it was appropriate that to him should be given the preview of the unfolding drama of world history.

The Dream

Nebuchadnezzar saw a giant figure of a man, luminous and imposing, which was awe-inspiring and frightening. The image was composed of different metals, having a head of gold, breast and arms of silver, belly and thighs of brass, legs of iron, and feet of iron mixed with clay. As the king viewed the image, a stone was quarried without use of human hands, and this stone dashed against the feet of the image with such force as to shatter them and topple the entire image in a mass of fragmentary debris which became like the chaff on a summer threshing floor, all of which was carried away by the wind until not a trace of the image remained. The stone then grew into a mountain of such proportion as to fill the whole earth.

The Components

It is essential that we list the various figurative elements which require notice in our attempt to understand the significance of this remarkable vision. They are as follows:

1. The head of gold.

2. The breast and arms of silver.

3. The belly and thighs of brass.

4. The legs of iron.

5. The feet of iron and clay.

6. The stone cut out without hands.

7. The mountain which filled the earth.

General Observations

In his interpretation, Daniel shows that the idolatrous image represents four mighty and successive world powers, of which the Chaldean (Babylonian), which then held him captive, was the first. The key to this part of the prophecy is found in the portrayal of this initial one of the four. "The God of heaven has given the kingdom, the power, and the might, and the glory. Into your hand he has given, wherever they dwell, the sons of men, the beasts of the field, and the birds of the air, making you rule over them all." This can be nothing less than world dominion. But this universal sway was to be transient and transferable, until a fifth kingdom was set up which would completely destroy the preceding four, and yet would itself never be destroyed. It is evident that the seed of decay which was in the first four would be wholly lacking from the fifth.

It is worthy of remark that the same four universal empires were also pictured to Daniel in a vision which is described in chapter 7. In his dream, however, they were viewed as fearsome wild beasts, rising successively from the agitated waves of the Mediterranean Sea, as it was churned and tossed by the four winds of heaven. To the proud and haughty heathen monarch, who was a worshiper of Bel and Nego, these mighty nations appeared as an impressive and awe-inspiring image; to the captive Daniel they appeared as ferocious, bloodthirsty, persecuting powers. The God of heaven adapts his revelation to the state of those to whom it is given.

The giant image represented prophecy in a systematic form. The various portions were composed of diverse elements, yet all were related to each other in such a fashion as to form one body, indicative of the idea that all were motivated and regulated by the same principle. There was no room between the divisions, but each was immediately successive to its predecessor, so that it would appear that each one after the first, grew out of the preceding one. The nations symbolized must be consecutive in order and appearance and as there was an unbroken and unified prophecy there must be the same kind of history in fulfillment of the prophecy.

It will be observed that the component elements were on a descending scale of values from the first through the last, starting with the head of gold and ending with iron mingled with clay. This denotes a natural deterioration in the empires prefigured. In prophecy, different metals are used to indicate various degrees of worth, excellence, dignity, political strength or durability. Clay or dust indicates weakness or instability. Thus, iron mingled with clay would represent an admixture of strength and weakness produced by coalitions and alliances of various kinds.

The nations of the world were assigned their places in prophecy only as they came in contact with the chosen people of God. When they maligned, persecuted or subjugated the elect, they appeared on the screen of God's predictions, to receive advance notice of their coming fate. Thus it was with Egypt (Jeremiah 46); the Philistines (Jeremiah 47); Moab (Jeremiah 48); the Ammonites (Jeremiah 49:1-6); Edom (Jeremiah 49:7-11), etc. The key to such prophecies is found in the pronouncement upon Moab: "Make him drunk, because he magnified himself against the Lord; so that Moab shall wallow in his vomit, and he too shall be held in derision. Was not Israel a derision to you? Was he found among thieves, that whenever you spoke of him, you wagged your head?" (Jeremiah 48:26, 27).

The four world empires symbolized in the giant image all held sway over the people of God in regular succession. The first, Babylon, made three expeditions against Jerusalem, finally, in 586 B.C., destroying both the city and temple. At this time, Zedekiah, king of Judah, was captured in the plains of Jordan, while attempting to escape to the Arabah. He was taken to the Babylonian king at Riblah, who slew his sons in his presence, put out his eyes, bound him in fetters and took him to Babylon. This fulfilled the statement of Ezekiel with reference to Zedekiah, who was called a profane, wicked prince. "Thus saith the Lord God: Remove the diadem, and take off the crown . . . Perverted, perverted, perverted will I make it, and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him" (Ezekiel 21:26, 27). Not another king of the lineage of David occupied the throne until he came "whose right it is."

It was in a strange land, when Judah was in exile, with no city, temple or daily sacrifice, that God reassured his people through Daniel's interpretation of the night vision of the haughty ruler who had carried them captive. In spite of sword, famine and pestilence, of slavery and bondage, God still knew his people. He had not forgotten his promise to David. Thus a calendar of history was presented in the form of a towering giant, and nation after nation would exercise universal dominion, until the fulness of time ushered in another kingdom which would smite the oppressing powers and vanquish them forever. There was destined to be a clash between the universal ambitions of the sons of men, and the benevolent rule of the Son of God, but the outcome was already determined. "The dream is certain and its interpretation sure."

The Heathen Monarchies

The four universal governments are plainly, identified in the Bible, the names of all being given. The stone smote the feet of the image, "thus indicating the time when the things it symbolized would be abrogated and destroyed. The kingdom of God was to be set up in the days of the fourth world power.

1. The head of gold. This represented the kingdom of the Chaldeans, or Babylonians. The first name was derived from the country, the second from the capital city (Dan. 4:29, 30). At the time of the vision, it embodied the vast territories of Chaldea, Assyria, Arabia, Syria and Palestine. It was aptly called "the hammer of the whole earth" (Jeremiah 50:23). But the doom of Babylon was decreed, and the power to overthrow her was named. "The Lord has stirred up the spirit of the kings of the Medes, because his purpose concerning Babylon is to destroy it" (Jeremiah 51:11). Accordingly, "Belshazzar the Chaldean king was slain. And Darius the Mede received the kingdom, being about sixty-two years old" (Daniel 5:30). This was in 536 B. C.

2. The breast and arms of silver. This is a symbol of Medo-Persia. This great power began with Darius the Mede, uncle to the Persian, Cyrus the Great. The latter became sole governor of Medo-Persia upon the death of Darius. That this is the kingdom which Daniel predicted would succeed the Chaldean, is evident from the handwriting which appeared upon the palace of Belshazzar, a part of which was thus interpreted: "Your kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians." This combined kingdom is mentioned in Daniel 5:28; 6:8, 12, 15; 8:20; Esther 1:3.

3. The belly and thighs of bronze. This symbolizes the third universal empire, which is the Macedonian, or Grecian. It was founded by Philip of Macedon, but received its greatest extension under his son, Alexander the Great, who swept like a flaming meteor across the world's surface. This young and daring general overthrew Darius Codomanus, at Arbela, October 2, 331 B. C., thus ending the famous Persian empire.

The appearance of brass, or bronze, in this part of the image is peculiarly appropriate. All historians of note mention the "brazen-coated Greeks." The famous Macedonian soldiers all wore armor of burnished brass, and carried shields and weapons of the same metal. The sunlight glinting from the armor when they assembled in battle array was dazzling and luminous.

The regime of Alexander was as brief as it was startling in its accomplishments. He died in B.C. 323 leaving no suitable heir or successor. As a result his kingdom was divided between his four chief generals, Cassander, Lysimachus, Ptolemy and Seleucus. Cassander received Macedon and Greece; Lysimachus received Thrace and the countries bordering the Hellespont; Ptolemy ruled over Egypt, Libya, Palestine and Arabia; while Babylon, Media, Persia and Assyria, fell to the lot of Seleucus. In process of time these were combined under two heads; the Lagidae in Egypt, and the Seleucidae in Syria. The kingdom of Greece is identified by name as the conqueror of Medo-Persia in Daniel 8:20, 21.

4. The legs of iron. This metal is a symbol of strength and crushing power. "There shall be a fourth kingdom, strong as iron, because iron breaks in pieces and shatters all things." History reveals the mighty Roman Empire as the fourth world power. Perhaps the two legs of the giant man signify the two divisions of the former empire which were combined to create the world dominion of Rome. The kingdom of the Seleucidae reached its culmination when Pompey defeated Antiochus in 65 B.C., that of the Lagidae was terminated in 30 B.C., when Octavius Caesar captured Alexandria, after having already defeated Anthony and Cleopatra at the battle of Actium. With these conquests, Rome became the mistress of the whole world. The iron hand had crushed, shattered and broken all opposition. That the kingdom of the Caesars was a world dominion is proven by Luke 2:1. That it was the empire whose capital was Rome is determined by comparing Acts 25:10-12 with Acts 28:16. All of the four kingdoms are named in the sacred scriptures.

5. The feet and toes of potter's clay and iron. "And as you saw the feet and toes partly of potter's clay and partly of iron, it shall be a divided kingdom; but some of the firmness of iron shall be in it, just as you saw iron mixed with the miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were partly iron and partly clay, so the kingdom will be partly strong and partly broken." The ten toes of the giant image are representative of the same thing as the ten horns of the fourth beast described in Daniel 7:7. These symbolize the ten divisions composing the Roman Empire.

Iron and potter's clay are the exact opposites in texture and nature. The first is strong and crushes all things; the second is fragile and easily shattered. Thus the fourth dominion was to maintain the power and strength to batter down all opposition, but at the same time was to possess such qualities of weakness and fragility as would prove its own undoing. The empire was "partly brittle" as a result of its methods of extension and growth. By force, treaty, colonization, coalition and intermarriage, vast portions of the habitable earth were brought under the dominance of Rome, but it is one thing to encircle diverse nations, and a totally different thing to absorb and assimilate them. Herein lay the weakness of Rome. She had the strength to capture but lacked the power and time to consolidate. "As you saw the iron mixed with miry clay, so they will mix with one another in marriage, but they will not hold together, just as iron does not mix with clay."

The Stone

In the vision, a stone appeared which was not cut out by human hand. It smote the image on the feet and shattered it. Daniel explained this as a picturization of the effect of a fifth universal dominion. It differed from the other four in the following points:

a. Origin

b. Effect

c. Nature

d. Durability

Insofar as origin was concerned, it was divine. The expression "without hands" indicates absence of all human agency. In Hebrews 9:24 it is said, "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands," which is the equivalent of saying he is "a minister of the true tabernacle which God pitched, and not man" (8:2). Our spiritual body is spoken of as "a house not made with hands" and this is said in the same verse to be "a building of God" (2 Corinthians 5:1). Thus, the kingdom of the stone was of divine origin.

The previous world powers were established and gained their universal dominion by human sagacity and ingenuity, by military genius and prowess, by force of arms and strategy of attack, but the kingdom set up by the God of heaven was not dependent upon any of these. Indeed its strength lay in the fact that it proceeded not from these considerations. "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, says the Lord of hosts" (Zech. 4:6).

The effect of the kingdom represented by the stone was altogether different than that of the previous powers. They merely absorbed and perpetuated the wealth, subjects, territory and spirit of their predecessors. Each preceding kingdom lived again in the acts and deeds of the one succeeding it, so that it might be said as spoken by the seer upon Patmos, "He exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him" (Revelation 13:12). The form, the seat of government, the officials and the sovereigns, these were changed with the coming of each regime, but the spirit and nature were perpetuated.

The Medes and Persians smote the Chaldeans, the Greeks smote the Persians, the Romans smote the Greeks, yet the man remained entire, the image was unbroken. Of these very kingdoms it was said, "They had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time" (Daniel 7:12). That which keeps a man alive is his spirit. The spirit of world dominion was not destroyed when Babylon, Medo-Persia and Greece fell to the superior powers which were actuated by the same motives. The stone smote the image with such force that "the iron, the clay, the bronze, the silver, and the gold, all together were broken in pieces." These became like chaff and the wind carried them away, so that not a trace of them could be found. The spirit which prompted such powers was to be forever crushed, and never to be resurrected while the earth remains.

This brings us to the fact that the nature of the kingdom of the stone was to be diverse from that of the universal monarchies. They exerted cruel and tyrannical pressure against the people of God. They were held together by idolatry and fear. But the kingdom of God would consist of the people of God, and would be maintained by faith and love. The world empires existed upon the principle that might makes right. This was the spirit which animated them. The kingdom of heaven is motivated by an opposite principle, that right makes might. This is the true source of power. These two could not exist side by side in God's universe and under his moral sway. So the stone was destined to clash with the image and as a result the idolatrous empires were to be swept away.

This clash of divergent ideologies was to come during the Roman empire. The stone smote the image upon the feet. This was an auspicious time for the Messiah to be enthroned and for the test to be made. Rome had subjugated the whole world. It was an era of peace upon earth. The kingdoms of men had reached their zenith. It was a golden age of the empire. The benign influence of Grecian culture bathed the intellects of men as the enervating rays of the sun falling upon the earth. Yet it was an age of lassitude, doubt and weariness. Faith in the old gods had been undermined, the servile classes were tired, helpless and hopeless. The temples of Jupiter and Apollo were still standing, but gone was that simple trust which once was placed in these imaginary deities. The cultured world had turned to Philosophy, which led its devotees into dead-end streets of human reasoning and left them no room to turn around.

The patrician of Rome believed that his city and empire would last forever. This was "the Eternal City." Religion consisted of absolute reverence of the emperor. The State represented the highest good. True patriotism consisted in this belief. To live and die for the state was the whole duty of man. The state was all in all. The Roman emperor as the highest representative of the state was the chief deity. At the altar erected to him sacrifices were offered which glorified the power and majesty of his universal sovereignty. The highest virtue attainable unto man was to devote his all to the state.

It was at this time Christianity, symbolized by the stone, was launched upon the earth. It was still just a stone, small in comparison with the giant image seen in the vision of the haughty Nebuchadnezzar. It had, as the captain of its host, one who had been crucified as a common criminal. Its emissaries were not politically powerful, rich, learned or cultured. They were tradesmen, soldiers, fishermen, publicans— the despised and poor of the world. But they challenged all to open combat. With a daring born of true conviction, they hurled down the gauntlet to philosophers and commoners alike. The issue was clear-cut. To the Christian, the highest of all things was not the mighty Caesar, nor the Roman empire. He rendered unto Caesar what was his, but declared his subjection to another and greater king. He asserted that Rome herself was not the hope of the universe, but rather declared that "here we have no continuing city." He insisted upon taking his message to all nations and of enlisting them under another standard than the golden eagle.

And Rome recognized the battle for what it was, the call to a battle which must end only when one of the militant foes was vanquished and "no trace remained." The charge was clearly stated: "They advocate customs which it is not lawful for us Romans to accept or practice" (Acts 16:21). The Christians were branded as atheists, haters of the human race, and enemies of virtue. Rome fought with insensate fury, with the sword, rack, stake, rope of strangulation, fire and dungeon. Her life and all she held dear was threatened. She must destroy all that was Christian, or go down for ever into oblivion. Every Christian was guilty of treason in the most aggravated form, and treason could be dealt with by only one penalty— death to the traitor.

The humble followers of the Messiah did not become dismayed, for their faith recognized no odds. They were valorous in life but victorious in death, for their courage was stronger than death. To the heathen death was the one thing to be most feared; to the Christian it was gain. These men knew how to die because they had learned how to live. Because they had something worthy to live for, they had something worth dying for. And if they taught the faith in life, they proved their faith in death. They met death, not with contempt or indifference, but in a certain and sure hope of victory. How could the pagan empire win? Every world empire had been launched upon the power to threaten death to its enemies. Now a new kingdom had arisen whose citizens rejoiced in death, welcomed the freedom it brought, and went to join their King by dying. The state could persecute men, abrogate deeds, kill bodies, but it could not with sword or fire touch faith— the faith which refused to worship any earthly thing, even the Roman state. The kingdom of the stone was different!

There was a contrast in durability also. "In the days of these kings the God of heaven will set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, nor shall its sovereignty be left to other people . . . and it shall stand for ever." The principle of self-destruction was contained in each of the heathen monarchies. As might decreased, others arose in strength and the sovereignty passed to other people. The Assyrians were lost in the Babylonians, they in turn in the Medes, these in the Persians, the Persians in the Greeks, the Greeks in the Syrians and Egyptians, these in the Romans, and the Romans in the Gothic hordes. This could be only because each monarchy had other rivals in the same field, and all that was essential to loss of sovereignty was the growth of a superior force. But no such rival exists, or can exist, in the field of the kingdom of God, for it is armed only with truth, and there can be no disharmony or conflict between truths.

The kingdom of the stone will continue as long as its Maker. Dying men establish dying realms; only a living God can establish an eternal kingdom. Truth is constant, unwavering, everlasting.

"Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,

The eternal years of God are hers;

While error wounded writhes in pain

And dies among her worshippers."

The dreams of the king, and the interpretation of the prophet, came at a time when the fortunes of Israel were at a low ebb. The Chaldeans had swooped down upon the holy city and the chosen people of God had been carried into exile beyond the Euphrates. Yet it was at this very time when the power of Babylon seemed invincible, and the people of the Lord appeared to be powerless, that God revealed the coming destruction of the former, and the ultimate triumph of His purpose. Is there not in this fact a source of cheer and hope in all ages when the faithful are harassed and troubled by the forces of this world? Man's extremity truly provides God's opportunity, and His grace is made perfect in man's weakness.

To those who have fled for refuge to the mountain that grew out of the stone there is no cause for fear. No weapon formed against it can prosper. No machinations of the evil one can shake its foundation. Security and peace can be found only in the kingdom that shall never be broken in pieces. Tyranny has its day, and despotism rules but a moment. History is filled with the accounts of puny men who sought to elevate themselves to the heights, only to have their hopes dashed and destroyed by the grasping hand of death. The road to greatness is not paved with the stones of selfishness, but with those of self-denial. The stone which crushed the giant image is destined to grind into powder every vain ambition of mankind.

The Mountain

The kingdom set up by the God of heaven did not appear as a mountain at first. When it clashed with the principle of tyranny as exhibited in the mighty empire of the Caesars it did so as a stone, which appeared insignificant in contrast with the giant image it was destined to destroy. It grew into a mountain. At first it occupied but a small and isolated part of the world. The process by which it filled the whole earth was one of gradual growth.

This accords with the facts. The might of Rome was challenged by a humble group of men and women, who were mainly slaves, uneducated, poor and despised. Without literal sword, spear or shield, and by the shedding of no blood except their own they met the challenge of world tyranny and overcame it. Within a few centuries the Caesars were toppled from their throne.

There will never be another world power such as was exhibited by Babylon, Persia, Greece or Rome. The ambitions of men may prompt them to seek universal sway over the nations of the earth, but they will be doomed to disappointment, frustration and defeat. Napoleon Bonaparte, the German Kaiser, Adolf Hitler— all these have suffered the fate which will overtake all who dare to defy the edict of prophecy. There were four universal empires of men, and no more. With the inception of the fifth, established by the God of heaven, demanding universal allegiance, there can never be another. A mountain in prophecy signifies a great kingdom, while hills signify lesser powers. "The mountain of the Lord's house is established in the top of the mountains and exalted above the hills."

There is one important fact which should not be overlooked in the symbolism of the giant man. The kingdom of God was pitted against four world dominions. It was not opposed to government as such. Its opposition was to four specific powers, and even then, not because they were governmental, but because of the spirit or principle which animated them. These powers were idolatrous (the giant image), and cruel (the wild beasts). The prophecy is clear. "It shall break in pieces all these kingdoms, and bring them to an end." Not all kingdoms, but all these kingdoms.

The giant image did not represent civil government, as such, in opposition to the kingdom of God. It represented four world tyrannies over men which existed as enslaving forces, through abuse of the principle of government. The kingdom of God has never set itself against the principle of government. It has never even sought to change or alter the form of government in any land. It is by nature opposed to evil, and recognizes that evil men may seize the governments of men and manipulate them to their own personal interest and gain, just as the same kind of men may seize control of the churches and "make merchandise of souls." But it does not oppose the right of civil government to exist to serve in its proper sphere because of abuses of power, any more than it opposes the right of the church to exist to serve in its proper sphere because of abuses of power.

So long as Caesar properly conducts civil affairs he acts within the sanction of God. In this respect, and in this respect only, he is a minister of God for good. If he infringes upon a field other than his own he is condemned, not because he is a civil ruler, but because he gets out of his place. The angels that sinned were not cast down to the pits of nether gloom because they were angels, but because "they did not keep their own position, but left their proper dwelling" (Jude 6). Other angels which did not over-step their boundaries, and other governments were not destroyed merely because the four great cruel pagan empires crushed out the rights of men. The great mistake of the sinning angels was rebellion against God. The grave error of the four heathen monarchies was in forgetting that they were ministers of God, and in seeking to become God.

The prince of glory, who was soon to be coronated as ruler upon the throne of heaven, announced the principle of his authority and its extent. "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." There are things within the realm of Caesar. They must be given unto him whose right they are. There are things that belong unto God. They must be given to him. They need not conflict. But emperor worship is sinful. Caesar is a servant of God. He is not God. When he seeks to become God he must be removed, not because he is Caesar, but because he thinks that he is God.

The God of heaven did not abdicate his universal moral dominion when he set up the special kingdom of David, nor has he relinquished it merely because his Son sits upon the throne of David. Civil government is merely an expression in systematic form of the united mind of society. It is a manifestation in codified form of a social consciousness, by which rights are recognized, the weak protected, the distressed relieved, the helpless provided asylum, and the properties certified and guaranteed to their owners. The ruler "is the servant of God to execute his wrath on the wrongdoer" (Rom. 13:4). So long as the ruler thus acts, he conforms to God's will and purpose.

So long as the kingdom of God exists, that long will this earth be safe from another universal dominion. But that kingdom will last for ever. It cannot be captured, overthrown or destroyed. Its sovereignty cannot be left to other people. There is no room upon earth for two kingdoms, utterly opposed to each other, both of which fill the whole earth. The mountain of God fills the whole earth. No other kingdom can again do so. In order to do that it would have to dethrone Jesus from his place in the hearts of men. And imperfect though our service be, as rendered unto him, yet his sovereignty, his right to rule, is recognized by countless millions scattered over the face of the globe.

"Joy to the world! the Lord is come;

Let earth receive her king;

Let every heart prepare him room,

And heaven and nature sing.

He rules the earth with truth and grace,

And makes the nations prove

The glories of his righteousness

And wonders of his love."

The Fulness of Time

Contents

The apostle to the Gentiles wrote, "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son" (Gal. 4:4). Mark records the initial proclamation of Jesus in these words, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand" (1:15). It would no doubt overwhelm us all to know the full complement of the expression "fulness of time." That it involved far more than a mere calendar date should be apparent to even a casual student. Certainly the God of the universe would not inaugurate a new creation without arranging every phase and feature of that universe which would in any manner affect his design.

We have already learned of the divine manipulation of history to accomplish a supreme purpose. It is but reasonable to conclude that all the earth would be readied to contribute to that great period when the heir to the kingdom would walk among men to associate with them and enunciate the fundamental and foundational principles of his reign. Of course, the marshaling of the forces of creation would not be understood by them, but as involuntary servants they would take their places in line until just at the proper moment nothing would be lacking. It would require a volume much larger than the one you hold to detail for you the essential forces working in coalition to achieve the divine purpose, but we can enumerate a few items which would materially assist the spread of the kingdom.

1. A universal empire which would grant protection and traveling rights to its citizenry, so that they might freely bear a message to every part of the earth.

2. A common tongue used especially by men in the commercial realm or the world of trade, so that writings circulated in such a language would be generally understandable.

3. Good roads which would speed the courier on his way and make it possible to hasten any news of importance.

4. Freedom of trade between nations, assuring that ships would regularly sail the seas and passenger vessels be available to the traveler.

5. An era of peace, and international tranquillity, that the message go not unheeded amidst the turmoil and strife of war, with its dangers and distractions.

6. A general air of expectancy which would enhance the eagerness for the reception of the message and guarantee that it would be readily considered.

7. A state of discontent with previous forms of religion, and a weariness with reference to the old worship, its rituals, and its sacrifices.

8. A yearning for fellowship and brotherhood which would create a favorable attitude toward any organization based upon these factors, rather than one of hostility toward that which is new.

9. A people who had been taught the elements of the new relationship, dispersed among the nations of the earth, regularly carrying on a worship akin to the one to be introduced, to act as a leavening influence.

The records of the first century bear witness to the fact that all of the above mentioned features were in absolute readiness. The whole world, religiously, morally, politically and intellectually was ripe for the greatest event of all ages. The guiding hand of divine providence, although unseen, surely and quietly moved the various parts of the world like chessmen on a gaming board, and the time had come for the mighty drama foretold by the ancient prophets, to be enacted.

No investigation of the reign of the Messiah can be complete which separates it from the preceding events of God's administration; none can be proper which ignores the contemporary picture. It is only when interpreted in the light of its setting that it can be evaluated with accuracy. In reviewing the aforementioned factors we are but touching the highlights of the subject, yet these may help to portray the pregnancy of the time.

1. The world of the first century was the empire of Rome. This fourth, and last, of the mighty universal political dominions, held undisputed sway over at least a hundred diverse races of men, and from the Rhine River to the bleak wastes of the Sahara Desert, one man controlled the earthly destiny of a polyglot mass of humanity. The Roman eagle was proudly held aloft as the standard of farflung units of a vast army. In every corner of the civilized world a Roman citizen found police protection. A violation of his civil rights would be reviewed by a procurator, and appeal could be made to Caesar's court if deemed necessary. Moreover, a citizen could freely cross the boundary line of any province or territory without a passport. The mere announcement of Roman citizenship was sufficient to guarantee safe and speedy passage. At no time in our modern world has it been possible to circulate among nations as easily as in that century when Jesus was born in Bethlehem.

The importance of this can be easily seen in the selection of Saul, a Cilician Jew, as ambassador to the Gentiles for the kingdom of God. A Roman citizen by birth, he traversed the provinces of his day unchallenged and undaunted. When beaten by the magistrates of a Roman colony, composed chiefly of the retired soldiers of the army of Augustus, he demanded dignified treatment and safe conduct and his demand was granted (Acts 16:36-39). He heard the town clerk disband a mob gathered to assault him, by pointing out that court sessions were held at appointed times, and there were proconsuls to judge, and illegal assemblies would be quelled by force of Roman arms (Acts 19:38-41). Once, when a group of furious Jews attempted to kill him, a squad of Roman soldiers rescued him and carried him into their barracks. The chief captain was stricken with fright because he had bound him and was about to scourge him (Acts 22:25-29). Upon demand for a bodyguard, 470 infantrymen and cavalrymen were assigned for his personal safety, and when he finally made an appeal to the hearing of Augustus it was immediately granted and ratified.

2. It is true that Rome subjugated Greece, and the remnants of the world conquest of Alexander the Great were amalgamated under the banner of the Caesars. But while Rome conquered Greece militarily, the conqueror fell to the conquered culturally. There was a strange fascination about Greek learning. Rude barbarians fell under its spell, foreign philosophers came in contact with it, and neither was ever the same again. Under the blue skies reflected in the Aegean waters, the inhabitants of Greece rose to new heights. Her poets, historians, philosophers and instructors were without rival elsewhere on earth.

Motivated by belief in lovely myths, she created architectural beauty, inaugurated glorious festal seasons, inspired literature, and endowed art with a new meaning. The Greek manner of life, singularly free from care, and dedicated to the enthronement of beauty and the recognition of skill permeated the whole life of the earth. And with the Greek merchants sailing their vessels to every major port of the known world, bartering, selling, trading, it is small wonder that the Greek language became an all but universal medium of communication. It was well fitted for this role, as it was expressive, thorough and comprehensible. No other language had so many keen distinctions; no other was so adapted to convey a message to all men. The koine (common) Greek was not only the language of the common man, it was at the time a language common to man. The law of the theocracy given to Israel was preserved in Hebrew, a language which seemed as exclusive and segregatory as the nation to whom it was given, but the new covenant was written for all men in a language which all could grasp. This was the great contribution of the Greeks to the kingdom of the Messiah— the vehicle for conveying the heavenly message to the world of mankind.

3. Rome was the greatest highway builder in the history of the world. Modern nations build more roads and better roads, but they can only build them to their territorial boundaries and trust that neighboring nations will extend them. Rome was not hampered by any such restraints. Possessed of tens of thousands of slave laborers, many of them taken captive in war, she had an abundance of cheap labor available. Her system of colonization, unique in its time, required a means of speeding proclamations and declarations. Accordingly, from the great city of two million souls, sprawled upon the banks of the Tiber, roads reached out as spokes from a hub to the "little Romes" which existed in remote parts of the empire.

Many of these were paved and maintenance crews continually kept them in repair. In some areas toll-gates were manned and a certain amount collected for each chariot, the money thus received going for upkeep. Inns and post houses were established at intervals to care for travelers. Couriers and postal carriers regularly carried dispatches and letters. One of the most famous of the roads was the Via Ignatia, which was paved for five hundred miles, and was marked with milestones throughout its entire length. It was on this road Paul traveled from Neapolis through Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, and to Thessalonica. Another famous pavement was the Via Appia called "the Queen of the Roads," the highway upon which Paul entered the city of Rome enroute from Puteoli. It was a two lane road of stones so perfectly joined together as to appear unbroken. Little did the Caesars realize when they constructed these military roads to their colonies, that over them would pass soldiers of the cross to plant "colonies of heaven" which would one day topple them from their imperial thrones.

4. The islands of the Mediterranean could only be reached by sailing vessels. This provided also the quickest route to large areas of the mainland. And during the first century commerce was at such a peak that major ports were crowded with vessels from every section. Long before, the sea-kings of Crete had made their island a center for receiving and discharging wares. From her harbors ships sailed forth to join overland trade routes, some of them centuries old. Commercial alliances were made, money-changing was a lucrative business, and customs and banking employed many men in every thriving maritime city.

The message of a king who was to reign universally could be carried by sailors, traders, merchantmen, and sales representatives, as well as by his appointed emissaries. One notes, as he reads the Acts of Apostles, how freely Paul and his companions moved about, and how easily they could book passage and pay their fare, as did Jonah so many centuries before. These men made frequent use of the coastwise shipping lanes and any one who reads chapters 20 and 21 of Acts, cannot help but be impressed with the frequency of sailings, the accuracy of schedules, and the thoroughness of the coverage of the sea lanes.

5. Historians all marvel at the peace which settled over the earth in the reign of Augustus. Even if this period had not been favored with the birth of the Son of God, it would still be a memorable epoch, one of the crowning ages of the history of mankind. In the month of January, 27 B.C., a regular and constitutional form of government was established. Octavianus was voted the title Augustus by the Senate, and while the old forms, functions and offices of the Republic were maintained in deference to popular sentiment, an absolute monarchy prevailed in all but name. By wise and judicious counsel, order was established in Rome, and the people in the provinces were made content by a just and understanding rule. Augustus has been frequently designated as the greatest ruler the world has ever known. It became a proverbial description of his regime, that "He found the city of brick, and left it of marble."

In Roman mythology, Janus, the two-headed god, from whom January took its name, was the guardian of gates and of portals. When the nation was at war, the gates of the temple of Janus were always left open; in times of peace they were closed. Although the gates had stood ajar for several hundred years, the advent of the present dispensation found them closed. The civil wars which had decimated the country and spilled so much blood had ended a generation before, and almost unbroken peace had obtained. Countries previously in constant strife had turned to the peaceful pursuits of agriculture and commerce; money formerly spent to prosecute war and purchase protection was being used in full scale building projects. New subdivisions arose on the outskirts of wealthy cities, road building projects were carried forward along the caravan routes. The age pulsated with the movement of peoples who fused into such a cosmopolitan population as is usually found in huge modern cities. As one eminent writer has expressed it, "The age-long growth of the life of humanity in that ancient world had attained its flower." The Prince of Peace was introduced to the world in an age of peace, which was previously unparalleled.

6. Jesus was born at a time when the whole earth was in a state of expectancy. He was not launched into the midst of men in a wholly unexpected time or fashion. It is true that the Jews labored under the gravest misapprehension as to the nature of his mission and kingdom, but that they were looking for a Messiah at that time, and that they believed he would in some sense reign over his people, cannot be questioned. It is altogether possible that the hope of Israel varied in its character according to the nature of each individual who clung to it. In some cases the advent of the Messiah was expected to be wholly political, amounting to the overthrow of the Roman usurper, recovery of national independence, and a restoration of the Oriental splendor which glorified the reigns of David and Solomon. Amongst the meditative and spiritual teachers, however, a moral and spiritual era was expected, but one thing was certain, all looked for a golden age to be ushered in, and for the triumph of Judaism.

"The people were in expectation, and all men mused in their hearts of John, whether he were the Christ, or not" (Luke 3:15). This will account for the fact that neither John nor Jesus bothered to define or explain "the kingdom (reign) of heaven." They merely announced it. The Jewish world was waiting for it. The aged Simeon, just and devout, was "waiting for the consolation of Israel" (Luke 2:25). Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable member of the Sanhedrin "waited for the kingdom of God" (Mark 15:43). The carping Pharisees demanded that Jesus tell them "when the kingdom of God would come" (Luke 17:20). Even after the resurrection, the apostles questioned, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom unto Israel?"

It is a common error to assume that only the Jewish world looked for a deliverer. But the prophet Haggai, after using language directly applied to the kingdom of the Messiah (Heb. 12:26) quotes God as saying, "The desire of all nations shall come: and I will fill this house with glory" (Haggai 2:7). Deprived as they were of the advantages accruing from access to the oracles of God (Rom. 3:1, 2), it is not surprising that the Gentile concept was more obscure than that of the Jews, yet they yearned for deliverance from their state, and that yearning was centered in the hope of a person. The Greek mind could conceive of a person who dedicated his life to service and virtue exalted to the highest heaven to sit down among the immortal gods. They could not conceive of a God coming down from heaven, emptying himself of glory, and dying for men. It was easy for them to believe the testimony of their own prophets that man was the offspring of God (Acts 17:28). The idea of God dying for man was beyond their ken; the idea of a virtuous man dying to become exalted among the gods they understood. Is it not remarkable how much more readily the Gentile mind responded to the testimony of a resurrected and exalted Christ than did the Jewish heart? The great Roman poet Virgil, who died about twenty years before Jesus was born, was but one of a number of pagan poets who seemed to sense a coming event of impending importance. An example is his Fourth Eclogue, from which the following excerpts are taken.

"The last age, decreed by Fate, has come;

And a new frame of all things does begin,

A holy progeny from heaven descends.

Auspicious be his birth! which puts an end

To the iron age! and from which shall rise

A golden age far glorious through the earth. . .

By thee what footsteps of our sins remain,

Are blotted out, and the whole world set free

From her perpetual bondage and her fear . . .

Yet some remains shall still be left

Of ancient fraud, and wars shall still go on."

It would seem that the entire world was a readied stage for presentation of the mightiest drama of the ages.

7. Much of what has been written thus far about Rome seems good, yet there is a dark and seamy side. Peace reigned it is true, but it had been purchased at a fearful price. The great empire sprawling over a prostrate world had crushed out the ambition and hope so essential to make life worth living. The recognition of the individual, his rights, privileges and dignity, stressed by Greek philosophy, were forgotten. The wealthy, deprived of the discipline of wholesome labor, sought surcease in luxury, gluttony and immorality. When tired of feasting upon such dainties as brains of peacocks and tongues of nightingales, they retired to sumptuously furnished rooms to drink a death potion and slip into the dreamless slumber of suicide. This became almost the normal mode of death for the nobility.

The freeborn poor, forced from their farms by the encroachments of syndicates and monopolies, soon having spent their little pittance in the cities, were forced to huddle in winter over small household fires, saving a toga for burial, rather than risk wearing it to protect from the cold. These became beggars and idlers, asking only for a daily dole of bread from the government, and public entertainment at the circus or amphitheater. They were political pawns, willing to give their support to the despot who promised them the most from the public treasury. They dwelt in filthy, vermin-infested slums, creeping up the dark steps at night after a day spent lounging in idleness, climaxed by an evening in which they had yelled themselves hoarse at the brutal, bloody scenes in the arena. Below them in the social scale were the millions of slaves, bereft of family, possession, religion and rights, living an abject existence like the scavenging dogs of the street.

And in such a time, the once popular religion had lost its hold and faith had died in human hearts. The temples of the gods were still standing, but gone were the childlike superstition and simplicity with which the worshipers once thronged through these edifices. The Olympic heaven was now empty, and only the wraiths of its former inhabitants conjured up in human minds until they became real, stalked through the bowers of fleecy clouds. Philosophy had thrust its cold steel rapier into the body of mythology, and the spirit had departed, to leave only a corpse. The poets still rhapsodized about the gods in their fantasies, but the very fact that the emperor was forced to brace the structure of polytheism with laws demanding its preservation shows how far it had sunken in the estimate of men in general. And while the populace regarded mythology as a composition of so many silly fables, hardly worthy of the scornful laugh of silly schoolboys, many became the dupes of wandering mystics, jugglers, interpreters, and every brand of religious crackpot and philosophical quack. The old faith had failed, the whole world was steeped in a spirit of apathy, languor and weariness. Man was tired, tired of his gods, his faith, and even of life. It was time for a new life to begin! The fulness of the time had arrived; it was now time for the fulness of God to arrive!

8. One of the curious manifestations of the time with which we are dealing, was the rise and multiplication of the numerous guilds of workmen, religious societies, and burial clubs. With the stamping out of individuality, there seemed to be kindled a craving for recognition of others. Workmen in the same craft joined together to form a guild or trade union. This constituted a fellowship or brotherhood. Each brotherhood selected a divinity which was looked upon as its head. The members met together regularly for common meals to which only those were admitted who had been initiated by proper conformity with some rite. Class distinctions were abolished and all, both free and slaves, were upon an equality. The poor members were ministered to from a fund collected by voluntary contributions, and any member of the guild who died was given honorable burial. The idea of a community of brethren, bound to each other by solemn vows and mutual aims, was well developed in all of these societies.

9. It should never be forgotten that the dispersion of the Jews among all the nations of the earth, by reason of capture and exile, although it seemed to militate against the design of God when first viewed from a human angle, turned out to be a vital factor in the dissemination of Christianity throughout the world. During the exile in Babylon, while cut off from the temple with its service and sacrifice, the people met together for prayer and reading of the Torah. Such gatherings at first were probably informal and may have been held on the banks of rivers such as the Chebar. Soon the meetings became regular features of the sabbath days and when Jerusalem was restored, they were augmented rather than discontinued. Thus from a spontaneous beginning, the synagogue became an outstanding part of the Jewish religious picture.

The temple with its sacerdotal caste of priests and Levites was the locale of sacrifice and ritual; the synagogue was a place of instruction, edification and prayer. There was no special ministry for the conduct of the synagogue meetings. Wherever at least ten men were willing to constitute a congregation, a synagogue could be started. A group of seniors, or elders, administered affairs and supervised the conduct of the members. Deacons, or almoners, distributed to the needs of the poor from a common fund. Discipline was regularly maintained and one who transgressed the law might be publicly censured, or even excommunicated, upon which action the individual became as "a heathen or a publican."

At the sabbath service, any man in good standing was permitted to read the Torah or Hafterah (the law and the prophets). Any brother of the assembly was free to speak for the general edification of those present. Thus Jesus, who was regarded as the son of a mere artisan, read from the prophets, and presented an exposition of the passage in the synagogue at Nazareth. After the readings from the sacred scrolls at Antioch, in Pisidia, Paul and Barnabas were told, "Ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, say on" (Acts 13:15).

The church of God owes a debt to the synagogue. It served to cushion the shock of passing from Judaism to Christianity. The synagogue may have been a providential factor in making possible the influence of the Christian church among the Jews. Certainly the worship service of the church, as well as her government, were patterned after that of the synagogue, and the two were so closely related that in many places all that was essential in establishing a church was to interpret the prophets to refer to the Nazarene, and convert members of the synagogue to that fact. The addition of the Lord's Supper would transform the worship into that of a synagogue of Christ. The term "synagogue" was employed to designate Christian churches for a century, and is so used in James 2:2. And the synagogues were found in every part of the world.

No survey of any period of history can be called complete. There are so many relations and interrelations of ideas as to create a complex dependency of one factor upon another, until the pursuit of all angles seems to be infinite in scope. We must recognize the imperfections in our presentation of the background for the announcement of the rule of heaven, but if we have demonstrated even partially that all things united to produce the auspicious circumstances involved in "the fulness of the time" we shall be satisfied. And with such a background we are ready to investigate the great harbinger of the kingdom.

The Voice in the Wilderness

Contents

Four centuries had passed without a revelation from God. The prophet Malachi had closed his declaration of "the burden of the word of the Lord" and the sacred canon, with the word "curse." Yet even in this solemn threat was found a note of hope, for the full prediction was, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse" (4:6).

Because of this promise. Rabbinic tradition and Jewish legend had gone to wild extremes. It had long been taught that the miraculous events centering about Israel's early history would be repeated with greater force in Messianic days, and in the manifestation of supernatural power, Elijah was assigned a major role. This was a favorite topic in the synagogue and a subject of frequent discussion among the lawyers and doctors. It would be irrelevant to here record the foolish and ridiculous speculations everywhere current; it will suffice for us to note that common Galilean fishermen knew that the scribes taught that Elijah must come before the Messiah could be introduced (Matt. 17:10).

The divine silence of four hundred years was finally broken. A devout, aged priest from the backwoods hill country of Judea, who belonged to the course of Abia, was chosen to officiate at the altar of incense one morning. He had never performed this service before, nor would he ever do so again, for only once in a lifetime was any priest allowed the honor of presiding at the golden altar. One wonders about the thoughts which must have flooded the mind of the venerable priest on that October morning which brought to him the signal glory to which he had never fallen heir before. Did his heart revert to his faithful wife, also of the tribe of Levi, and to the unanswered prayers they had so frequently offered at the time of the burning of incense? Was there a deep inward pang that he had no son who would maintain the hallowed traditions belonging to Israel?

His reveries were soon broken, for while he stood at the golden altar, and the great concourse of people outside were praying, Zacharias beheld an angel standing at the right side of the altar. Instantly a sense of awe and fright overwhelmed him. But the angel spoke quickly, quieting his fears, and making the simple announcement that his prayers had been heard, that Elisabeth would bear a son, and that his name would be called Jochanan (John). Let us consider some of the characteristics of the child as divulged by the heavenly messenger.

Gabriel's Description

1. Not only would the birth of the child occasion gladness to the heart of the parents, but it would be a source of joy to many other pious souls, and the child himself would be great before the Lord.

2. John was to be a perpetual Nazirite, which would necessitate scrupulous care against ceremonial defilement. His ascetic wilderness life and refusal to engage in any social function could be attributed to this. One who was under this vow could not cut his hair, nor eat or drink any grape product (Num. 6:1-21). While most men took the Nazirite vow for a brief period, John, like Samuel and Samson, would be amenable to it for life.

3. He was to be filled with the Holy Spirit from birth. It would appear that he was like Jeremiah, in the fact that from the womb he was singled out as a prophet of God (Jer. 1:5).

4. His work was to be that of a national reformer "turning many of the sons of Israel to the Lord their God." His appearance was at a time of spiritual and moral degradation. Crimes of lust were frequent. Disregard for the commandments was very pronounced. The language which was current on the streets, filled with sly references to vice, indicated disrespect for self and dignity. Men of wealth built synagogues for worship with money gained by deceit and oppression. The sectarian spirit was rife. The Jewish commonwealth must reform in preparation for the Reign of heaven.

5. John was to go before the King "in the spirit and power of Elijah." This was a concept of prophecy which none of the rabbinical leaders had caught. They were looking for Elijah to return to their land in person, and by some miraculous demonstration to ready things for the introduction of the Messiah.

6. The forerunner was "to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." This point we must never forget in our discussion of the harbinger of the Reign. It was to accomplish this task he was born, filled with the Spirit, and sent on his mission. If he made ready a prepared people, he finished the work that was given him to do; if he did not, regardless of his other accomplishments, his efforts were a failure. It will be the position of this writer that John successfully completed his work of preparation, and the material for the foundation of the temple of God was made ready in advance of the time when incorporated in that superstructure. How this work of preparation was accomplished is a matter for future discussion. Suffice it to say that the solemn pronouncement of Gabriel is sufficient to indicate the coming of a character unique in history. To this must be added that at the birth of John, his father, suddenly filled with the Holy Spirit, uttered a memorable prophecy, augmenting that of Gabriel, and recorded in Luke 1:67-79.

Personal Habits and Character

1. After the birth of John, we learn that "he grew and became strong in the spirit." He did not grow up on city streets, nor amidst the luxury and vice of crowded metropolitan areas. "He was in the wilderness till the day of his manifestation to Israel" (Luke 1:80). During this time he had the instruction of parents who "were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless" (Luke 1:6). They would certainly lay up the words of the Lord in their heart, and teach them to the child, talking of them when sitting in the house, when walking by the way, when lying down, and when rising up (Deut. 11:19).

2. We cannot be certain at just what age John began to realize he was destined to begin a work of public proclamation. Indications are that he was about thirty years of age, and if so, he was motivated to begin the prophetic office at the same age as Ezekiel, who also was of the priestly tribe. This was the age at which the Levites "could enter the service" of the tabernacle (Num. 4:3, 23, 30, 35, etc.).

We do know that it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, during the joint high-priesthood of Annas and Caiaphas, that "the word of the Lord came to John the Son of Zechariah in the wilderness" (Luke 3:1, 2). The public declaration was not made by John in the forums of populous cities, but rather he went into the sparsely settled region adjacent to the Jordan River. John did not go to the people, the people had to go out to John.

3. In dress, John was like the prophets of old. He was attired in "a garment of camel's hair, and a leather girdle about his waist" (Matt. 3:4). The pious Jews, familiar with history, would immediately recall the description of Elijah, in whose spirit John came. When Ahaziah sent messengers who were intercepted by Elijah, the king said, "What kind of man was he who came to meet you and told you these things?" They answered him, "He wore a garment of haircloth, with a girdle of leather about his loins." The king said, "It is Elijah the Tishbite" (2 Kings 1:7, 8). So distinctive was this garb as the badge of prophets, that false prophets donned a hairy garment to deceive (Zech. 13:4). If those who left the cities to see and hear John, expected to find one dressed in soft raiment, they were greatly disappointed. "Behold, those who are gorgeously appareled and live in luxury, are in king's courts" (Luke 7:25).

4. The daily fare of John was as rude as his manner of life. His principal diet consisted of locusts and wild honey. The Israelites were permitted to eat four kinds of winged insects: locusts, bald locusts, crickets and grasshoppers (Lev. 11:22). These might be prepared by roasting in one of the outdoor ovens, or by frying in oil, as well as by other means. Honey was obtained from crevices in the rocks or from hollow trees, as well as occasionally from the sun-dried carcasses of animals (Cp. 1 Sam. 14:26; Judges 14:8).

5. John was regarded as possessing an anti-social attitude, and some of his critics inferred that his stern, unbending manner was the direct result of demon possession. He did not fraternize with the people, nor attend their feasts or wedding celebrations, which led Jesus to remark, "John came neither eating nor drinking, and you say 'He hath a devil.'"

Divine Highway Builder

Ancient kings, when making a journey, had the services of a forerunner. Such a trusted servant was charged with the task of preparing the route over which the monarch was to travel. It was his responsibility to clear the track, removing stones and other obstructions, and to announce in advance the coming of the king, so the citizens would be prepared and not caught unawares by the sudden appearance of the regal retinue among them. To go before the king was a privilege highly esteemed among the oriental peoples, and although Elijah did not condone the sins of Ahab, he acted as his forerunner out of respect for his royal dignity (1 Kings 18:46).

Isaiah predicted the coming of one who, as a construction engineer, would go ahead of the Lord, making such alterations in the terrain as would be essential to the development of the "King's Highway." Here are his words. "A voice cries: 'In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be lifted up, and every mountain and hill be made low, the uneven ground shall become level, and the rough places a plain" (40:3, 4). This prediction John applied directly to himself.

His proclamation in the deserted area near the banks of the Jordan was so stirring, and the people were so aroused by it, that the Pharisees in Jerusalem sent a deputation of priests and Levites to Bethany, across the Jordan, to determine by what authority he was immersing Jews. John answered their questions by affirming he was not the Messiah. They asked if he was Elijah and again he replied in the negative. They asked if he was that prophet (i.e., the one of Deut. 18:15) and he denied it. They said to him then, "Who are you? Let us have an answer for those who sent us. What do you say about yourself?" He said, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, 'Make straight the way of the Lord,' as the prophet Isaiah said" (John 1:19-23).

The wilderness in the prophecy must certainly refer to the matted, overgrown thicket of human hearts, composing the Jewish world of the days of John. His work was to be upon the hearts of men, as evidenced by the words of Gabriel in his annunciation (Luke 1:17). The pride and arrogance which lifted some up in their own estimation had to be overthrown and dragged down; the valleys of shortcoming and disobedience had to be filled; the crooked, devious paths and patterns of life had to be straightened out; and the rough spots of character submitted to the grading machine of God's truth.

Highway construction through a wilderness area is neither an easy nor a pleasant task. It often requires what may appear to be reckless, ruthless methods as bulldozers tear into huge trees and matted undergrowth, or shove boulders to one side. As construction engineer for the highway of God, John used effective but seemingly harsh methods. The roadway must be readied and the time for completion of his contract was very short. After quoting the words of Isaiah about the preparation of the road, Luke significantly remarks, "He said therefore to the multitudes that came out to be baptized by him, 'You brood of vipers! Who warned you to flee from the wrath to come? Bear fruits that befit repentance, and do not begin to say, We have Abraham as father'" (3:7, 8). The hills of ancestral pride were blasted and toppled into the valleys below.

Highway building is very practical. Once the blueprints are finished and the construction engineer takes over, every phase of it is definite and toward a positive goal. John unhesitatingly removed rocks, uprooted obstacles and cleared away debris. When the multitude asked what fruits befitted repentance, the answer was quick and sharp, "He who has two coats, let him share with him who has none; and he who has food, let him do likewise." When the tax collectors asked what they must do, they were told, "Collect no more than is appointed you." When the soldiers asked what they must do, they were told, "Rob no one by violence or by false accusation, and be content with your wages."

We should never forget the true relationship of John to the Messiah and His Reign. There is a word which you will find in your unabridged dictionary which is directly applicable to John.

It is the word "pavior." In older English usage this was a common term descriptive of one who specialized in smoothing out and paving roadways. John was a "pavior"; he was not the Savior. He announced the coming of the Reign, under which he would not personally live, for he met a violent death before the coronation ceremony of the King, for whose coming he prepared the way. It was in view of this that the Messiah declared that John was "something superior to a prophet . . . Indeed, I say to you, among those that are born of women, there has not arisen a greater than John the Immerser. Yet the least in the Reign of heaven is greater than he" (Matt. 11:10, 11).

Mission, Message and Method

We propose a series of questions and answers relating to the work of John, son of Zacharias, by which it is hoped we may fully inform the reader of the importance of the labors of this harbinger.

1. What was the general purpose of John? "Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, who shall prepare the way before thee" (Matt. 11:10).

2. How was this to be accomplished? "You will go before the Lord to prepare his ways, to give knowledge of salvation to his people in the forgiveness of their sins" (Luke 1:76, 77).

3. How did he begin his work? "In those days came John the Immerser, proclaiming in the wilderness" (Matt. 3:1). "With many other exhortations, he proclaimed good news to the people" (Luke 3:18).

4. Did he command his hearers to believe in Jesus? "John baptized with the baptism of repentance, telling the people to believe in the one who was to come after him, that is, Jesus" (Acts 19:4).

5. Did he demand repentance? "Repent, for the Reign of heaven is approaching" (Matt. 3:2).

6. What confession was made? "Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judea and all the region about the Jordan . . . confessing their sins" (Matt. 3:5, 6).

7. In what did John immerse the penitents? "I baptize you with water" (Matt. 3:11). "They were baptized by him in the river Jordan" (Matt. 3:6).

8. What was the design of the immersion? "John the Immerser appeared in the wilderness proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mark 1:4).

9. Did all of the people prepared for the Lord receive him? "He came unto his own, and his own received him not" (John 1:11).

10. What of those who did receive him? "To all who received him, who believed in his name, to them he gave the privilege to become children of God; who were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God" (John 1:11, 12).

The material for the temple of God, like that for the temple of Solomon, was prepared in advance, so it could be builded into the structure immediately. John proclaimed the good news that the Reign was approaching, and prepared men in anticipation for it. Many of those who later followed Jesus were first disciples of John, but left him to follow Jesus. Among these were the apostles. "The next day again John was standing with two of his disciples; and he looked at Jesus as he walked, and said, 'Behold the lamb of God!' The two disciples heard him say this, and they followed Jesus . . . One of the two who heard John speak, and followed Jesus, was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. He first found his brother Simon, and said to him, 'We have found the Messiah'" (John 1:35-41).

These men were Jews, and as such they had been born of blood, of the will of the flesh and the will of man. But by their acceptance of the good news of the Reign they were born of God. However, they were children by anticipation, since the family association under the authority of the Messiah could not be set up until the coronation. Only those who received him, believing on his name, were granted the privilege of becoming children of God, and with his accession to the throne were adopted into the family upon the basis of their previous birth. Certainly they did not need to be immersed again. They were prepared stones!

In order to establish a nation in a moment, or to bring a kingdom into existence in one day, it is necessary that preliminary preparation be made to have material to incorporate in it. This was true of Zion, the kingdom of the Messiah. "Before she was in labor she gave birth; before her pain came upon her she was delivered of a son. Who has heard such things? Shall a land be born in one day? Shall a nation be brought forth in a moment? For as soon as Zion was in labor she brought forth her sons" (Isaiah 66:7, 8).

Normal functions require birth pangs to produce children from the uterus. But Zion produced offspring both before and after travail. Before the regular order was established she was delivered of a son; then, as soon as the regular order was established, she brought forth sons in normal procedure. No one had ever before heard or seen such things, according to the prophet, who hastens to explain that the reason for the production of offspring in advance of the regular order was to make it possible for a nation or kingdom to be established in one day, even in a moment.

Parable of the Sheepfold

A consideration of the foregoing will serve to explain the parable of Jesus in John 10:1-6. "Truly, truly, I say to you, he who does not enter the sheepfold by the door but climbs in by another way, that man is a thief and a robber; but he who enters by the door is the shepherd of the sheep. To him the gatekeeper opens; the sheep hear his voice, and he calls his own sheep by name and leads them out. When he has brought out all his own, he goes before them, and his sheep follow him, for they know his voice. A stranger will they not follow, but will flee from him, for they do not know the voice of strangers."

The expression relative to those who do not enter by the door but climb in by some other manner, has no application to the entrance of the sheep into the fold, but to those who pretended to be shepherds in order to steal, kill and destroy. The fold is the Jewish economy, and there were many false Messiahs who sought to establish themselves, only to lead the people into acts of violence and death. Jesus says, "All who came before me are thieves and robbers" (verse 8).

The door is that of prophecy, and it was so constructed that only one person could ever enter it, the true Messiah, the shepherd of the sheep. The gatekeeper was John, who opened the way for entrance. When Jesus entered the Jewish fold, he called his own sheep (those who were a people made ready, prepared for the Lord) and led them out of the Jewish fold to create a new flock. "And I have other sheep (Gentiles) which are not of this fold; I must bring them also, and they will heed my voice. So there shall be one flock, one shepherd" (verse 16).

The Baptism of John

When Jesus was teaching on the temple portico, he was accosted by the chief priests and seniors of the people, who demanded, "By what authority are you doing these things, and who gave you this authority?" He replied, "I also will ask you a question: and if you tell me the answer, then I will also tell you by what authority I do these things. The baptism of John, whence was it? From heaven or from men?" (Matt. 21:23-25). The reluctance of those querists to answer this question, is equalled only by the ignorance of it in these days. It will be profitable to our purpose to consider the baptism of John.

1. It was valid only to prepare men in advance of the commencement of the Reign.

2. It was performed under the theocracy and was authorized by God. "There was a man sent from God, whose name was John" (John 1:6). "He (God) . . . sent me to baptize with water" (John 1:33).

3. It was not performed in the name of Jesus the Christ, for the simple reason that he did not yet have any authority. "Hitherto you have asked nothing in my name" (John 16:24).

4. When all authority in heaven and earth was bestowed upon the Christ, and God put all things in subjection under his feet, the baptism of John could no longer be performed validly. Those who had been baptized with that baptism, prior to the coronation of the King were not required to be baptized again, but from henceforth it was not valid for others, because it was not performed under the authority of the regnant monarch, the Messiah. Since his coronation, no act of a religious nature is valid, unless performed in his name, i.e., by his authority (Col. 3:17).

Unfortunately, in remote areas, some who had learned of John's baptism, did not learn of the coronation of the Christ, so continued to proclaim the baptism of John. Of this number was Apollos, the Alexandrian Jew, who had to be brought up to date on events by Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:24-26).

When Paul arrived in Ephesus he found certain disciples who informed him they had been baptized unto John's baptism. Pointing out to them that this baptism was valid only to those looking forward to Christ, those who heard this were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus (Acts 19:1-5). This baptism was in the same form and the same element as that of John. The difference was that it was administered under the authority of the reigning King.

John did not fail in his heaven-sent mission. He accomplished what God sent him to do. He produced a reformation in the hearts of many, and he baptized those who confessed their sins, for the forgiveness of those sins. Thus he prepared a people made ready for the Lord, who needed only to acknowledge that Jesus was the Messiah, to be incorporated into the household of God. When the sword of the executioner in the prison fortress of Machaerus, severed the head of John from his body, the "pavior" of the Messiah could die secure in the conviction that he had finished his task on earth.

The Ministry of the Master

Contents

The work of preparing for the coming Reign did not cease with the murder of John. Jesus had personally begun proclaiming the same message immediately after his baptism (Matt. 4:17). He later commissioned twelve envoys who were sent out with the instruction, "Go nowhere among the Gentiles, and enter no town of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And preach as you go, saying, 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand'" (Matt. 10:5-7). A short time later, he appointed seventy others, and sent them on ahead of him, two by two, into every town and place where he himself was about to come. These were instructed to say "The kingdom of God has come near you" (Luke 10:9). It is evident that there was no lack of public attestation to the forthcoming Reign.

In preparation for the approaching Reign it was necessary that Jesus describe its nature, character and relationships, although his teaching was as little understood by his hearers as by many who read his words in these days. Varying phases of the subject were introduced as opportunity afforded a chance to illustrate its peculiarities, and a lack of attention to the background of the instruction has created much confusion. Illustrative of this are the conflicting views as to when the Reign began. As to this matter, it would seem that certain facts are incontestable.

1. The Reign did not begin during the lifetime of John, the forerunner, for after his decease, eighty-three persons, one of them being the Son of God himself, traveled up and down the land proclaiming that it was drawing nigh.

2. It had not yet come when Peter made his noble confession of the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus, for it was after this that Jesus declared, "Truly, I say to you, there are some standing here who will not taste of death before they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. 16:28).

3. It had not come at the time of the last supper, the night before Jesus died, for he then said with reference to the fruit of the vine, "Take this and divide it among yourselves; for I tell you that from now on I shall not drink of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes" (Luke 22:18).

4. It had not come at the resurrection of Jesus, for it was subsequent to that event, when the selected envoys asked, "Lord, will you at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" which demonstrates that not only had it not arrived, but the very ambassadors did not yet comprehend its nature.

5. It could not begin until Jesus left the earth, for he had to leave his servants and go to a far country (heaven) to receive kingly power (Luke 19:12). It was when he came with the clouds of heaven to the Ancient of Days, and was presented before him, that there was given him dominion, glory, and a kingdom (Daniel 7:13, 14).

But this leaves unresolved some difficulties created by the language of Jesus during the period when he was preparing men for the coming Reign. We must harmonize those passages with the facts above stated.

"The law and the prophets were until John; since then the kingdom of God is preached, and every one enters it violently" (Luke 16:16). "Jesus said to them, 'Truly, I say to you, the tax collectors and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you'" (Matt. 21:31). It is asked how persons can enter a kingdom which is not yet existent.

It must be remembered that the kingdom of heaven is built upon certain principles. These principles were enunciated and explained prior to the introduction of the new regime and in preparation for its coming. And while the kingdom was established in one day, it was only after much indoctrination of the basic truths. Those who previously grasped the principles and comprehended the significant reformation these principles were to work in the life of each individual, were spoken of as pressing into the kingdom. Words may have both a literal and figurative meaning.

The chief priests and elders of the Jews had just questioned the authority of Jesus. In reply, Jesus said, "Truly, I say unto you, the tax collectors and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came to you in the way of righteousness, and you did not believe him, but the tax collectors and the harlots believed him; and even when you saw it, you did not afterward repent and believe him." "Going into the kingdom" as used here simply meant to believe in the testimony of John that the Reign was approaching, and to make such amendment of life as was compatible with the information. Such persons as did this were entering the kingdom in prospect.

The scribes and lawyers, by their traditions and opinions, not only made void the law, but confused men and women, until the principles of truth were made obscure. Thus they "shut the kingdom of heaven against men" by their interpretations and endless wranglings, for they neither entered themselves (by acceptance of the truth concerning the Messiah) nor allowed others who would enter to go in (Matt. 23:13). The people generally had to depend for knowledge upon what their leaders taught them. The scribes and the Pharisees sit on Moses' seat (Matt. 23:1). This instruction was based on the law and the prophets. Until John came, the law and the prophets were thus said to be the instructors, but when John came, he declared the approaching Reign of heaven, with such effect that men and women, fervently, excitedly, and anxiously pressed to enter the new relationship, as those who would crush violently against the gates of a city to gain admission. The announcement of a Reign in which all might participate aroused a feeling among the Jewish people such as had not been known through centuries of oppression. "When the people saw the sign which he (Jesus) had done, they said, 'This is indeed the prophet which is to come into the world . . . ' they were about to come and take him by force to make him king" (John 6:14, 15).

When Jesus once healed a blind and dumb demoniac, the people, stricken with amazement, acclaimed him as the son of David. But the Pharisees, incensed by this public acknowledgement of him, scoffingly remarked that it was only by Beelzebul, chief prince of the demons, that he worked such miracles. In refutation of their accusation, Jesus filed the following logical objections.

1. This would mean division in the realm of the demons, and would result in the downfall of Satan's kingdom, if Satan was engaged in the task of throwing out his own agents.

2. The superiority of Jesus over Satan would be demonstrated, for no strong man would allow another to enter in and throw out his goods, unless he first overcame, subdued and bound the owner.

3. The fact that others among their own number were exorcists, and they acknowledged their ability to rid men of demons militated against their charge that it was by the prince of demons.

On the other hand, Jesus argued that if he acted by the Spirit of God, the kingdom of God had come upon them. This simply meant that such manifestations of power were of the nature which the prophets had predicted would accompany the kingdom of heaven. Isaiah had painted a preview of the Messiah with the Spirit of the Lord God upon him, because the Lord had anointed him to proclaim liberty to the captives (Isa. 61:1). If, by the Spirit of God, the demoniac captives were freed, it would be a proof that the age of the Messianic Reign was upon them. That the Reign had not yet actually come is evident from the fact that the Pharisees later on asked when the kingdom was coming (Luke 17:20).

Some are confused by the reply given on this occasion, for Jesus answered them, "The kingdom of God is not coming with signs to be observed; nor will they say, 'Lo, here it is!' or 'There!' for behold, the kingdom of God is within you."

This did not imply that the kingdom had already come. The point of consideration in the reply of Jesus was the nature of the kingdom. The Pharisees thought they would be able to see its coming as men saw the occupation of territory by the Roman legions. But the kingdom of heaven would not be accompanied with clash of arms, fanfare of trumpets, marching troops, or political upheaval. Nor would men point to this city or that as the seat of the government or the center of authority. The realm of the authority would be the hearts of men; the overthrow accomplished would be that of the sinful dispositions of men.

The Reign of heaven was approaching men, but those who grasped the fundamental elements of that Reign, were spoken of as drawing near to it. A certain scribe, having listened to Jesus as he refuted and routed a number of taunting critics, perceiving the justness of his reply, came to him, and proposed the question as to which commandment was chief of all. Jesus answered, "The chief of all the commandments is, 'Hearken, Israel, the Lord is our God. The Lord is one,' and 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your mind, and with all your strength.' This is the first commandment. The second resembles it: 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' There is no greater commandment than these." The scribe admitted the answer was an excellent one, and declared that the commandments recited by Jesus represented more than all burnt offerings and sacrifices. "Jesus, observing how pertinently he had answered said to him, 'You are not far from the kingdom of God'" (Mark 12:28-34).

Terms of Entrance

It was essential for Jesus, during his earthly ministry, to define the terms of entrance into the kingdom and to describe the character of those who would be deemed worthy of citizenship therein. The necessity for this will be easily recognized when one remembers the mistaken ideas on the subject in the minds of his hearers. There was constantly a spirit of political ambition to combat and thwart. The disciples, laboring under the prevailing Jewish misconception as to the nature of the kingdom, and motivated by selfish impulse, disputed among themselves as to who among them would occupy the chief administrative offices in the coming regime.

Upon one such occasion Jesus took the opportunity afforded to teach a lesson relative to the nature of the kingdom. This he did by the use of an object lesson which demonstrated his ability as an instructor. Jesus believed in the use of visual aids to enforce spiritual truths. He suddenly called a little child unto him and placed the lad in the midst of the disciples. It is interesting to note that ancient tradition identifies the child as Ignatius, who became one of the most noted fathers of the early church. Regardless of identity, the child was docilely compliant with the request of Jesus and came quickly and meekly.

Jesus said, "Except you be converted, and become as little children, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:3). One interesting phase of the dispute lies in the fact that this occurred after Jesus had promised the keys of the kingdom unto Peter, and the argument over primacy demonstrates conclusively that Peter did not consider it had been resolved in his favor. Now the disciples are informed that even entrance into the kingdom will demand a complete turning, a reversal of attitude. Worldly ambition is not a key to power, but a bar to the gate. The renunciation of the disposition to seek prestige and pre-eminence is essential to admission.

A little child, wholly dependent upon others, truthful, obedient, and without political ambition, represents the ideal for which citizens of the kingdom must strive. What a rebuke to pride, pomp and power. The recapture of that innocence, freedom from passion and strife, and sense of dependency, which characterized us in the first bloom of childhood should constitute our chief aim in life. We go forward by going backward! We gain by putting off; we win by divesting ourselves of that which we have accumulated. It is regrettable that many accumulate years and become childish, when the teaching of Jesus is that we should turn back and become child-like. "Whosoever therefore shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."

From the discourse familiarly called "The Sermon on the Mount" we learn several facts bearing upon the nature of the kingdom and the character of its citizenry. In a memorable passage, in which Jesus distinguishes between true Judaism and the degenerate form of it taught by the scribes and Pharisees, he shows that his task is the fulfillment of the first and the abrogation of the last. One can almost sense the questions passing back and forth among those who composed the huge gathering at the mount. How does this Nazarene propose to accomplish his task? Will he publicly denounce the prophets and declare them of no value? Will he destroy Moses and himself assume the place of the Torah? Will he inaugurate a kingdom with himself upon the throne, dispensing the wisdom of God directly to all who enquire?

Jesus was not unaware of the thoughts which perplexed his auditors. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy but to fulfill" (Matt. 5:17). Here is an intimation that the law and the prophets were to be consummated by a person superior to both. Contrary to the reasoning of the Jews, the Torah was not the end in itself, but the means to an end. It was a child-conductor to lead to Christ and could never fulfill its highest mission until it delivered those in its charge unto him.

Jesus continues: "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law until all be fulfilled." Instead of showing a spirit of disrespect for the Torah and the prophets, he emphasizes that the minutest portions of it are of great worth in the divine arrangement. This was a contrast with the scribes who divided the precepts into various classes, some of which were considered binding, but others of which might be disregarded. The jot was the smallest letter in the Hebrew alphabet, the yod. The tittle was a small point by which similar letters were distinguished from each other. In this case they are used figuratively to indicate that the slightest principle of divine law would not fail of accomplishment in the eternal purpose.

"Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." The context shows that Jesus is talking about the commandments in the law and the prophets. It is not to be understood that these will constitute the code in the kingdom of heaven. But they were given by the authority of God, and to wilfully violate one commandment constitutes a definite insult to the majesty of heaven, and to actually teach men to do this is a flagrant sin. Greatness in the kingdom is predicated upon a proper attitude toward God and his word.

"For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven." The scribes were devoted to the work of reading and studying the law and were the recognized expounders of it. The Pharisees were punctilious in observance of the letter of the law. Both groups often overlooked the spirit of the law in their interminable arguments about the details of it. This is best illustrated by the indictment, "Alas for you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for you pay tithe on mint, dill, and cumin, while you have neglected the weightier requirements of the Law— just judgment, mercy and faithful dealing . . . You blind guides, straining out the gnat while you gulp down the camel!" (Matt. 23:23, 24. Weymouth).

When Jesus spoke of entrance into the kingdom demanding a righteousness exceeding that of the scribes and Pharisees, he was not talking of the hypocrites among them. The thought is that "Unless your concept of righteousness is of a higher nature than that attained by scribes and Pharisees, admission to the kingdom of heaven cannot be secured." What a lesson for those who would degenerate kingdom life into an endless series of squabbles over incidentals while wholly ignoring the spirit or essence of truth.

In this same address, Jesus, speaking about the time of final separation declared, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 7:21). Assuredly this has reference to the kingdom in its final phase, but is there not here also a basis or condition of admission into the kingdom over which the Messiah rules? Can one come into such a sacred relationship except upon the obedience to the Father's will?

Our review of the teaching of the Christ would not be complete if we ignored his statements occasioned by the query of a certain wealthy young ruler, who came running to kneel before Jesus. This young man desired to know what good thing he might do in order to secure eternal life. He was informed that if he would enter into life, he must keep the commandments. This no doubt was disappointing, for it was probable that he expected a new formula or panacea for the ills of the world, and as a key to the mysteries of life. To be pointed to the commandments which he had memorized and observed from his youth was altogether too commonplace. He no doubt had a sense of emptiness and futility, a hunger which was not satisfied. In order to fill his heart with assurance he seeks for that secret which will bring him hope. "What lack I yet?"

Mark records that Jesus looked at him and loved him. There could now be no compromise, a soul was in the balance, and the test must be faced. Jesus said, "One thing is lacking in you: go, sell all you possess and give the proceeds to the poor, and you shall have riches in heaven; and come and be a follower of mine." This may seem a harsh requirement and a hard demand. Yet, in a sense, it is made of all of us. We do not hesitate to make a general application of the words "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth . . . but rather lay up treasures in heaven . . . for where a man's treasure is, there will his heart be also." The only difference in the two statements is that one proposes a test for him who is in the process of laying up treasure, while this has to do with one who already has it accumulated. The faith required to divest one's self of amassed wealth to have treasure in heaven, is equal to that required to keep from amassing wealth for the same reason. Neither will succeed if there is a tendency to trust in wealth as an evidence of security.

It required this to bring the young man face to face with himself. It was revealed that money in the bank meant more than treasure in heaven, that before he would sell what he already possessed, he would forfeit all hope of eternal life. This served to demonstrate how vain was his boast that he had kept the law inviolate from his youth. He would likely have violated every command in the Decalogue to have preserved his fortune, thus he had not really kept the law at all, because his heart was not right. He had kept his eye on the commandments and his heart on his bank statement. The emptiness which drove him to Jesus was lack of real spiritual motive. The end of his visit is a sad record. "At these words his brow darkened, and he went away sad; for he was possessed of great wealth."

When the young ruler departed, Jesus said to the disciples, "I solemnly tell you that it is with difficulty that a rich man will enter the Kingdom of the Heavens. I repeat it to you: it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God." (Matt. 19:23, 24. Weymouth). The apostles were dumbfounded at this and asked, "Who then can be saved?" To this Jesus replied, "With men this is impossible, but with God everything is possible." This can only be understood in the light of conditions in that day.

The disciples were generally poor, humble men, who had been accustomed to hardships and toil. They beheld the wealthy and opulent class, living in luxury, and basking in the prestige which was theirs. It appeared that they could have anything they desired. If those who had all the privileges and conveniences of life could not attain the goal, it appeared there would be no hope for the poverty-stricken masses. But the words of Jesus demonstrated that God could accomplish what man could not dream of doing. The kingdom of heaven does not depend upon earthly wealth or power for survival. Citizenship therein is secured by turning to child-like humility, by adoption of a high standard of righteousness, and by obedience to the Father's will.

The teaching of Jesus relative to the kingdom is like a diamond of many facets, sparkling and scintillating with different flashes as the light reflects upon it. One cannot begin to grasp its fulness by consideration of one or two aspects. This is evident when we recall that sometimes the kingdom is referred to as something which can be wrested from its citizens and given to others, sometimes it is portrayed as a state or condition; again it is depicted as an inheritance. The diversity is well illustrated by the variety of parables given. "He told them many things in parables." (Matt. 13:3).

Purpose of Parables

It is a common belief that Jesus spoke in parables so that his listeners could grasp the great truths he expressed. It is often said that his auditors were generally ignorant and unlearned, so that he was forced to employ illustrations in order for them to learn about heavenly things. We believe that a careful study will show the exact opposite to be the case. During the personal ministry of Jesus, it was not yet time for men to understand the great truths of the kingdom. By couching his lessons in such figurative language, the secrets of the kingdom were maintained, and yet a basis for unravelling those secrets at a later period was provided. It was for this reason that the parables spoken to the multitude were privately explained to the apostles.

After relating the parable of the sower, "The disciples proceeded to ask him what the parable meant. 'To you,' He replied, 'it is granted to know the secrets of the Kingdom of God; but all others are taught by parables, in order that they may see and yet not see, and may hear and yet not understand'" (Luke 8:9, 10. Weymouth). Matthew records the event thus, "And His disciples came and asked Him, 'Why do you speak to them in figurative language?' He replied, 'Because while to you it is granted to know the secrets of the Kingdom of the Heavens, to them it is not . . . I speak to them in figurative language for this reason, that while looking they do not see, and while hearing, they neither hear nor understand . . . To you then I will explain the parable of the Sower'" (13:10-18). The multitude who heard Jesus did not understand the kingdom by considering the parables; instead, we understand the parables by considering the kingdom.

There are exceptions to all rules, and while the above was generally true, there were a few notable cases which did not conform to the pattern. One of these concerned the wicked vine-dressers. The parable depicted a householder who planted a vineyard, put a fence around it, hewed out a vine-vat in it, and built a strong lodge in its midst. He then left it in the hands of vine-dressers and traveled abroad. One cannot help but see the similarity between this parable and the one recounted in Isaiah 5. The vineyard represented God's people planted as choice vines in the promised land, the fence was the law which restrained them and kept out alien influences. The winepress indicated God's expectation of fruitfulness, while the watchman's tower or keeper's lodge shows the protective care manifested toward God's chosen ones.

The vine-dressers were the leaders of the people, the priests, scribes and Pharisees. As the teachers and instructors, they were to fertilize the hearts of men by proper doctrine, prune out the dead wood of indifference and neglect, and exercise a continuous watchful regard. The vineyard was leased to them and they were expected to produce fruit as payment for the stewardship intrusted to them.

Just as it is in the realm of horticulture, so it is in the history of nations. There is a time when fruit is to be expected and the cultivation and effort bestowed should pay dividends. Accordingly, "when vintage time approached, he sent his servants to the vine-dressers to receive his grapes; but the vine-dressers seized the servants, and one they cruelly beat, one they killed, one they pelted with stones." This indicates that God expected the grapes of justice and righteousness from Israel (Isa. 5:7) long before the advent of the Messiah. The servants dispatched to collect his dues were the prophets, but the cruel and vindictive leaders of the people entreated these heavenly envoys in a shameful fashion, even putting some of them to death.

The persistence of God in attempting corrective measures, his longsuffering extended in hope of repentance, his forbearance in the face of insult, all of these are illustrated in the statement regarding the householder, "Again he sent another party of servants more numerous than the first," but the futility of the effort is seen in the result, "And them they treated in the same manner." The word of God through Jeremiah is appropriate at this point. "I have sent to you all my servants the prophets, sending them persistently, saying, 'Turn now every one of you from his evil way, and amend your doings, and do not go after other gods to serve them, and then you shall dwell in the land which I gave to you and your fathers.' But you did not incline your ear or listen to me." (35:15)

"Later still he sent to them his son, saying, 'They will respect my son.' But the vine-dressers when they saw the son, said one to another, 'Here comes the heir: come let us kill him and get his inheritance.' So they seized him, dragged him out of the vineyard and killed him." This constituted the crowning act of disrespect for the right and majesty of heaven, as evidenced by Jesus in his indictment of that generation. "You witness against your selves, that you are the sons of those who murdered the prophets. Fill up, then the measure of your fathers" (Matt. 23:31, 32). What was lacking in the completion of the persecution of servants was made up in the murder of the Son.

The first portion of this parable was history, the part we are now considering was prophecy. It is pregnant with meaning. Note that the vine-dressers, representing the leaders of Judaism, admit among themselves that the son is the heir and entitled to the patrimony. They do not plot his death because of mistaken identity, but because they recognize him. The plot to kill the son is an exact picture of what transpired. "From that day forward they planned and schemed in order to put him to death" (John 11:53). The very expressions are significant of the manner of his betrayal— seized, dragged, killed.

Of outstanding importance is the reason assigned by the vine-dressers for killing the son. "Let us kill him and get his inheritance." The hierarchy of Israel determined to keep the divine bounty for physical Israel. They believed that by getting the son out of the way, they could rule over God's people, and keep earthly control over the theocracy. By this means they could keep the favor of Rome and continue as a political power. "The high priests and Pharisees therefore held a meeting of the Sanhedrin. 'What steps are we taking?' they asked one another; 'for that man is performing a great number of miracles. If we leave him alone in this way, everybody will believe in him, and the Romans will come and blot out both our city and our nation'" (John 11:47, 48). Little did they realize that their rejection of the Son would produce the very catastrophe they sought to avert.

In the account of Matthew, the priests and Pharisees are led to pronounce their own sentence and express their own fate. The question is asked, "When the owner of the vineyard comes, what will he do to the vine-dressers?" The answer was, "He will put the wretches to a wretched death, and will entrust the vineyard to other vine-dressers who will render the produce to him at the vintage season." This pronouncement of the just deserts of the Jewish commonwealth by its own leaders will exonerate God from any charge of injustice to the nation. The destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. by the forces of Titus was merely the execution of this self-imposed sentence. Our Lord concludes, "That, I tell you, is the reason why the Kingdom of God will be taken away from you, and given to a nation which will produce the fruits thereof." Spiritual Israel will accomplish that in which physical Israel failed.

The record says, "After listening to his parables, the high priest and the Pharisees perceived that he was speaking about them; but though they were eager to lay hands upon him, they were afraid of the people, for by them he was regarded as a prophet" (Matt. 21:45, 46). The fact that the leaders of Jewish thought understood that Jesus was speaking about them makes their subsequent act in killing the Son all the more heinous. The parable itself should have been a warning, but was not regarded as such. Instead, it seemed only to have increased resentment as truth often does in the hearts of those who thus prove themselves unworthy.

Our present purpose is not to present a book on the parables, even though many of these illustrate vital features about the kingdom. Space will not permit an analysis of them all. The extensive growth of the kingdom is illustrated by the mustard-seed; the intensive growth by the leaven in dough; the accidental discovery of truth by some is portrayed by the treasure hidden in a field; the discovery as a result of long and eager search is depicted in the finding of the pearl of great price. The universality of it is found in the parable of the net cast into the waters of the sea; the final purging and separation, in the story of the tares.

Thus did the heir to the throne lay the foundation of his rule by mixing and mingling with his future subjects. Like a prince who forsakes the palace to dwell in the slums, that he may understand the problems of those who compose his realm, so did Jesus live with the poor of this world that he might convince them of a sympathetic heart and an attentive ear in their times of suffering and distress. This was genuine preparation for the kingdom.

From the Cross to the Crown

Contents

The earthly sojourn of our Lord was bounded by a recognition of his kingly estate. At his advent into the world, the Magi from the Eastern nations sought him out to present gold, frankincense and myrrh, traditional offerings bestowed upon monarchs. Their question upon arrival in Jerusalem, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" threw Herod and the entire city into a state of consternation. The cross upon which he died bore the, inscription, "This is Jesus the king of the Jews." Thus he entered the world and left it with testimony from others of his regal power. But the foreign astrologers and the Roman procurator were not the only ones who attested to the fact.

Early in his personal ministry, Jesus called Philip to follow him. Philip, in turn, located Nathanael and said to him, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law and also the prophets wrote, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph." When Jesus saw Nathanael approaching, he said, "Behold, an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile!" Nathanael asked, "How do you know me?" This seems to imply more than mere personal recognition. Nathanael sensed that Jesus could read and discern his heart, which was pure and sincere. Jesus answered him, "Before Philip called you, when you were under the fig tree, I saw you." A. B. Bruce, in his Training of the Twelve, may be correct in the statement, "He was a man much addicted to the habits of devotion: he had been engaged in spiritual exercises under cover of a fig tree before he met with Jesus." In any event, Nathanael, being surprised at such prescience, burst out with, "Rabbi, you are the Son of God! You are the King of Israel!" Jesus called Nathanael a true Israelite; Nathanael recognized him as the true King.

At the beginning of the week of his crucifixion, Jesus was given special honor by a large crowd. Those who had been present at the raising of Lazarus had given ample testimony of this notable feat, so that, when it was noised abroad that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, a great crowd went out to meet him. In preparation for this entrance Jesus had previously dispatched two of his disciples to an adjacent village, to secure an ass which they found tied, with her colt standing by. The ass and foal were brought and the disciples placed their garments upon the animals as a saddle. Riding upon these lowly domestic beasts, Jesus was met by a huge throng, and when they saw him, a great cry was raised, "Hosanna! Blessed be he who comes in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel!"

The excitement of the occasion swelled and grew. Some cast their garments down, others bestrewed the road with palm branches, making a royal pathway of triumph. As Jesus rode along with the multitude pressing about him, and their cheers and salutes rending the air, the carping Pharisees said to one another, "You see that you can do nothing; look, the world has gone after him" (John 12:19). It is sad to recall that he who entered the city acclaimed as a king would be taken outside of it to be crucified in less than a week.

But the death of Jesus was essential to his kingship. This was an anomaly not appreciated by the Jewish leaders of his day. Yet a careful study of God's revelation must convince the eager student that in no other way could he become heir to the throne.

1. It is evident that the kingdom of God was invested in the Jewish economy prior to the death of Jesus. So long as the first covenant was effective it acted as a middle wall of partition, making impossible the achievement of God's ultimate purpose which was "a plan for the fulness of time to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Eph. 1:10). The covenant was not to be destroyed but fulfilled, which required that its sacrifices reach their goal in the one great sacrifice to which they pointed. "For by a single offering he has perfected for all time those who are sanctified" (Heb. 10:14). "Having canceled the bond which stood against us with its legal demands; this he set aside, nailing it to the cross" (Col. 2:14). The kingdom of the Messiah must have as a foundation promises superior to those under the first covenant. "Christ has obtained a ministry which is as much more excellent than the old as the covenant he mediates is better, since, it is enacted on better promises" (Heb. 8:6). For this reason "He abolishes the first in order to establish the second" (Heb. 10:9).

2. The kingdom of the Messiah was to be essentially one of peace. "Of the increase of his government and of peace there will be no end" (Isa. 9:7). "And I will make with you an everlasting covenant . . . for you shall go out in joy, and be led forth in peace" (Isa. 55:12). "I will make your overseers peace and your taskmasters righteousness" (Isa. 60:17). Since there can be no real peace among men until they are at peace with God, the prime objective was not to pacify those who would be the subjects of the kingdom, but to restore a proper relationship of all to God. Peace on earth can only come from peace in heaven. But peace can never rule in a heart that is filled with a guilt complex. Therefore, justification is required before a guilty sinner can be at peace.

Every sin must carry with it a penalty, and there must either be expiation or the guilty must pay the penalty. "Since all have sinned and fallen short of the glory of God, they are justified by his grace, as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith" (Rom. 3:24, 25). "Jesus our Lord was put to death for our trespasses and raised for our justification" (Rom. 4:25) "Therefore since we are justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:1).

The cross of Christ is the rallying point for every soul blighted by sin. As men draw near to it they draw closer to each other. Peace is destroyed by selfishness and pride. The cross is a monument to the greatest act of unselfish devotion the world has ever seen. Here the pure died for the impure, the just for the unjust, the sinless for the sinner, the godly for the ungodly. No man can exalt himself at the cross where Jesus humbled himself and became obedient unto death. Upon that tree the Shepherd died for the sheep, the King for his subjects, the Captain for his soldiers, and the Master for his slaves. No wonder that those who were once segregated by hatred extend hands of peace to each other.

"Now in Christ you who once were far off have been brought near in the blood of Christ. For he is our peace, who hath made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility . . . and might reconcile us both to God in one body through the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end. And he came and preached peace to you who were far off and peace to you who were near; for through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father" (Eph. 2:13-18). Hostility is ended, reconciliation is accomplished, and nearness achieved, through the cross. In Christ there was no divided purpose; in him our own hearts merge and flow together. Mutual access to the Father means mutual success in winning peace.

3. The citizens of the kingdom were to be those who were ransomed or redeemed. The price of redemption was the blood of him whose loyal subjects they were to be. Thus their obedience would be prompted by love. "The Son of man came not to be served, but to serve, and to give his life. a ransom for many" (Mt. 20:28). "For there is one God, and there is one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all" (1 Tim. 2:5, 6). "Who gave himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity and to purify for himself a people of his own who are zealous for good deeds" (Titus 2:14). "You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot" (1 Pet. 1:18, 19).

A consideration of these factors cements together those who acknowledge the sovereignty of the Messiah. All were enslaved, all were captives of sin, all stood equally in need of redemption. In this particular no one in the kingdom has any ground for pride or arrogance. The universal recognition of helplessness and dependency, the sense, of his overwhelming and abiding love, these work together for the glory of God and our own unity as kindred spirits. Only an event of supreme importance could achieve this result. Such an event was the death of the Messiah. "For the love of Christ controls us, because we are convinced that one has died for all, therefore all have died. And he died for all, that those who live might live no longer for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised" (2 Cor. 5:14, 15).

4. The great enemy of souls is "the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is the Devil and Satan" (Rev. 20:2). As the opposer of all that is good, he seeks to thwart the purpose of God with reference to the kingdom. The great struggle is described as war upon the battlements of heaven. "Now war arose in heaven, Michael and his angels fighting against the dragon; and the dragon and his angels fought, but they were defeated, and there was no longer any place for them in heaven. And the great dragon was thrown down, that ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world— he was thrown down to the earth, and his angels were thrown down with him. And I heard a loud voice in heaven, saying, 'Now the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our God and the authority of his Christ have come, for the accuser of our brethren has been thrown down'" (Rev. 12:7-10).

It was fitting that as a prelude to his reign, the Son of God, should grapple with the arch-fiend of the ages, and do so upon his own territory, that of death. If, after he was "crucified and killed by the hands of lawless men," motivated by Satan, he could be kept imprisoned by the bonds of death, the purpose of God would be forever frustrated. On the other hand, if Jesus willingly submitted to death and could not be held by its bonds, the power of Satan would be broken. "Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise partook of the same nature, that through death he might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifetime bondage" (Heb. 2:14, 15).

No other man could make this test, for all were doomed to death by virtue of their own sin. In every one of them the ruler of this world had fastened the venomed sting of sin whose end is death. Only Jesus could say, "The ruler of this world is coming. He has no power over me" (John 14:30). He owed nothing to death, and thus he could voluntarily surrender his life as the supreme test of power over Satan. "I lay it down of my own accord. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again; this charge I have received from my Father" (John 10:18). Death could not retain him. "But God raised him up, having loosed the pangs of death, because it was not possible for him to be held by it" (Acts 2:24).

In triumph, Jesus could say, "I am the living one; I died, and behold I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of Death and Hades" (Rev. 1:18). Thus it is affirmed that he "abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:10). The grapple with Satan in the realm of death, and the successful overthrow of his dominion, brings renewed hope to every soul of man, and points to final victory.

Jesus was but the first-fruits of a great harvest. "But in fact Christ has been raised from the dead, the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep . . . For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. But each in his own order: Christ the first fruits, then at his coming those who belong to Christ (1 Cor. 15:20-23).

The removal of the first covenant, the establishment of peace, the ransom of souls to provide a basis of love, the conquest of Satan and the overthrow of his great enslaving force, all of these required the death of the Messiah. This is far from being a complete list of reasons assigned for this momentous event, and to enumerate the blessings accruing therefrom would be to run the entire gamut of God's marvelous provision. But those we have mentioned are directly related to his right to rule as king and to have all authority bestowed upon him.

Jesus and Pontius Pilate

Daniel predicted the rise of four great universal empires. In the last of these, God was to set up a kingdom which would never be destroyed, but which was to break in pieces and destroy all of these kingdoms. When Jesus was arrested, after the betrayal by Judas Iscariot, he was taken before Pontius Pilate. Thus the king of the heavenly commonwealth was brought face to face with the representative of the fourth world power. Never did two more diverse personalities confront each other.

Pilate was the sixth Roman Procurator of Judea. He succeeded Valerius Gratus, and held the office, for ten years. He was a corrupt politician, devoid of high principle, and motivated by a love for power and a lust for distinction. Avaricious and greedy, he fell readily into temptation, and pursued such policies as promoted his personal ambition. In his dealings with the Jews he was tyrannical and despotic, cruel and murderous. He was a demonstration of foreign power at its worst level.

It was to this man Jesus was taken early on that day which was to be the day of his death. He had already been subjected to questioning by Annas, who then sent him bound to Joseph Caiaphas, his son-in-law and the high priest recognized by the Romans. When the Jews reached the Praetorium where the governor lived, they would not enter, fearing ceremonial defilement which would render them unclean and unable to eat the passover. Accordingly, Pilate went out to the mob, and demanded to know what legal accusation they filed against their bound prisoner. The Jews replied with some insolence that if the man had not been an evil-doer, they would not have handed him over.

Pilate, not wishing to become involved in another of the prolonged disputes which generally terminated in a wrangle, told them to take him and judge him by their own law. The Jewish leaders, showing they were already determined on his fate, reminded Pilate that under Roman jurisdiction, the right to assess the death penalty had been taken from them, and they could not lawfully carry out a sentence of capital punishment.

Pilate retired into the Praetorium, and summoned Jesus to him. His first question was directly to the point, "Are you the King of the Jews?" Jesus asked him if the question was based upon his own observation, or if it were merely a report which he had heard from others. The procurator thus had to face the issue, as to whether he had seen any seditious moves upon the part of Jesus, which would endanger the Roman authority, or tend to pose a threat against the occupational forces. If not, he ought to be careful about being influenced by malicious reports of those who were ever on the alert to create difficulty for the Roman garrisons.

This moved Pilate to ask, "Am I a Jew?" This was said to offset the idea that he might be motivated by any Jewish prejudices. Being a Roman he would not be inclined to partiality toward one group or another among the Jews, and thus he implied he was capable of deciding the matter relative to the accusation lodged against Jesus upon the merits of the case. Subsequent events demonstrate that this was not true, for political ambition and personal security caused him to allow an innocent man to be killed.

Nevertheless, Pilate pointed out to Jesus, as the two conferred in private, that his own nation with its highest religious leaders had delivered him to the Roman authority. This, upon the very face of it, implied that some serious crime was involved. The accusation presented to Pilate was, "We found this man perverting our nation, forbidding us to give tribute to Caesar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Lk. 23:2). The essence of the matter was that Jesus was attempting to overthrow the yoke of Caesar and set himself up as a king in his stead. It is remarkable to contemplate that this is exactly what the Jews wanted in a Messiah, and now that Jesus refused to meet their designs, they pose as friends of Caesar and seek to make it appear that he is an enemy of the king.

The defense of Jesus, consisted not of a denial that he was a king, but rather of an explanation of the nature of his reign. "My kingship is not of this world; if my kingship were of this world, my servants would fight, that I might not be handed over to the Jews; but my kingship is not from the world." This constituted an admission that Jesus was a king, but that his rule would not necessarily infringe upon, overthrow, or depose that of those who ruled in a different sphere. There are two kinds of kingdoms— those of this world, and that one which is not of this world. Each has its own domain and these are not by their nature in conflict. Thus, one may render unto Caesar the things that are his, while at the same time rendering unto God the things that belong unto him.

Jesus made the distinction clear, by affording Pilate a concrete example of difference. The kingdoms of this world must defend themselves with armed strength. They maintain standing armies for defense against aggression and violation of their sovereign rights. "When a strong man, fully armed, guards his own palace, his goods are in peace" (Lk. 11:21). If the kingship of Jesus had been of this world, he would have drilled and trained his disciples as a fighting force, and they would have engaged in combat with the Jews, to protect his person and kingly domain. Such an army might also have posed a threat to Caesar and his legions in Palestine, but as it was, no such thing had occurred.

Although Pilate may not have understood all that was involved in the reply of Jesus, the expression "My kingship" impressed the praetor, and he said, "So you are a king?" To this, Jesus replied, "You have spoken truthfully, I am a king." The Roman governor must have considered Jesus as a fanatic, harmless and deluded, but posing no particular problem of insurrection or sedition. Leaving him in the Praetorium, he went outside and said to the waiting mob, "I find no crime in him." He then referred to the annual custom of releasing a noted prisoner at the Passover, and asked, "Will you have me release for you the King of the Jews?" They screamed, "Not this man, but Barabbas!"

Pilate wanted to curry favor with the Jews. He returned to the inside of the building and gave orders for Jesus to be scourged, as if in preparation for the sentence of death. The soldiers who administered the beating added insult to injury. They put a crown of interwoven thorns on his head, arrayed him in a purple robe, placed a reed scepter in his hand, and slapped him as they greeted him in derision, "Hail, King of the Jews!" Again Pilate went outside and announced to the Jews, "I am bringing him out to you, that you may know I find no crime in him." The purpose evidently was to excite sympathy for one whose calm demeanor and patient endurance witnessed to his innocence and freedom from guilt. Thus Pilate pointed to him and said, "Here is the man!"

When the chief priests and officers saw him, they again took up the shout, "Crucify him!" Pilate said to them, "Take him yourselves and crucify him, for I find no crime in him." The Jews answered, "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he has made himself the Son of God." This was a new charge which Pilate had not previously heard. It inspired fear in his superstitious heart, and once more he took Jesus inside the Praetorium and enquired, "Where are you from?" Jesus did not reply. The governor said, "You will not speak to me? Do you not know that I have power to release you, or power to crucify you?" Jesus answered, "You would have no power over me unless it had been given from above; therefore he who delivered me to you has the greater sin."

Once more Pilate sought to release him but the Jews cried out, "If you release this man, you are not Caesar's friend; every one who makes himself a king sets himself against Caesar." This was a shaft in a vulnerable spot. It was a blow which could not be ignored. The political opportunist was torn between conflicting emotions. Again he brought Jesus out to the mosaic floor where the judgment seat rested. He said to the Jews, "Here is your King!" They cried out, "Away with him, crucify him! Pilate said, "Shall I crucify your King?" The chief priests spoke up quickly, "We have no king but Caesar!" Pilate, despairing of further reasoning, washed his hands in symbolic gesture and turned Jesus over to them to be crucified.

Jesus was taken, bearing his own cross, to the place called Golgotha, where he was crucified between two lawbreakers. It was the custom to place a written notice of the charge which resulted in execution over the head of each victim. Pilate wrote the title "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews" and attached it to the cross. It was written in three languages, Hebrew, Latin and Greek, and it was read by many of the Jews, because the place was near the city. The chief priests came and applied to Pilate for an alteration of the statement to read, "This man said, 'I am King of the Jews.'" But Pilate curtly dismissed them with the words, "What I have written, I have written."

Far away, in the imperial city on the Tiber, the reigning Caesar sat, unaware that in a remote and insignificant area of his far-flung empire, a political appointee had just consented to a deed, the results of which would affect every soul born among men. Little did he realize that before the final act of this drama, the mighty Roman empire would topple and fall, and the stone cut out of the mountain without human agency would smite the great image of world conquest and forever shatter the hope of its reconstruction. The cross which was an emblem of shame and disgrace was to become a badge of honor, adopted by institutions of mercy and compassion. The banners of Rome would some day give way before the triumphant cross.

We should not overlook the fact that it was not the death of Jesus, but his resurrection which proved his divine Sonship, and thus his right to universal recognition as the Messiah. The death of Jesus by itself could not have constituted "good news." But the fact that he "was put to death for our trespasses and raised for our justification" (Rom. 4:25), establishes forever his sovereign prerogatives. He was "designated Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness by his resurrection from the dead" (Rom. 1:4). Before he died, Jesus predicted his death and resurrection. He predicated the latter upon the fact that he was the Son of God. Since God would not raise an impostor, the resurrection of Jesus is proof that he is the Son, and thus the Messiah.

It was for this reason that "he showed himself alive with many sure proofs" (Acts 1:3). The abundance of the proofs is apparent to every reader, their undeniable nature, being also clearly manifested. He appeared unto his witnesses in closed rooms and in the open road, upon a mountain and by the seaside, at early morning, in daytime, at dusk, and at night. He was seen of both men and women, by individuals, small groups, and a multitude numbering more than five hundred. He walked, talked and ate with them. He permitted and invited close examination of his person, even urging it.

It was the resurrection which provided the theme for the early proclamation. The speech of Peter on Pentecost, reached its climax with such statements as "But God has raised him to life, having terminated the throes of death, for in fact it was not possible for him to be held fast by death," and again, "This Jesus, God has raised to life— a fact to which all of us testify." That this was the central truth emphasized, is evidenced by the anger of the priests, the commander of the temple guard, and the Sadducees, who were "highly incensed at their teaching the people and proclaiming in the case of Jesus the resurrection from among the dead" (Acts 4:1, 2).

There was an interval of forty days between the resurrection of Jesus and his ascension into heaven. During this time he gave instructions to the apostles whom he had chosen (Acts 1:2). We are limited as to our knowledge of those instructions, but we know they were related to the kingdom, for it was of this he spoke when he appeared to them at intervals during this interim period. The apostles were the ambassadors of the kingdom, and as such, were to be dispatched upon their universal mission as soon as the new monarch was coronated.

It is conceivable that these former fishermen and tax collectors would require a great deal of encouragement and assistance from him whose cause they were to represent. We do know that he confirmed what he had previously told them, and pointed out the fulfillment of all that was written in the Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms, concerning himself. Then he opened their minds to understand the Scriptures, and said, "Thus it is written that the Christ would suffer and on the third day rise again from among the dead; and that proclamation would be made, in his name, of repentance and forgiveness of sins to all the nations, beginning at Jerusalem. You are witnesses of these things. And remember that I am about to send out my Father's promised gift to rest upon you; but as for you, wait patiently in the city until you are clothed with power from on high" (Luke 24:44-49).

When we consider the fierce nationalism of the Galileans, and the general tenor of the Messianic belief, we should not be too surprised that "Once when they were with him, they asked him, 'Master, is this the time at which you are about to restore the kingdom for Israel?'" The breadth of vision which enabled the Jewish mind to grasp the transformation from the theocracy of Israel to the Christocracy of the universe had not yet come. And when it came it would be in reverse of the common anticipation, for instead of restoring the kingdom to Israel, it would require the restoring of Israel to the kingdom of God.

The reply of Jesus to the apostles is an example of kindliness and brevity. "It is not for you to know times or epochs which the Father has reserved within his own authority; and yet you will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you, and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the remotest parts of the earth." How pregnant is that statement with portent of things to come. It contains no learned or lengthy discussion of the nature of the Reign. For this the apostles were not ready. Jesus was perfectly willing to rest such matters with the Spirit, whose advent would "guide them into all truth." The assurance that they would be witnesses, not only within the confines of Palestine, but to the remotest bounds of the earth, was sufficient just now to convey the universal nature of the Reign, and while they could not yet grasp the significance of the expression, they would later reflect upon it, and know its meaning.

According to Luke, these words represented the final message as Jesus took leave of these men. There was no maudlin sympathy, no tearful kiss or embrace. He was "as a man going into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." The simple dignity of the occasion strikes us with its appropriateness. "When he had said this, and while they were looking at him, he was carried up, and a cloud closing beneath him, hid him from their sight." Nor did the men who remained indulge in paroxysms of grief. They acted, not as those who had lost a friend, but as those who had gained one. "They worshipped him and returned to Jerusalem with great joy" (Luke 24:52). Thus did they demonstrate their love, for he had said, "If you loved me you would have rejoiced because I am going to the Father" (John 14:28).

At this juncture, three topics should engage our attention. Why was it necessary for our Lord to return to heaven? What did the disciples do in the interim until his coronation? What took place at the coronation ceremony in the heavens?

Reasons for the Return

1. Jesus told the apostles, "It is to your advantage that I go away" (John 16:7). While this was difficult for them to understand, since grief filled their hearts at the time, he explained that the coming of the Advocate was contingent upon his departure. "Unless I go away, the Advocate will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you" (verse 8). The great mission of the apostles could not be filled without the Advocate, the Holy Spirit. He was to teach them everything, to bring to memory all that Jesus said unto them. He was to be a witness concerning Jesus, and enable them to testify fully and completely. He would guide them into all truth, and take what belonged to Jesus and make it known to the apostles. He would convict the world in respect of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.

2. The return of Jesus to heaven would enable his ambassadors to do greater things than he did while present upon the earth. "In most solemn truth I tell you that he who trusts in me— the things which I do he shall do also; and greater things than these shall he do, because I am going to the Father" (John 14:12). Does this last refer to miraculous deeds as so many modern cults interpret it? If so, in what sense is the word "greater" used? It cannot refer to quantity, for the same record declares, "But there are also many other things which Jesus did — so vast a number indeed that if they were all described in detail, I suppose that the world itself could not contain the books that would have to be written" (John 21:25). It cannot refer to the quality of physical miracles, for nothing can exceed the raising of Lazarus from the tomb, as a demonstration of power.

We believe that the proper understanding of this expression has to do with a contrast of the spiritual with the physical realm. The apostles were to do greater things because Jesus was going to the Father. There was nothing about his going to the Father which would empower them to do greater physical acts than he could accomplish while he was here. He had long since told this same group, "Cure the sick, raise the dead to life, cleanse lepers, drive out demons" (Matt. 10:8). What was to be their task which Jesus could not accomplish during his sojourn on earth, and which they could accomplish only by his return to heaven, and which constituted "greater things" than miracles attesting his divine mission?

We feel that the secret to this is revealed in the proclamation of the apostles, of which the speech of Peter in the house of Cornelius is typical. "That same Jesus God raised to life on the third day, and permitted him to appear unmistakably, not to all the people, but to witnesses— men previously chosen by God— namely, to us, who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead. And he has commanded us to preach to the people and solemnly declare that this is he who has been appointed by God to be the Judge of the living and the dead. To him all the prophets bear witness, and testify that through his name all who believe in him should receive the forgiveness of his sins" (Acts 10:39-43).

The proclamation of Jesus as judge of the living and dead, and of forgiveness of sins through his name, could only be made after he had taken the throne by appointment of the Father. Our Lord, with one exception, limited his miraculous works to the Jewish people, but the apostles were to announce liberation from sin to the believers of all nations. This is the significance of the term "all who believe" as uttered by Peter in the Gentile home. Just as the saving of souls is superior to the healing of physical ailments, so their work, under the authority of Jesus, was superior to all that had previously been done. One secured an extension of temporal life, the other brought an offer of eternal life.

3. Another reason for the ascent of Jesus was to prepare a place for his disciples. He comforted the sorrowing apostles with the assurance that there are numerous places of abode in the house of the Father, and declared his intent to go before and make reservations for their coming. This does not imply that he was going away to build or construct some place not now in existence, but rather to arrange for an abode for the faithful. He told them that if he went away he would return and take them unto him so they might always be together.

4. The office of high priest, which Jesus now occupies, necessitated his return to heaven. It is God's design that his people constitute a royal priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices, and such a priesthood requires a notable high priest. But "if he were on earth, he would not be a priest at all" (Heb. 8:4). "Moreover we needed just such a high priest as this— holy, guileless, undefiled, far removed from sinful men and exalted above the heavens" (Heb. 7:26). "Inasmuch, then, as we have in Jesus, the Son of God, a great high priest who has passed beyond the sky, let us hold firmly to our profession of faith." Under the first covenant, national atonement could not be made until the high priest entered the most holy place with the blood of the sacrifice. "But Christ appeared as a high priest of the blessings that are soon to come by means of the greater and more perfect tent of worship, a tent which has not been built with hands— that is to say does not belong to this material creation— and once for all entered the holy place, taking with him not the blood of goats and calves, but his own blood, and thus procuring eternal redemption for us" (Heb. 9:11, 12).

5. Even more appropriate to the theme of this book is the fact that it was necessary for Jesus to return to heaven in order to rule as king over a universal domain. Zechariah predicted that he would build a temple of the Lord, and bear the glory, that he should sit and rule upon his throne; and be a priest upon his throne (6:13). Since he could not be a priest until he was upon his throne, and since he could not be a priest upon earth, it was necessary for him to leave the earth in order to sit and rule upon his throne.

The ascension of Jesus bore the same relation to his glorification that his descent did to his humiliation. Only by means of return to heaven could there be a resumption of the pre-incarnate glory with the Father. "I have glorified thee on earth, having accomplished the work which thou gavest me to do, and now, Father, glorify thou me in thy own presence with the glory which I had with thee before the world was made" (John 17:4, 5). Because of his humiliation the glory accorded him was increased. "And being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore God has highly exalted him, and bestowed on him the name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:8-11). "He reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature, upholding the universe by his word of power. When he had made purification for sins, he sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high, having become as much superior to angels as the name he has obtained is more excellent than theirs" (Heb. 1:3, 4).

The Scene on Earth

The Mount of Olives lies east of Jerusalem. From its steep ascent, which is two hundred feet higher than the walled city, one looks down upon "the city of the great king." It was a fitting spot from which the Prince of David could begin his journey to the far land to receive his kingdom. The little group of men walked together with the Master over the road their feet had so often pressed. The conversation was no different than it had been upon numerous such occasions in the past. They came at last to the crown of the mount, as far as Bethany.

The fateful moment had come. He had long ago prepared them for the occasion, with the words, "The days will come, when the bridegroom is taken away from them." Now he lifted up his hands and blessed them and "while he blessed them, he parted from them" (Luke 24:51). One moment he was speaking, and the next they beheld him ascending into the air. As they stood transfixed, watching his receding form, straining their eyes to see him until the last, a cloud enveloped him and took him from their sight. Still they remained with upturned faces, watching as if they expected him soon to return and resume his conversation. Then they suddenly became aware of two additions to their number, men in white robes, who gently broke the spell of awe with the words, "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking into heaven? This Jesus, who was taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven."

We do not know which of the apostles first spoke, or what was said. But the little group turned back toward Jerusalem, walking the familiar path. They were not melancholy. There was in the bosom of each a feeling of triumph. Their faith had been vindicated. By going back to the Father, Jesus had proven that he had come from the Father. "He that ascended is he also that descended." God had not only raised him from the dead but he had now exalted him. "They returned to Jerusalem with great joy" (Luke 24:52). When they entered the city they went to the upper room which was their temporary abode. Here they could meditate upon and converse about the recent happenings in relative privacy.

The days of waiting were not spent in idleness. The apostles were Jews and scrupulously observed the requirements of Judaism. They were approaching the second great annual feast of the Jews, and their minds would be attuned to its meaning and observance. Each day they assembled twice at the temple at the time of the daily sacrifices, and with the devout Jews joined in prayer, according to their custom (Luke 24:53). In addition to this, they devoted themselves to prayer in the upper room which was the gathering place of those who had been close to Jesus during his earthly stay. Here they were joined by the women, including Mary, the mother of Jesus, as well as his brothers (Acts 1:14). This is the last mention of Mary and her name never appears in the sacred text after the congregation of saints was planted at Jerusalem. This is a silent rebuke to the apostate church which has developed dogmata and rituals about her.

One day, when the company of disciples was assembled, about one hundred and twenty being present, Peter stood up and called attention to the prophetic utterances relating to Judas who acted as a guide for those who arrested Jesus. Referring to David, it was acknowledged that he spoke under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, and the scripture had to be fulfilled with reference to the dereliction of Judas. Attention was also called to the fact that another was to take the vacated office. In view of this, Peter urged that an additional witness of the resurrection be selected from among those who had been companions of Jesus during the entire course of his personal ministry, from his immersion in Jordan to his ascension into heaven. The company of believers thereupon put forward two men, Joseph Barsabbas and Matthias. Calling upon God to show which one he had chosen as a replacement for Judas, they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Matthias.

When nine days had gone by since the departure of Jesus, the preparation for Azereth, or Pentecost, began. All day long bands of pilgrims were streaming through the gates into the holy city. It was now early summer and Palestine lay in all her glory. Traveling conditions were less arduous at this season of year, and thousands came to the celebration of "the day of firstfruits" who could not attend other annual feasts. The bazaars and markets were teeming with a polyglot mass. Jews were present from every nation under heaven. Every group seemed to have a distinct dialect, and as one passed through the crowds, he could hear the languages of Persia, Arabia, Asia Minor, Egypt, Rome, and a score of other places. In addition to the Jews, there were numerous proselytes, many of them men of reputation and distinction in the Greek world, who had become converts to Judaism because of its high code of ethics and morality.

As dusk arrived a hush of expectancy fell over the milling throng. Suddenly the stillness was broken by a blast blown on the trumpets of the priests. There would be little sleep this night. The temple and courtyard were lighted with hundreds of lamps. The great altar of bronze had been literally as well as ceremonially cleansed. It reflected the glitter of the lamps and torches in its polished surface. As soon as the midnight hour arrived, the gatekeepers threw open the gates to the temple. Every sacrifice which the people proposed to bring to the feast had to be carefully scrutinized and examined by the priestly officials before the time for the morning sacrifice. All night long the worshipers came and went, securing the approval of the priests.

When morning dawned and the sun peeped over the rim of the eastern hills and flooded Palestine with light, the inspection came to a halt. It was time for the sacred activities of the day to commence. The choir of Levites was solemnly arranged on the steps, the children of the Levites standing in formation below them. A single flute began its piping tones and the great choir began the chant of the "Hallel." The multitude, stretching as far as eye could see, repeated the words, or sometimes responded with the appropriate portion. It was a time of deep solemnity, of awe-inspiring pageant. The special offerings of the day consisted of two young bulls, a ram, seven male yearling lambs, and a male goat. The latter was led to the great altar first, and the hands of the priest were laid solemnly upon its horns. The priest bore down with all of his weight upon the head of the sacrifice and confession of sins was made in a loud voice. Then the animal was stretched out with neck bared to receive the keen blade of Damascus steel which severed the jugular, the spurting blood from which was caught in a silver vessel pointed at the bottom so that it could never be set down, and in which the blood could be constantly agitated to keep it from coagulating until it could be sprinkled upon the horns of the altar.

The principal part of the day's ritual was the presentation of the two wave loaves. Each of the three great annual feasts was so timed as to constitute a harvest festival. The paschal feast came at the barley harvest; Pentecost at wheat harvest; the feast of tabernacles at the vintage-gathering. A little more than three pecks of wheat were selected from the best in the land of Palestine. The grain was brought to the temple, threshed out of the heads, pulverized and then ceremonially put through twelve sieves. An omer of flour was selected for each loaf, and mixed with lukewarm water, then patted out long and flat, each loaf being seven handbreaths long, four handbreaths wide, and four fingers thick. These loaves, each of which weighed more than five pounds, were baked in the temple.

The little band of followers of the Nazarene, like all devout Jews, had looked forward to the great day with its throng of pilgrims from every land. Now that it had dawned, drawn together by previous association and by a common bond cemented by a mutual faith that Jesus was the Messiah of whom the prophets had spoken, the twelve found themselves in the same room. Suddenly there swept over them a sound from heaven like the rush of a mighty wind. The house was filled with the sound. They looked at each other in amazement, and their wonder grew as they saw tongues with the appearance of flame sitting upon the heads of all. Immediately they became aware of the presence of the Holy Spirit, and being filled therewith, their own tongues were loosed and they began to speak in various languages of mankind as the Spirit controlled their tongues and prompted them to give utterance to the mighty works of God. They recognized this visual and oral demonstration as a confirmation of the fact that Jesus was now on his throne (Acts 2:33). The restrictions imposed were lifted, the monarch was seated in power, and it was now time for their work as ambassadors to commence. Accordingly, they proclaimed the authority of the Sovereign and entreated men to recognize it. The Christocracy had begun.

The Heavenly Scene

Contents

It was now the morning of the fortieth day since his slumber in the tomb of the Arimathean had ended and Jesus had arisen to remove the death napkin from his face, to fold it and place it carefully upon the stone bench. The stone fitted into the slot of the door had been rolled aside by the two messengers, and as he prepared to walk from the sepulcher, they entered, and after saluting him took their respective places where he had lain, one at the head, the other at the feet. Since that day he had been with his followers, showing himself alive with frequent undeniable proofs. Often he had enjoyed intimate association with just a few of them, but upon the occasion in Galilee more than five hundred had assembled to look upon him and listen to him.

Now the work he had come to do was almost finished. The sleepless nights, the weary marches, the hunger and thirst, the prick of thorns, the agony of the cross, all of these, were behind him. These things he had endured while despising the shame, for he was confident of the joy that awaited. And today that joy would be his. He would leave the earth which he entered as a babe, from the summit of favored Olivet. As they walked toward it, he gave his final instructions to the little group whom he called so many months ago. Little did they know what the future held for them, but all things work together for good to those who love the Lord.

At last they stood at the place. Before them lay Jerusalem, the inhabitants not dreaming of the drama unfolding just outside their gates. He lifted his hands in benediction, and blessed them, and as he did he felt the transformation. Slowly he began to rise from their midst and as he ascended he could see their upturned faces, with mingled emotions written upon their features. His form grew smaller to their gaze and a cloud enveloped him. As he went upward the two messengers speeding earthward passed him, and he knew they would reassure the apostles.

Of a sudden he was met with the twenty thousand chariots of heaven, and surrounded by thousands upon thousands of the messengers. He had gone forth upon the announcement of Gabriel as a helpless babe, his birth signaled by the choir of messengers to humble shepherds. Now he was returning as a conqueror, the keys of death and Hades in his grasp. Long generations ago, he whose throne would now be occupied, moved by the Holy Spirit, had sung of this occasion "With mighty chariots, twice ten thousand, thousands upon thousands, the Lord came from Sinai into the holy place. Thou didst ascend the high mount, leading captives in thy train, and receiving gifts from men" (Psalm 68:17, 18).

As the triumphant processional approached the gates of the city of the Eternal One, the mighty host burst into a reverberating chant, "Lift up your heads, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors! that the King of glory may come in." The thousands of messengers inside, as if in challenge to such a bold demand, responded in unison, demanding identification, "Who is the King of glory?" The host accompanying him in joyful acclaim cried out, "The Lord, strong and mighty, the Lord, mighty in battle! Lift up your heads, O gates! and be lifted up, O ancient doors! that the king of glory may come in!" Once again came the challenge, "Who is this king of glory!" The response followed, "The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory!" The gates swung wide and the procession entered (Psalm 24:7-10).

"Thrones were placed and one that was ancient of days took his seat;

his raiment was white as snow, and the hair of his head was like pure wool;

His throne was fiery flames, its wheels were burning fire.

A stream of fire issued and came forth from before him;

A thousand thousands served him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him . . .

And behold, with the clouds of heaven

there came one like a son of man, and he came to the Ancient of Days and was presented before him" (Daniel 7:9-13).

The fullness of glory was manifest. In the midst of the city of the Eternal One stood the throne with the vacant place at the right hand of the Ancient of Days. Around the throne was the rainbow that looked like an emerald. There were twenty-four additional thrones, and upon these were seated the twenty-four elders, dressed in shining white, and with golden crowns on their heads. Before the throne was as it were a sea of glass, like crystal. Round the throne, on each side were the four living creatures, each with six wings, and full of eyes all round and within, chanting without cessation "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty, who was and is and is to come!" With the ascription of praise by the living creatures, the elders would prostrate themselves before the throne, and removing their crowns would cast them before the throne, while chanting,

"Worthy art thou, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for thou didst create all things, and by thy will they existed and were created" (Rev. 4).

It was such a scene as greeted the Son of man when he was presented before the Ancient of Days for the coronation ceremony. The inaugural address was made by the Father in the audience "of many angels, numbering myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands." To these waiting thousands he made his proclamation "Let all God's angels worship him." In this one sentence the hierarchy of celestial messengers— principalities, powers, dominions— all were made subject to the Prince of peace.

Turning to the Son, the Father said, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. Thou hast loved righteousness and hated lawlessness, therefore God, thy God, has anointed thee with the oil of gladness beyond thy comrades. Sit at my right hand, till I make your enemies your footstool. The Lord sends forth from Zion your mighty scepter. Rule in the midst of your foes! The Lord has sworn and will not change his mind, 'You are a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.' Thou, Lord, didst found the earth in the beginning, and the heavens are the work of thy hands; they will perish, but thou remainest; they will all grow old like a garment, like a mantle thou wilt roll them up and they will be changed. But thou art the same, and thy years will never end."

Anointed with the oil of gladness, wearing the diadem of grace, the Son sat down with the Father on his throne. The Reign of the Messiah was now a fact.

The Nature of the Kingdom

Contents

The kingdom of the Messiah is one of conquest. It exists to subdue and subjugate the forces of rebellion. The words of God to the Son were, "Sit at my right hand till I make your enemies your footstool." This regime would never have been inaugurated if all the forces of the universe had remained faithful unto the Creator. It was made necessary by revolt in heaven and transgression on earth. When Satan was cast out of heaven and Adam was cast out of the garden of Eden, a state of rebellion against the authority of God was in evidence. Thus the duration of the Christocracy is marked by the time essential, in the divine wisdom, to bring the enemies into submission.

It is in view of these considerations that it was written, "The Lord sends forth from Zion your mighty scepter. Rule in the midst of your foes!" (Psalm 110:2). "Then comes the end, when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father after destroying every rule and every authority and power. For he must reign until he has put all enemies under his feet" (1 Cor. 15:28). So long as there is one alien force in the universe actively opposed to God, the design and order of creation for the glorification of God is not yet perfected. Before creation God was everything. During creation he was everything. But with the advent of rebellion upon the part of rational beings the picture was changed. It became necessary to inaugurate a Reign which would restore the primal purpose, and make God everything to everyone. "When all things are subjected to him, then the Son himself will also be subjected to him who put all things under him, that God may be everything to every one" (1 Cor. 15:28).

There are three regions in which responsible created beings exist. These are the celestial, the terrestrial, and the infernal. They are referred to as heaven, earth, and under the earth. The first is inhabited by the orders of angels, the second by men, and the third by the orders of demons. In all of these regions there must come a recognition of the authority of God. Accordingly God has bestowed all authority upon Jesus that he might accomplish the eternal purpose. "God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:9-11). Those who refused to acknowledge the God of glory must now acknowledge the authority of his heir to the glory of God.

The Reign of the Messiah, like every other creation of God, is perfectly adapted to conditions as they are and to the achievement of heaven's design. It is for this reason that it is an absolute monarchy, and not a democracy or republic. The God of the universe was not limited to the simile of a kingdom because the people of that day were not familiar with republics. Four centuries before Jesus was born of the virgin, the philosopher Plato had written his classic "The Republic." There are those citizens of democracies who feel that their form of government is the highest attainable, and they are troubled at the thought of God's choice of a type of government which is deemed inferior. But the conclusions are based upon false premises.

A democracy is the best form of rule in the present state of mankind, when the constituents are filled with avarice, greed and false ambition. In such a government, unjust rulers can be more easily dispossessed and shorn of authority. The public conscience, being driven to the point of revolt, will rise up and cast out of power those who would exercise despotic inclinations. In human monarchies there may often be a perpetuation of error and misery. The ruling family passes on to its successors the same evil tendencies, and these are often defended because of tradition and ancestral worship. It is difficult to overthrow a long established and well rooted dynasty.

But a democracy is best adapted to a state of peace and tranquility. It is not suited to a state of war. As proof of this we need only to cite how republics in times of great national danger from without, seek out a leader and delegate to him special powers, exalting him as a central figure, and surrendering their rights and privileges unto him. A monarchy is best fitted to prosecute war, for if the king be judicious and skilful, and his subjects be loyal, he can direct his forces to gain the maximum benefit. The Reign of heaven was created to make war incessantly against an implacable foe. In this great conflict there can be no cessation of hostilities and no flag of truce. It would not be feasible to allow the decisions to rest with a majority of the citizens, for even a majority may be mistaken.

Republics are always the outgrowth and by-products of abuses in government. It has ever been thus. The American colonies were first ruled by a monarch, and it was never considered by the early emigrants that they would establish a commonwealth which would revolt against the king of England. But when intolerable restraints were imposed and taxation was levied without representation being granted, this was branded as tyranny, and a revolution ensued. The Declaration of Independence was a statement of protest against violations of human rights, and our present form of government is an experiment in preservation and protection of those rights. Yet, in time of national fear, special powers are bestowed upon the chief executive, which really make the fate of the nation hang upon the decisions of one man.

If the crown could repose upon the wisest head and the scepter be wielded by the most benevolent hand in the realm, a monarchical government would be the most efficient, least cumbersome, and safest. But among fallen men, the wisest in jurisprudence are not always kind and considerate; and the philanthropist does not always possess wisdom and discretion. Therefore, a government which will permit dismissal of the inefficient and unworthy is highly esteemed. But in the Reign of heaven this is not so, and the salvation of the subjects is contingent upon the continuance of one in office. "Consequently he is able for all time to save those who draw near to God through him, since he always lives to make intercession for them" (Hebrews 7:25).

Because the Reign of heaven was instituted to put down revolt against God, and to subjugate those forces which oppose the will of the ruler of the universe, the language used by the Holy Spirit to describe the present state and activities of that Reign is that which describes war and conflict. Thus Jesus is reported as saying, "Do not think that I have come to bring peace on earth; I have not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Matt. 10:34). The recorder of the final book describes him as a general at the head of his armies, going forth to smite the nations. "I saw heaven opened and behold, a white horse! He who sat upon it is called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he judges and makes war. His eyes are like a flame of fire, and on his head are many diadems; and he has a name inscribed which no one knows but himself. He is clad in a robe dipped in blood, and the name by which he is called is The Word of God. And the armies of heaven, arrayed in fine linen, white and pure, followed him on white horses. From his mouth issues a sharp sword with which to smite the nations, and he will rule them with a rod of iron; he will tread the wine press of the fury of the wrath of God the Almighty. On his robe and on his thigh he has a name inscribed. King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev. 19:11-16).

In this great conflict of the ages all the powers of heaven, earth and hell are engaged. It is not an exaggeration to state that the revelation of God conceives of every responsible being in the whole universe as actively associated in the fight. It is a titanic struggle between all of the forces marshaled under the banner of right and those dedicated to the cause of error. The generalship is invested in supernatural beings, on one hand the Messiah of God, on the other the great opposer and slanderer, Diabolos. Angels and archangels of the celestial realm are opposed by demons of the infernal regions. The souls of men are the stakes for which the incessant conflict is waged.

The Messiah employs two means to overcome the enemies of God, reconciliation and destruction. That which cannot be reconciled unto God must be destroyed. In the end there must remain no weapon fashioned against the Eternal One; no alien voice which can dispute the absolute sovereignty of God over his universe. It would not be incorrect to say that the Reign of the Messiah is one of total destruction. He must either destroy the evil in our lives, or we must suffer destruction.

The arrangement of God is perfectly adapted to this end. It preserves inviolate the will of God and the will of his creatures. Any plan which compelled man against his will to obey God, would destroy the sovereignty of man; any plan which compelled God to accept man without willing obedience would destroy the sovereignty of God. But, in the ultimate, the will of God, which is absolute in right and truth, must prevail. Accordingly, he has revealed that will to man, and life on earth constitutes a period of probation during which man examines that will, and accepts or rejects it, with full knowledge of the consequences of either act. "For he has made known to us in all wisdom and insight the mystery of his will, according to his purpose which he set forth in Christ as a plan for the fulness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Eph. 1:9, 10).

Since man is so constituted that he can learn more readily by being shown, than by merely being told, God graciously arranged for one to come as an example, so that if there was any question as to the application to life of the principles of the revealed will, we might see them worked out practically, in his personal words and deeds. "For in him the whole fulness of deity dwells bodily, and you have come to fulness of life in him who is the head of all rule and authority" (Col. 2:9, 10). By his perfect submission to God he has shown men how to overcome feelings of hostility. Evil deeds are acts of rebellion against divine authority and estrange us from heaven. "For in him all the fulness of God was pleased to dwell, and through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross. And you, who once were estranged and hostile in mind, doing evil deeds, he has now reconciled in the body of his flesh by his death, in order to present you holy and blameless and irreproachable before him, provided that you continue in the faith" (Col. 1:19-23).

It should be noted that in the passage quoted above it is affirmed that as the fulness of the Deity dwells bodily in the Messiah, so we come to fulness of life in him. This proves there is more to life than mere existence. Men exist before they are in the Christ. It is fulness of life which cannot be obtained out of him. Since the fulness of Deity dwells in him, then those who dwell in him, are again in contact with Deity. God and man find a common meeting place in the Messiah. Please observe that the whole quotation is "You have come to fullness of life in him who is the head of all rule and authority."

Man was alienated from God by sin, which is the direct result of disrespect for God's authority. Sin separated man from God. "Your iniquities have made a separation between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you" (Isa. 59:2). Being cut off from God, he was cut off from the source of life. Now, by the exaltation of the Messiah to complete authority in the universe, it is possible for man to regain in him what was lost in Adam. "The first Adam became a living being; the last Adam became a lifegiving spirit" (1 Cor. 15:45). But the fulness of life cannot be enjoyed by one who does not recognize the supreme rule and authority of the Messiah. Life in its fulness begins with full surrender of life to the Lord of life.

As the Reign of heaven is adapted to the subjugation and restoration of mankind and the final triumph of truth, the message of the King is also adapted to the needs of mankind and to the present condition of the human family. As an alien, man needs first to be reconciled unto God; then, having been reconciled he needs to be trained in the course of conduct which will provide him the greatest happiness here and in the world to come. Since the Reign of the Messiah is a constitutional monarchy, man requires first to be informed as to the requirements essential to becoming a citizen; and after having been instructed into citizenship, he needs to be schooled in the duties and responsibilities of his new relationship. Thus, it can readily be seen that two diverse messages must be given by the King, one addressed to aliens for the purpose of induction; the other to citizens for the purpose of instruction.

Those who are aliens and hostile tend to look askance at any overtures of reconciliation. It was, therefore, necessary for the Messiah to perform an act of such stupendous importance, when he took his throne, that the suspicions of men would be allayed and they would become convinced of his grace. Accordingly, when his chosen envoys, empowered by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven, announced his sovereign rule and the terms of amnesty, he immediately pardoned his own murderers who accepted the terms, and made them adopted members of the heavenly family with full rights of citizenship. Thus he demonstrated to all men the possibility of salvation from past errors and the complete forgiveness of heaven.

The message proclaimed by the heralds to aliens was designated "the Good News." Since God in all of his dealings with men never required them to do any thing except upon the basis of what he had done for them, the Good News is primarily an announcement of facts with reference to what had been done for sinful men. The facts announced are obviously such as will command the attention of men in need of salvation, and likewise furnish the power and motivation to take the necessary steps to secure such salvation.

The foundation of the Good News, and that which is called "of first importance" consists of three prime facts, viz., Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, he was buried, and he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures (1 Cor. 15:3, 4). To confirm the testimony relative to these facts, credible witnesses who saw him after his resurrection, are introduced (1 Cor. 15:5-8). Related to these fundamental principles are certain additional facts which grew out of them. The Christ who was raised the third day ascended to heaven, is now seated at the right hand of the Father in regal splendor, and will come again as he went into heaven, and those who await his coming may be in his realm and be joint heirs of his glory. The Good News is really nothing more nor less than tidings of victory over sin, death and hell. It is a proclamation of "victory in Jesus!"

The Good News was designed for those who were alienated from God. It was not a course of instruction for citizens, but a proclamation to those not in the kingdom. Thus the Good News was as fully proclaimed on Pentecost as it ever was. That which is designated by the Holy Spirit as "the Good News of the Christ" was declared in its fulness on that day. It was heard, accepted and embraced in its fulness by those who joyfully received the word. Nothing was ever added to the gospel of the Messiah after that date, nor was that gospel ever proclaimed to citizens of the kingdom. It was not intended for them, and while they might be reminded of it as the basis for their hope, the proclamation of it to them was without warrant, seeing they could not have become citizens without having embraced it.

Before his ascension, the Messiah commissioned his envoys to "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to the whole creation. He who believes and is baptized shall be saved." The gospel was to be proclaimed to make believers. Belief and baptism were not necessarily a part of the proclamation. They constituted the reaction to the proclamation of those who had good and honest hearts. They were responsibilities devolving upon the sincere hearers of the Good News. One might have heard the Good News in its fulness and yet have refused to believe it or be immersed. The proclamation of the Good News was one thing, the immersion of those who believed it was a wholly different thing, which prompted Paul to write, "For Christ did not send me to baptize but to preach the gospel" (1 Cor. 1:17).

It is a common error of surface students and casual thinkers to assume that the term "gospel" or Good News, used for the proclamation of the envoys, embraces the scope of the entire new covenant scriptures, and covers the message to sinner and saint alike. The absurdity of this can easily be seen upon a little reflection. If the historical account of Acts, the epistolary writings, and the apocalyptic descriptions and symbols, are all part of the gospel of the Messiah, not one of the apostles ever fully proclaimed that gospel, for each had only a part of the revelation. Further, no congregation of saints during the lifetime of the apostles had ever obeyed the gospel, for not one had a complete compilation of the new covenant scriptures. Yet Paul wrote to the Romans that he had fully preached the gospel of Christ from Jerusalem and as far round as unto Illyricum. Certainly the book of Romans was not part of the gospel he had already preached, for he was just then writing it. In the same book he declares, "They have not all obeyed the gospel," but if the gospel includes the whole of the new covenant revelation none of them had obeyed it, for they did not yet have it.

The truth of the matter is that the Good News was the proclamation of the king to aliens providing the basis upon which they could enlist as citizens. In the capacity of citizens they were furnished with the apostles' doctrine which formed a course of instruction for the perfection of the saints. This was revealed as circumstances demanded and the need arose. In its completeness it represents the constitution of the divine monarchy. This law is applicable only to the citizens of the kingdom. Every nation which receives unto itself those who come from abroad has a law of naturalization. Once that law has been obeyed it never needs repetition, nor do those who have become citizens need again to hear a proclamation of it. But the law of the land may contain many statutes which have to be repeatedly obeyed.

Since the citizens must continue to dwell in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation, among whom they are to shine as lights in the world, provision has been made for their mutual strengthening of each other, so that they may build one another up in the most holy faith. To effect this, a memorial feast to show the Lord's death has been prescribed, and to this feast all are required to come regularly until the Lord returns. The Lord's Supper is to be eaten at his table in his kingdom (Luke 22:30). It belongs only to those who are citizens. Being a matter of joint participation, the Supper is a part of the fellowship of believers in the Messiah.

In order to achieve the divine purpose on earth, the envoys of the king gathered into communities or congregations, those in each locality who were inducted into citizenship. These citizens, with qualified seniors selected from their number and ordained as bishops, and with other qualified men ordained as deacons or servants, constituted the church of God, or body of the Christ, in each area. The Lord's table was the rallying point for such congregations of saints, and was the flag which, planted upon new territory, indicated that such territory had been taken into possession for the absent King. So long as the table remained, and loyal subjects gathered about it, that long the territory was in the name of the King.

Each community of saints throughout the universe is a golden lampstand holding up the truth as the light of the world, and in the midst of these the Son of man is depicted as standing, shedding forth the blessing of his presence. These communities in the aggregate compose the kingdom of God on earth, with each of the citizens as a steward who is entrusted with the goods of the Master "to occupy until his return."

Misunderstanding the Kingdom

Contents

The kingdom of the Messiah is the culmination of the divine plan for the ages. It has been created to conquer and subdue every alien thought and bring into captivity every stronghold of opposition. Its citizens upon earth are sanctified men and women who have been born again. They are the living representatives of the power and majesty of the monarch whom they have accepted to rule and reign over them. To the extent they are such the kingdom will be a potent force in any community; to the extent they are not, it will lose its influence over the hearts of men.

In every generation there are threats to the welfare and progress of the kingdom, created by false conceptions of those who are members of it. Just as in every nation there are citizens who do not grasp the principles of their respective constitutions, and who manifest subversive tendencies, so it has ever been in the kingdom of the Messiah. One who reads the history of the church of God as it is portrayed in the new covenant scriptures cannot help but see how much of it is devoted to detailing the errors in the thinking of those who were its constituency, and the correction of such errors.

It is difficult for the finite mind to grasp the majestic greatness of the kingdom. There is ever a tendency to believe that the kingdom of heaven is advanced by human philosophy and eloquence. The kingdoms of this world have all produced their statesmen and these have generally been individuals who could sway and bend the masses by word and gesture. Beholding the material fortunes of worldly kingdoms rise under the dominant influence of orators, those who compose the kingdom of heaven, motivated by ambition for its success, are constantly subject to the temptation to employ the same means. It is for this reason schools for special clergymen are inaugurated, and certain select members of the citizenry given special training in such theological seminaries. The kingdom of heaven is thus made dependent for its advancement upon a human auxiliary. In every such instance the best interests of the divine institution have been betrayed.

The betrayal has come not so much from the human organization, as from the spirit or philosophy which gave it birth. The idea that the kingdom of the Messiah is dependent upon the linguistic attainments of men, leads to the selection of certain fluent ones of the community who are polished and perfected and put forward as the champions of the Cause. This very act excludes the body of the citizenry from active participation, breeding in the masses who have had no access to professional training a feeling of inferiority. The whole vicious circle proceeds from a lack of recognition that the ways of God are not the ways of men, and that he has not selected the powerful to shame the weak; but has chosen the foolish to shame the wise (1 Cor. 1:27).

This very problem existed in aggravated form in one of the communities of saints planted through the efforts of Paul, Silas, and Timothy. Corinth, located upon the isthmus of Greece, was a city of wealth, luxury, and voluptuousness. Under the guise of religion, immorality was practiced in conjunction with idolatry, and the temples of the gods were virtual houses of assignation. Yet the city was known for the beauty of its architecture, the wisdom of its philosophers, and the power of its statesmen. Into this city of mingled vice and wisdom came the humble Jew, of whom the Corinthians said, "His bodily presence is weak, and his speech of no account" (2 Cor. 10:10). Refusing to prey upon them, to take advantage of them, or to put on airs among them (2 Cor. 11:20), he stood among them in weakness, fear, and much trembling. But the glory of the cross is emphasized by the weakness of the human vessel who bears it, and its power is in direct ratio to the humility of its servant. It is an axiom of God that "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in your weakness."

In this city of Grecian culture men fell captive to the sword of the Spirit and surrendered as slaves to Jesus. A colony of heaven was planted. But soon the ambitions of men began to assert themselves and rivalry with its consequent partisan spirit disrupted the fellowship of the saints. In the midst of this saddening state of affairs, word was conveyed to Paul at Ephesus, and he penned a letter to them, in which he summed up in one brief statement the difference between truth and the false concept of the factious elements. "For the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power" (1 Cor. 4:20).

Since there is an unceasing conflict between these two concepts, it will be profitable for us to consider the setting in which this statement glows with such brilliance. Only thus we can learn of what the kingdom consists, and of what it does not consist. This sentence occurs at the close of Paul's condemnation of partisan factionism in the community of saints at Corinth. It is his summary of what produced that factionism. The congregation was rent and torn by schisms. These were produced by a mistaken idea as to the nature of the kingdom of God and its method of growth. Perhaps our modern factions are rooted in the same cause. It may be that if we can visualize the problems at Corinth, we can more clearly see our own problems and find a solution for them.

The nine spiritual gifts enumerated in 1 Corinthians 12:8-10 were abundantly manifest in the community of saints. The grace of God was bestowed especially in the gift of speech and knowledge. It was by this means the testimony of Christ was confirmed among them, so that they were not lacking in any spiritual gift while awaiting the completed revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, who by it would sustain them to the end and present them guiltless in the final day of accounts (1 Cor. 1:4-8).

But, as it often happens in congregations with a multiplicity of talented men, personal ambition forged to the front, and the gifted ones forgot that "to each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good" and they began to seek a personal following. The gift of tongues was relegated to a degree of importance in the assembly which it did not deserve, and it was coveted by those who would, through it, enhance their personal popularity.

The dissensions and quarrels resulting from party rivalry were reported to the apostle by the family of a sister in the Lord, Chloe, and he immediately composed his rebuke of the situation. He showed first that there was no place for party spirit inasmuch as Christ was not divided. Since no one now on earth had been crucified for them, and they were not baptized into the name of such an one, they owed no allegiance to, and should not become partisan followers of any man, not even of Paul himself. He stated that his commission was to proclaim the Good News "and not with eloquent wisdom, lest the cross of Christ be emptied of its power." The contrast between eloquent wisdom and the power of the cross is here brought into sharp focus. The apostle Paul would be rejected today on the "trial sermon" basis of selecting a preacher.

He next showed that the ultimate end of following human wisdom is the rejection of God. "The world by wisdom knew not God." Accordingly, through a message which the world branded as foolishness, it pleased God to save men. And his instruments to bear that message were lowly men, not esteemed by the world. Here reference is made to the constituency of the Corinthian congregation, of whom Paul affirms, "Not many were wise according to worldly standards, not many were powerful, not many were of noble birth" and thus, not one had any grounds for boasting in the presence of God.

But it is when he turns to his own initial service in Corinth that Paul best illustrates the method of God. He writes, "When I came to you, brethren, I did not come proclaiming to you the testimony of God in lofty words or wisdom." He asserts that he was in weakness and much fear and trembling, and that his speech and message were not in plausible words of wisdom, and the reason was that their faith should not rest in the wisdom of men but in the power of God. Again there is a bold contrast between "lofty words" and "plausible words" and "the power of God." The first are employed by men who seek to gain their purposes by human means; the second by God who knows the human heart.

It is expected that those who are called by the power of God will boast of the Lord and not of the human instruments of his power. Those who are motivated by the compelling force of eloquence and lofty words of wisdom will obviously magnify the leader who is possessed of such rich talent, and since men differ in their philosophies, parties will form around them, and jealousy and strife result. But it is also true that those who were called by the power of God, may afterwards exalt men of special gifts and abilities with the same evil result. That was what happened at Corinth.

This condition prompted Paul to state that he could not address them as spiritual men, but as men in the flesh, as babes in Christ. He asked, "While there is jealousy and strife among you, are you not of the flesh, and behaving like ordinary men?" This points up the fact that there is a difference between spiritual men and ordinary men. The latter are characterized by jealousy and strife. These are their trademarks. But men of the spirit rise above partisanship, they are not ordinary, but extraordinary men! So long as one says he belongs to this party, and another says he belongs to that party, the congregation is composed of men devoid of real spiritual values.

Not even Paul and Apollos were saviors, but servants through whom men believed, as the Lord assigned to each. One planted, the other watered, but only God could give the growth. The one who plants and the one who waters are equal, so it is foolish to exalt either as the leader of a religious party. This necessitates a caution that no man should deceive himself. This is easily done for men are by nature hero worshipers. They either seek for prominence directly or bask in the reflected glory of one whom they have exalted.

However, the fact that God catches the wise in their craftiness and knows that the thoughts of the wise are futile, should cause one to think seriously before elevating even the wisest of men, or boasting about such. Even the holy apostles should be regarded as servants of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God. Is this not a condemnation of those who speak so glibly of a Petrine doctrine and a Pauline doctrine, as if Peter and Paul were teaching diverse doctrines and leading separate groups in the primitive congregation of God?

In the fourth chapter of 1 Corinthians, the apostle reaches the summit of his reasoning relative to the basic error of thought which produced the lines of cleavage in the body. With reference to what has preceded he says, "I have applied all this to myself and Apollos for your benefit, brethren, that you may learn by us to live according to scripture, that none of you may be puffed up in favor of one against another." The crowning act of deflation for egotism is found in the questions, "Who sees anything different in you? What have you that you did not receive? If then you received it, why do you boast as if it were not a gift?"

With this the apostle paints a graphic picture of the difference between the life of ease in the Corinthian congregation and the hardships and toils endured by the apostles. However, this was not written to shame and embarrass them, but rather to admonish them as his beloved children. He points out that it was his love for them which caused him to send Timothy to remind them of his ways in Christ as he taught in every community of the saints. Some of his opposers were arrogantly asserting that Paul sent Timothy because he was afraid to come personally. To demonstrate his lack of cowardice he declares that he will come soon, and when he arrives, he will find not the arrogant talk but the power of these bold asserters. It is at this juncture, the apostle sets forth the nature of the kingdom. "The kingdom of God does not consist in talk but in power."

When Paul arrived in Corinth and confronted these arrogant talkers, two divergent philosophies came face to face to clash with each other. On one side were the polished speakers, the haughty philosophers, supercilious, impertinent and unabashed. To them the advance of the kingdom depended upon the well turned phrase, the vaunting and pretentious language of pride. On the other side was the ill-clad, buffeted and homeless apostle, his hands calloused by daily toil and his fingers blackened with the prick of awl and needle. But his mission was not to match wits nor to test words; he would test the power of the arrogant boasters.

No one can read the first four chapters of this epistle without being conscious of the difference in these two concepts. One is characterized by such phrases as "eloquent wisdom," "lofty words," and "plausible words of wisdom." The other is described as foolish, weak, low and despised in the world, but it is the power of God. It is "not a wisdom of this age nor of the rulers of this age, who are doomed to pass away."

The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power! Every attempt of men to establish organizations for the purpose of polishing a select group of clergymen is promoted by the mistaken idea that eloquent and plausible words of wisdom are essential to the perpetuity of the kingdom. If this were the case, the Son of man would have chosen the scholastics of his day to herald the truth. Instead those who listened to the apostles perceived that they were "unlearned and ignorant men." The word idiotes means "a private or common person, an unprofessional man or layman, an unskilled person." It is the word which is translated "ignorant" in the quotation. Meyer says the two terms are practically identical, "the double designation being intended to express the idea very fully, destitute of all rabbinic culture, strangers to theological learning."

The first "Christian College" was started in Alexandria, Egypt, about A.D. 180. Its two chief objectives were to provide a Christian atmosphere in which the young could be educated, and to train and prepare talented young men to preach. The learned and erudite city of Alexandria had the greatest library of ancient times, said to have contained three quarters of a million volumes, and the site of the school was thus believed to be excellent. It was thought by many that Christianity could not withstand the onslaughts and ridicule of the educated satirists and cultivated representatives of the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophic schools, and that fluent men in the church needed to be trained to meet the opposition upon its own ground.

The first president was a converted heathen philosopher, Pantaenus, and his immediate successor in A.D. 189, was Clement, another converted heathen philosopher. In A.D. 202, the renowned scholar and universalist, Origen, assumed the post which he held for thirty years, and during his regime the school was promoted to its highest peak in prosperity and popularity. Two of Origen's students succeeded their master as president, Heracles and Dionysius in succession holding the presidency. The last teacher was Didymus in A.D. 395, and by the time he came to the position, the catechetical school had succeeded in leading the Christian world on the road to apostasy, so that Mosheim correctly branded the institution as "the grave of primitive Christianity."

Men seem to learn but little from history. Moved with pride, swept with unreasoning fears, in every generation there are those who spend their time and money to erect the same institutions and to perpetuate their errors. There has never been a human organization started to protect the church of God that did not eventually betray it and bring disaster to it. Men have yet to learn that "the kingdom of God is not in word but in power" and that God's power has not decreased nor degenerated.

Not Food and Drink

Another fruitful source of schism is the false conception that the Reign of heaven allows for no variation in personal conscience, and that there are no matters of indifference in which citizens may follow their own convictions. In every generation since its inception, the congregation of God has been harmed by well-meaning, but hurtful individuals who have sought to set themselves and their own personal consciences as the criterion for measurement of the behavior of all others, with the result that dissensions have been caused, fellowship disrupted, and the church itself subjected to ridicule by unbelievers.

The most serious aspect of this problem is that when one sets up his own conduct in matters of indifference as the basis of judgment and criticism of his brethren, he unconsciously dethrones Jesus, and enthrones himself as a judge. A recognition of this prompted James to write: "Do not speak evil against one another, brethren. He that speaks evil against a brother or judges his brother, speaks evil against the law and judges the law. But if you judge the law, you are not a doer of the law but a judge. There is one lawgiver and judge, he who is able to save and to destroy. But who are you that you judge your neighbor?" (James 4:11, 12).

The limited view that the kingdom of God has been inaugurated to provide an arena of disputation over personal scruples, has long aggravated the body of our Lord, and in many cases has turned the church into a battleground of fratricidal strife instead of a realm of brotherhood. To offset such a condition in his own day, the apostle wrote, "For the kingdom of God does not mean food and drink but righteousness, and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14:17). Note again the contrast. On one side is food and drink; on the other side righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit. The writing of dogmas relating to food and drink, the attempt to force personal views in this realm on others to the destruction of peace and joy; all of this has been a problem through the years. Inasmuch as we should not ignore the context which provides the setting for such a definitive statement, we propose to examine the teaching of Romans, chapter 14.

The chapter is introduced with the instruction, "As for the man who is weak in faith welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions." The expression "weak in faith" does not imply a weakness in belief in Jesus, but rather implies, from the context, one who entertains certain scruples and who does not seem to realize that our relationship to the Christ is maintained by faith rather than by our attitude toward matters of indifference. There is always a grave danger that those who are strong in discernment and perception will hold in contempt those whom they deem to be overly scrupulous about such things. It will be seen, however, that these are to welcome the one who is weak in faith. The term "welcome" implies more than mere toleration. It means to receive unto the fellowship and partnership which intimately welds the whole community of saints into a unit.

The motive with which one acts is always important in the spiritual realm. Thus, the strong are not to receive the weak to sit in judgment upon their thoughts or to judge their opinions. No opinion should ever be made the basis of fellowship, none should ever be made a test of fellowship. There is room inside the circle of fellowship for a variety of opinions upon matters which do not affect our salvation. It is wrong for the one who holds such an opinion to force it upon others and disrupt the peace and unity which ought to prevail; it is wrong for the one who does not hold the opinion to make it a subject of dispute or controversy. They should welcome each other since God has welcomed them both.

Two examples in which love should cover differences of opinion are cited by the apostle in the chapter under review. One is the matter of eating meats, the other that of attaching special importance to certain days. It is not to be concluded that these are the only two subjects in the category, but rather that the principles enunciated with reference to them will be equally applicable in all matters of the same nature. Wisdom must be exercised in determining what matters belong in the category.

In the primitive ecclesia of God, the subject of eating meats was one which occupied much attention. It was a common practice to dedicate an animal which was to be slaughtered for food to an idol. The blessing of the god or goddess was sought, and a choice portion of the meat might even be presented to the pagan priests for their consumption, while the residue was sold in the meat market to any purchaser. Of course it was easy for an informed person to reason that an idol was nothing but a product of human superstition, since there was but one true God, therefore, the sacrifice of an animal to the idol was only a ridiculous procedure which did not affect the quality of the meat. Such a person might purchase meat anywhere without violation of conscience.

But the problem was complicated by the fact that many who had been reared in a pagan atmosphere did not possess such knowledge, and upon seeing a brother with power of perception eating at a feast where they served meat offered to idols, the weak one might conclude that service to idols was not prohibited by God, and as a result would fall into idolatrous practices. It was a consideration of such possibilities coupled with other things which caused some primitive Christians to appease their conscience by becoming vegetarians.

Thus the apostle wrote "One believes he may eat anything, while the weak man eats only vegetables." He was not particularly concerned as to what they ate, but he was concerned about their personal attitudes toward each other. There are always grave dangers to fellowship when there are such differences of opinion. The man whose belief will allow him to eat anything is always liable to sneer at the one whose scruples he regards as extreme and straightlaced. He tends to hold in contempt the over-particular and squeamish practices of the other. At the same time the man who is a vegetarian, and who considers the eating of meats dedicated to an idol as idolatry, is inclined to make it a test of fellowship. The temptation to judge a brother who differs from us, and especially one who feels he can justifiably do things we cannot do, is an ever present one. The weak are always more sensitive and quick to judge than the strong, and if everyone does not accept their particular pattern they conclude that it is because of an impure heart.

But God forbids the strong to despise the weak, or the weak to judge the strong. He offers two reasons. First, God has welcomed them both, and since he has done so, they are obligated to welcome each other. Both are recipients of divine grace and both are obligated to respect each other. Secondly, they do not belong to each other, but to God. It is not the business of a man to step across the fence and tell another man's servant how to plow his master's field. He is out of his place and trespasses if he does so. The apostle writes, "Who are you to pass judgment on the servant of another ? It is before his own master that he stands or falls. And he will be upheld, for the Master is able to make him stand." In other words, acceptability to the Master does not depend upon what food a man eats, "for food will not commend us to God. We are no worse off if we do not eat, and no better off if we do" (1 Cor.8:8).

The esteem for certain days is the second example produced. Both among Jewish and Gentile converts there was some recognition of sacred days. The Christian religion makes no provision for any holy day whatsoever. No day was counted as more sacred than any other so far as the new covenant is concerned. But some of the Jewish Christians greatly esteemed certain of their national holidays and holy days and still observed them with special regard. There is little doubt that the first disciples of the Master in Jerusalem continued to keep the sabbath as well as to attach significance to the first day of the week, after their Pentecostal experience. They also continued to celebrate their other festal occasions. There were others who treated every day alike, making no distinction in them. The apostle says that each is to be convinced in his own mind. The emphasis is as shown.

If a Jew accepts the Messiah and he wishes, as a Jew, to esteem the Passover, Hanukkah, or other special days, it is his right to do so. He cannot bind their observance upon others, but his liberty in Jesus will allow him to esteem them as sacred, provided he does not violate the law of Christ in his observance. This privilege is his by reason of his relationship to the Lord, and must not be abridged or denied by reason of his relationship to his brethren. We do not live to ourselves, but to the Lord; we do not die to ourselves but to the Lord. Whether we live or die, we are the Lord's. We do not belong to each other as we belong to the Lord. We are related to each other in the spirit, but we are related only because all of us belong to the Lord. There is a realm in which we are answerable to no man on earth. In that area, we are not subject to the judgment of men, but to the judgment of God.

In view of these facts, and since the observation of days and eating of meats are matters incidental to our Christian relationship, we should be sure to place them in the proper perspective. For this reason the inspired apostle asks, "Why do you pass judgment on your brother? Or why do you despise your brother? For we shall all stand before the judgment seat of God . . . So each one of us shall give account of himself to God" (Rom. 14:10-12). This is not inserted to teach the universality or certainty of judgment, but its individuality. Since each is to give account of himself to God it is not necessary that he be accountable unto his brethren in advance of God's judgment.

It is at this juncture in his letter the apostle lays down great and abiding principles to protect the consciences of all and to save the congregation of God from dissension and disintegration. The disregard of these principles has been the cause of tragic schisms in the past. We will do well to enumerate and study them.

1. Instead of judging another we should rather turn our attention to judging self to determine if we are the means of causing another to fall. The apostle seems to recognize that there are those of such temperament they will judge someone, and his recommendation is that all such judge themselves and their conduct. The one who ate vegetables only for fear of defilement, should not judge the one who ate meat, because the day was coming when God would judge them both. On the contrary, the one who ate meat was not to exercise his liberty with arrogant disregard for the feelings of others. To insist upon the exercise of his right regardless of its effect would be a denial of the great law of love which is the essence of the Christian religion.

The insistence upon the right to eat what one pleased could well be the means of destroying another. This could be done by two ways. The weak brother might be driven completely from the fellowship and thus be lost, or he might be emboldened to eat meat in tribute to idols and thus be condemned for idolatry. So the apostle writes, "If your brother is being injured by what you eat, you are not walking in love. Do not let what you eat cause the ruin of one for whom Christ died." When personal liberty and love for others reach a conflict or crisis, there is but one answer possible to a child of God, denial of self for the welfare of others.

2. Personal conviction with reference to a thing affects our responsibility in regard to that thing. "I know and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean in itself; but it is unclean for any one who thinks that it is unclean." What we think about a thing regulates what it is to us personally. This does not require that we conclude that the Lord Jesus had given Paul specific instructions pertaining to meats and kindred matters. He knew from the tenor and nature of the kingdom of the Messiah that it was not concerned about ceremonial distinctions between various types of food. Under the Mosaic economy an animal had to possess certain arbitrary marks or habits to be considered worthy of human consumption, and a differentiation was made between the eating habits of the chosen ones and other nations. The eating of certain things was a part of the system of holiness.

Under the new covenant such distinctions have been abolished. "Nothing is unclean in itself." Christians are free to eat what they please. This does not mean that they may not have a preference for certain kinds of food, or that they are obligated to eat every kind of meat. Such a meaning would violate the very thing under discussion which is personal liberty. It would be as much of an abridgement of freedom to force one to eat something he did not want as to compel him to abstain from something he wanted to eat. "Unclean" is used in the ceremonial sense as under the Mosaic dispensation. Certain animals were unclean to the Jews because of legal declaration, not because of the nature of the animal or its flesh.

But the great lesson to be derived here lies in the fact that if one esteems a thing to be unclean it is unclean to him. It may not be unclean to others or to God, but it is unclean to the one whose heart so regards it. Conscience is not a guide but an arbiter. It is a restraining influence intended to keep us in the path which reason tells us is right. Our reasoning may be wrong, but if so, it must be altered by additional investigation of facts and data. We are not at liberty to bend our conscience and violate it against conviction. To do so will weaken it until it is useless as a safeguard. Even if a thing is right in itself, it is wrong for one to do it against his conscience. It becomes a sin to the one who so acts.

3. "So do not let what is good to you be spoken of as evil." This places an additional restraint upon the exercise of personal liberty. A thing which is harmless in itself and which appears good to one may be the means of creating confusion, strife and every evil work if persisted in without regard for the attitude of others. No Christian will insist upon doing that which is harmful, offensive or obnoxious to his brethren. His first thought is not for his personal indulgence or gratification but for the majestic cause to which he has been called. He will not deliberately and maliciously hurt that cause merely for his own satisfaction.

When one engages in a course of conduct which provokes undue criticism from others, and causes his brethren to speak out in denunciation, frequently railing and untimely controversy results. This leads to strife and factionalism with the result that the unconverted world reproaches the religion of the Messiah. How often in the past it has been said by unbelievers that "the congregation of Christians spends its energy in fighting and bickering and makes a sham out of its plea for peace." Often such conditions are the results of the stubborn insistence of some implacable person who insists upon doing what he pleases in flagrant disregard for others.

If all Christians had recognized the import and importance of this rule in the past, the pathway of religion would not be strewn with the wreckage of one time noble efforts. In reference to matters of indifference, we may be conscious of the rightness of our views, but we should be willing to surrender them for the common good and to avoid unnecessary recrimination and reproach.

4. "It is right not to eat meat or drink wine or do anything that makes your brother stumble." This rendering in the Revised Standard Version is interesting indeed. It presents the matter from a positive rather than a negative standpoint. The apostle does not say "It is not right to eat meat or drink wine." Instead, he says, "It is right not to do so." There is nothing wrong in itself with eating meat, drinking wine, or with many other things. They are questions of privilege. But "whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31). It is not to the glory of God to give needless offense and by such means to cause men to be lost. "Give no offense to Jews or to Greeks or to the church of God, just as I try to please all men in everything I do, not seeking my own advantage, but that of many, that they may be saved" (1 Cor. 10:32, 33). We are not, for the sake of food, to destroy the work of God.

5. "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God." The last two verses of Romans 14 are often wrested from their place and meaning by shallow reasoners. The word "faith" in these verses has to do with one's opinion and personal conviction in such matters of indifference as God has introduced in the chapter. It is a private opinion as to keeping of days, eating of meats, drinking wine, etc. Such opinions are to be cherished as personal and private. They are not to be brought forward and agitated among the saints to the disruption of fellowship or destruction of those who differ.

In the primitive congregations of saints one might eat meat at home and do so without harm, but to bring it to the love feast of the congregation would be to arouse strife and contention. Opinions, or beliefs, on these matters, are to be held to one's self before God. God knows if one eats with a clear conscience. Eating meat does not commend one to God, nor does abstaining from it do so. It is a matter of indifference with God. Therefore, eating meat will not offend God. He is not concerned with the eating but with the conscience. But the weak brother is not concerned with the conscience but with the eating, so he will be offended. Therefore, one might eat when only God's eye beholds who could not so indulge under the inspection of others.

"Happy is he who has no reason to judge himself for what he approves." We judge ourselves by our consciences either accusing or excusing our conduct. That man is indeed happy whose conscience does not censure him for any course of action. Many there are who engage in practices which are condemned by their own consciences. They entertain honest doubts about the advisability of a certain habit or pursuit, but they persist in it regardless of consequences. They know there could be nothing wrong about abstaining from such things but they continue to do them, outraging their inner selves. Such persons are not happy here and will not be happy in the world to come. If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and he knows everything (1 John 3:20).

"And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: for whatsoever is not of faith is sin." Faith, in this instance, is the opposite of doubt. It refers to a personal conviction that a thing is right or wrong. If a man eats meat while doubting that it is right to do so, it becomes wrong to him. It is not the meat that is a sin, nor is it the act of eating meat that is a sin. If such were the case it would be a sin for any person to partake of it. But the sin is in the violation of conscience. It is not the deed, but the doer, that is condemned. It is obvious that in the category of things discussed in this chapter, a thing may be a sin for one person which would not be a sin for another. That category covers things that are not wrong in and of themselves. There is nothing about a day, or the esteeming of certain days above others, which is wrong. There is nothing about meat which is wrong or sinful. Each man is to be fully convinced in his own mind regarding such things, and he may act according to his personal conscience.

It is further obvious that a thing may be a sin for one to do in one part of his Christian career which would be perfectly harmless and legitimate in another part of that career. A man might have a conscientious scruple against a certain thing when he first obeys the gospel, but by study and meditation, he may become convinced that it is legitimate. If he engaged in it at the time his conscience condemned him it would be a sin, but when through education he becomes more discerning, he could do it without sinning. The expression "For whatever does not proceed from faith is sin" simply means that anything which one does in violation of his conscience is a sin to him.

The thing of importance to be remembered in this dissertation is the statement "For the kingdom of God does not mean food and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit; he who thus serves Christ is acceptable to God and approved by men." There is ever a tendency to make the kingdom of God degenerate into mere materialistic discussions. There are always those who would make it an arena of controversy over matters of indifference. The pet fads and foibles are taught and discoursed upon until the conclusion might be reached that the whole purpose of heaven was culminated by certain dietary ideas and ideals.

The congregation of God in many places is a laughingstock. The citizens of the kingdom have spent their time verbally berating each other over extreme views of one kind and another until serious men and women have become disgusted with their cavilling and bickering, and the church itself is disgraced by its fighting and quarreling. We need to catch a vision of the human dignity, magnanimity of soul, breadth of purpose, and glory of being which should characterize those who are followers of Christ. Then we can help to fulfil on earth the will of God as it is done in heaven.

The Destiny of the Kingdom

Contents

The future of the kingdom of the Messiah as it relates to this earth has been the subject of debate and speculation for many centuries. Nothing seems to intrigue the mind of man more than the fate of the universe of which he is a part. Seeking to peer inside the veil of the future, he tries to determine the time and manner of the coming of the Lord, and varied theories have been constructed around certain interpretations of the words of the Holy Spirit. One should approach any such topic with humility and reverence. It is not our purpose to become dogmatic with reference to unfulfilled prophecy, yet we deem it unfair to the reader of such a treatise to conclude without expressing those views which have crystallized through study of the living oracles.

It is not our intention to examine exhaustively any of the multitude of theories. We will discuss three which we deem of special significance, the skeptical, pre-millennial and post-millennial viewpoints. Each of these can be divided into many branches, resulting from the diverse schools of thought which have advocated them. We are primarily concerned by the fact that our Lord is coming again, we are content to await that majestic event in God's own time and way. Yet we deem it not unwise to examine some of the statements which have a direct bearing on the topic.

The word of God plainly predicted that in the last days there would come blatant skeptics who would deny the coming of the Lord. The fact that there are many who do so is but one more attestation to the truthfulness of the Bible. The apostle Peter wrote, "First of all you must understand this, that scoffers will come in the last days with scoffing, following their own passions and saying, 'Where is the promise of his coming? For ever since the fathers fell asleep, all things have continued as they were from the beginning of creation'" (2 Peter 3:3, 4). It is interesting to note the motivation for their denial of the coming of the Lord, as well as the foundation for their false reasoning.

Those who scoff at the idea of the Lord's return are "following their own passions." The return of the Lord is to be for judgment. Jude repeats the words of the patriarch Enoch, "Behold the Lord came with his holy myriads, to execute judgment on all, and to convict all the ungodly of all their deeds of ungodliness which they have committed in such an ungodly way, and of all the harsh things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." He applies this directly to scoffers of the last time "following their own ungodly passions" (verse 18).

The apostle Paul wrote, "The Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance upon those who do not know God and upon those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They shall suffer the punishment of eternal destruction and exclusion from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might" (2 Thess. 1:7-9). With such a frightful destiny in store for them, profligates could find no pleasure in their carnal practices, so to stifle the voice of conscience they deny the coming of the Lord. Their scoffing words constitute "wishful thinking."

The basis of their contention is that there will be no disruption of the present order because there has never been one. The uniformity of the past assures the continuity of the future. Jesus cannot come, for if he did, this would upset the world, and the world has never suffered such an upheaval. "All things have continued as they were from the beginning of creation." The postulate is that since God has never called the whole world into account, we have no reason to conclude that he ever will. There are two ways to handle such false reasoning, but the easiest is to show that the affirmation is contrary to fact. If there can be recalled one deviation from the normal course of events, and if it can be shown to have affected the universe of mankind, then another such event could transpire.

This is the plan of attack followed by the inspired writer. "They deliberately ignore this fact, that by the word of God heavens existed long ago, and an earth formed out of water and by means of water, through which the world that then existed was deluged with water and perished. But by the same word the heavens and earth that now exist have been stored up for fire, being kept until the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men." The same word which created the world can destroy it, and that it has the power to do so was once demonstrated.

This devastating argument can only be met by a denial of the deluge, and some skeptics claim that the Bible account is but Jewish folklore and fable, and cannot be corroborated. These only demonstrate the truth of the scriptural accusation that "they deliberately ignore facts," for every nation of antiquity has its tradition of the flood. George Smith, of the British Museum, in 1872, discovered accounts of the flood among the clay tablets sent from the library of Assurbanipal in Nineveh. These were copied from inscriptions made shortly after the flood, and certain of these have since been found. In these Babylonian accounts which credit the deluge to the gods, it is said that sin against the gods was responsible. A ship smeared inside and out with bitumen, which contained seed of life of every kind, and which finally came to rest on a mountain, is mentioned.

So numerous are the references to the deluge, that one writer of note, says, "The mythologies and histories of the ancient nations are full of remembrance of it. It is described in the stories of the Greeks and sung in the verses of the Latins. Its memory is enshrined in the sacred books of the Parsee, the Brahmin, and the Mohammedan, and has been assigned a place in the Legend of the Scandinavian, and the mythic records of the Chinaman. Its symbols are found stamped on the coins of ancient Greece, may be traced amid the hoary hieroglyphics of Egypt, recognized in the sculptured caves of Hindostan, and detected in the pictured writings of Mexico. In Cuba and Tahiti, on the banks of the Orinoco, on the pampas of Brazil, in the mountains of Peru, and in the islands of the Pacific, the traveler has met with traces or traditions of the flood, the ark, and the rescue of the favored few."

Even more conclusive is the testimony of the man who "found the flood." This happened at Ur, about 120 miles north of Basra, near the Persian Gulf. Excavations by British and American archeologists began in earnest at this site in 1923, and opened up a real treasure trove of antiquity. Within six years, by dint of careful work, a great Sumerian city had been exposed and the explorers had opened up sepulchers of the kings with all of the wealth of objects interred with the bones of these departed monarchs. The leader of the British party was Sir Leonard Woolley, a painstaking and careful scientist. In 1929, the work was about completed, but the British leader, fearful that something of value would be overlooked, had his native workers again lowered into the lowest tomb to begin sinking a shaft. As the shaft penetrated downward, every bucket of debris which was hauled out contained potsherds and artifacts. Then, one day, the workmen sent word that they were on ground level.

The British scientist was lowered into the shaft. It was apparent that the report was correct and they were upon solid ground. The leader began to probe and bring up samples, and to his amazement he found that he was standing upon pure clay, and such clay as could only be deposited by receding waters. A check was made and it was determined that this was above the river level so it could not have been deposited by that stream. A group of his colleagues were summoned to verify his findings, and the agreement was unanimous that it was a sedimentary deposit, but no one could account for it.

A decision was made to see if they could go through it, so the diggers were again put to work. The spades were shoved deeper and deeper and continued to bring up clay. Finally a depth of ten feet had been reached, when suddenly the clay ended, and the baskets of earth were again found filled with the rubble and debris which indicated human habitation. As the scientists sifted the fragments of pottery they sought for the smallest trace of metal, but found not one piece. The only weapon revealed was of chipped flint. The great truth broke like a beam of light.

In the distant past there had been a great inundation. It had brought the residence of man to a conclusion. When the waters receded from their turbulence, a great deposit of alluvial clay had blanketed the ruins of prior existence. When the full import of this discovery registered with the archeologists a telegraphic message flashed to Great Britain. It read simply "We have found the Flood." Sir Leonard wrote, "About sixteen feet below a brick pavement which we could with reasonable certainty date about 2700 B.C. we were among the ruins of that Ur which had existed before the flood." The spade had covered up the argument of the skeptics as it uncovered the truth of the Biblical account.

Generally speaking, the believers in the return of the Lord are divided into two classes. These are commonly designated pre-millenarian and post-millenarian. The word "millennium" is a combined form of the Latin mille, a thousand, plus annus, a year. It means a thousand years, and is specifically used with reference to the thousand years mentioned in Revelation 20. In a broad sense, the pre-millenarian argues that Jesus will return, resurrect the righteous dead, and reign a thousand years upon the earth in a period of universal happiness and freedom from sin. At the close of that period the wicked dead will be raised and destroyed. This is purportedly a literalistic view of Revelation 20, although investigation will show that it is not necessarily so. The post-millenarian contends that the return of the Christ will be after the thousand years.

These two irreconcilable views have been the means of dividing virtually the whole of modern Christendom, although the conflict has not been confined to these latter days. In ecclesiastical history the term "Chiliasm" is used to designated the pre-millenarian view. It is from the Greek chilioi, a thousand. Papias is generally mentioned as the first Christian writer to maintain the doctrine. He lived in the middle of the second century and was a bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia. However, there were some who preceded him who clung to the view, and we should mention one in particular.

Cerinthus, who resided at Ephesus, while the apostle John lived there, was a Jew, who was said to have studied in Alexandria. He is credited with first teaching the errors which developed into the system of Gnosticism. This heresy eventually wreaked havoc upon Christendom. It is in refutation of the teachings of the sect that John wrote his first and second letters. In conjunction with the Gnostic theory, Cerinthus taught that as a completion of God's creative work, after the world had lasted six thousand years, there would be a universal Sabbath, the millennium, in which a new order would prevail upon the earth. The righteous, raised from the dead, would enjoy unspeakable delights and indescribable pleasures in Palestine, with their victorious King, the Messiah.

It is noteworthy that Cerinthus was a Jew, and that he is sometimes classed with the Ebionites. When Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70, the last hope of retaining Christianity within the fold of Judaism was dashed. But there were still many who continued to regard the law of Moses and circumcision as of perpetual and universal obligation. The name "Nazarenes" which had been formerly applied in contempt to all believers, was now limited to the Judaizing sect and as time passed on many of these came eventually to deny the divinity of Jesus and to hate Paul, whom they regarded as an apostate.

The millenarian views of Cerinthus may have been influenced greatly by the Jewish expectations at the time that Jesus came. There is no question but that the Palestinian Jews had contrived a splendid mental picture out of the prophecies, the comments and disputes of the sages, and the infiltration of Oriental imagery. This vision included the appearance of the Messiah, the simultaneous regeneration of all things, the resurrection of the ancient worthies and saints, and the reign of the Messiah upon earth. They confidently expected a branch of Jesse to come and regain Zion, and establish it as the capital of a universal sway. He was to stand in the holy temple on Mount Moriah and summon to his side the scattered Jews of the earth to commune with the fathers, and to "sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom."

The first resurrection was to be the portion of the seed of Abraham exclusively. In the golden age it ushered in, all Israelites would participate except those who denied the resurrection of the dead, and that the law came from heaven, and the Epicureans (Mischna, Tract. Sanh. c. 11, 12). The righteous dead were to be called from Paradise, the realm of the departed spirits, and in glorified bodies were to reign for a thousand years of bliss upon a recreated and renovated earth. It was the prevalence of this theory which helped influence the Palestinian Jews to reject Jesus of Nazareth. His manner of coming was so utterly in contrast with their expectation that they preferred to sacrifice him rather than to relinquish their preconceived notion. Nor did this view disappear with his ascension, for many of his Jewish followers devoutly expected his imminent return in conformity with the vision they had entertained. Even when Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus, and the temple razed, the millenarian aspect lingered on. It was revived in times of persecution and catastrophe, with those who fostered it always imagining their personal exaltation to a chosen position in an earthly regime of the Messiah. Those who regard the millennium as of strictly Christian origin are mistaken, and the Article (forty-first) of the Church of England, in the reign of Edward the Sixth, is no doubt correct in designating it as a fable "of Jewish dotage."

In the second century, in addition to Papias, there were other writers of distinction who adhered to the millenarian idea. Among them was Justin Martyr. He writes, however, that there were many who did not agree with the view he held. It was not allowed to become a source of division, and by the beginning of the third century the theory was beginning to wane. Its decline was hastened, no doubt, by the fact that it became a tenet of the Montanists. About 170 A.D. Montanus, a former priest of Cybele, who had recently been converted to Christianity, announced that he was the Paraclete (Comforter) whom Jesus had promised to send. He sought to reproduce the mysticism and raptures which were a part of the pagan worship of Cybele.

Two women, Priscilla and Maximilla, who claimed to have rapturous trances, attached themselves to Montanus and travelled with him. He regarded them as oracles. The favorite theme of their visions was the approaching end of all things. No doubt the persecutions of the day motivated them to predict the imminent coming of the millennium, and they confidently prophesied that the New Jerusalem was soon coming down at Pepuza. Priscilla claimed to have seen the Lord Jesus in the form of a woman with shining raiment, and alleged that he revealed to her his speedy return, the resurrection of his saints, and the final triumph over his enemies. The extremism of the Montanists gradually separated them from the church, and there was a strong reaction to their teachings.

The next controversy over millenarianism occurred in Egypt in the city of Alexandria. An Egyptian bishop, Nepos, published a work entitled "A Confutation of the Allegorists." In this he defended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, and from his premises, deduced the doctrine of a millennium. After his death, this work aroused a great interest, and gained many adherents in Egypt. Coracion became the acknowledged leader of the doctrine. Dionysius, who was bishop in Alexandria, summoned a number of the clergy who were interested in the question. They convened in A.D. 262, and their discussion lasted three days. At the end of this time, Coracion acknowledged that he was convinced of his error and pledged himself to abstain from advocacy of the doctrine during his lifetime. Dionysius summed up his conclusions on the matter in two books, "Upon the Promises" and from this time on few writers of note defended the doctrine until after the rise of the Protestant sects following the Reformation.

The opinion that there will be two future personal advents of the Christ, one before and another after the thousand years in which Satan is confined, is based upon a literal interpretation of Revelation 20. That opinion holds that Jesus will come first to resurrect the righteous dead and inaugurate a universal sway of righteousness over the earth, during which the saints will reign with him in the flesh and share his triumph. Later— a thousand years later— he will come to terminate the present order in a universal judgment. To this interpretation there are some very grave and serious objections which cannot be lightly esteemed by the lover of truth.

The millenarian view must be fully set forth in this one chapter of Revelation, or it is not contained in God's revelation at all, for nowhere else is mention made of the thousand year reign, or of the first and second resurrection, as set forth here. Here are some factors of importance to consider.

1. The book of Revelation is a book of signs and symbols as all must admit. The passage relied upon is an obscure one in a book composed of highly figurative language. It is dangerous to construct a system of doctrine dependent upon such a foundation.

2. While insisting upon a literal interpretation of this passage, millenarians do not hesitate to interpret as figurative and symbolic other portions of the book, and even of the same chapter.

3. There are some things definitely lacking in the passage which are essential to the maintenance of the theory. In the first place, the second coming of Christ is not mentioned. There is nothing said about the resurrection of bodies. The writer saw "souls" and not bodies at all. There is no mention of Christ returning to earth, nor is there anything said about a reign on earth. All of these are ingredients of the millenarian view, and it cannot be constructed without them, yet not a one of them is found in the passage which is the foundation of the system.

4. In spite of the fact that many references are made to the resurrection elsewhere, and that this subject was one of primary interest to the primitive saints, the idea of two literal resurrections, one of the righteous and another of the wicked, with a thousand year interval between, is not mentioned elsewhere, and in this case occurs couched in symbolism and imagery.

5. The view that the saints will be raised physically and will reign on the earth in the flesh, is inconsistent with the uniform teaching of the sacred writings as to the nature of the resurrection body.

a. In reply to the questions, "How are the dead raised? With what kind of body do they come?" the inspired writer says, "What you sow is not the body which is to be" (1 Cor. 15:37).

b. It is specifically stated that "It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:44).

c. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable" (1 Cor. 15:50). In view of this, if the righteous dead are raised in the flesh they will be debarred from the kingdom.

d. "For this perishable nature must put on the imperishable, and this mortal nature must put on immortality" (1 Cor. 15:53). Flesh and blood are neither imperishable nor immortal, for "all flesh is like grass and all its glory like the flower of grass. The grass withers . . . " (1 Pet. 1:24).

6. The interpretation under consideration contradicts the plain teaching elsewhere that the righteous and wicked dead will be raised and judged together at the second coming of Jesus.

a. Jesus said, "Do not marvel at this; for the hour is coming when all who are in the tombs will hear his voice and come forth, those who have done good, to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of judgment" (John 5:28, 29). This is a universal resurrection. It includes all that are in the tombs. The "all" is made up of two classes, "those who have done good" and "those who have done evil." They are to be raised the same hour and not a millennium apart.

b. Jesus said, "This is the will of my Father, that every one who sees the Son and believes in him should have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:40). This presents positive proof that the righteous will be raised at the final day, but if there is a thousand years following, it cannot be the last day. It will not help to say that "time" will cease to be counted when Jesus comes to begin a pre-millennial reign, for that would negate the idea of a literal thousand years. A literal year is composed of days.

c. The wicked will be judged on the same day the righteous are raised. "He who rejects me and does not receive my sayings has a judge; the word that I have spoken will judge him on the last day" (John 12:48).

d. On the same day that Jesus comes to be glorified in his saints, he will inflict vengeance on the wicked. "When the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance upon those who do not know God and upon those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They shall suffer the punishment of eternal destruction and exclusion from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might, when he comes on that day to be glorified in his saints" (2 Thess. 1:7-10). Notice the expression "when he comes on that day." This seems to indicate but one coming with a dual purpose to be accomplished "on that day" of his coming.

e. The types which Jesus uses from the old covenant scriptures to illustrate his coming indicate the salvation of the good and the punishment of the evil simultaneously.

One of these concerns Noah and the wicked antediluvians. "They ate, they drank, they married, they were given in marriage, until the day when Noah entered the ark, and the flood came and destroyed them all" (Luke 17:27). "In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month, on that day all the fountains of the great deep burst forth, and the windows of the heavens were opened . . . On the very same day Noah . . . entered the ark" (Gen. 7:11-13).

The other type is that of Lot and the wicked dwellers of Sodom. "On the day when Lot went out from Sodom fire and brimstone rained from heaven and destroyed them all." The next verse says, "So will it be on the day when the Son of man is revealed" (Luke 17:29, 30).

In view of all these matters we cannot agree with the premillennial theory as so widely taught in these days. However, we must face up to Revelation 20, and if the millenarian view is incorrect we should be able to show that it does not correctly explain the chapter. Moreover, we should be able to give a logical explanation thereof. This we shall attempt in our next chapter.

The Thousand Year Reign

Contents

The vision of the seer of Patmos, as described in Revelation 20, logically falls into three parts: the binding of Satan, the throne scene of the martyrs, and the loosing of Satan with the resultant consequences. With reference to the first of these, John describes an angel descending from heaven, holding in his hand the key to the bottomless pit and a great chain. The angel seized him who is called the dragon, the ancient serpent, the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years. He threw him into the pit, shut it and sealed it, so its occupant could deceive the nations no more until the expiration of the thousand years. After that he would be freed for a brief period.

In general, we can determine the meaning of this vision. The heavenly messenger held the key to the abyss. A key is a symbol of authority, particularly the authority to open and close (Rev. 3:7). A chain or fetter is a symbol of restraint, or restrictive influence. One who is bound is dispossessed of his freedom to move about as before. The seizing of the dragon is indicative of the exercise of heavenly power over him to curtail his activities. The period in which he was to be thus kept under restraint is specified as a thousand years. It is specifically stated that the purpose of chaining him was to keep him from "deceiving the nations." This indicates that prior to this time he had worked deception over the nations of the earth, but now they would be relatively free from such deception.

With the chaining of Satan, the apostle saw the throne scene. It would appear that this was related to the binding of the deceiver of nations, and grew out of the circumstance. As Satan was deprived of his power, there were some who were elevated. They were enthroned as he was dethroned. John writes, "Then I saw thrones, and seated on them were those to whom judgment was committed. Also I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded for their testimony to Jesus and for the word of God, and who had not worshiped the beast or its image and had not received its mark on their foreheads or in their hands. They came to life again, and reigned with Christ a thousand years. The rest of the dead did not come to life again until the thousand years were ended. This is the first resurrection. Blessed and holy is he who shares in the first resurrection! Over such the second death has no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and they shall reign with him a thousand years."

This is the only place in the entire word of God where the expression "the first resurrection" occurs. If the doctrine of the millenarians is to be found anywhere, it must be found here. If it is not taught, and clearly taught, in this instance, then it is not taught at all in the revelation of God. In our approach to the problem we must determine who sat upon the thrones, for it was these who took part in the first resurrection. Here the record is plain. John saw the souls of those who were beheaded for their testimony to Jesus and the word of God. These were the martyrs who suffered death in behalf of Jesus.

John did not see their bodies. The bodies were decapitated. He saw their souls. We are aware that the objection is made that the word "soul" is sometimes used as equivalent to man, and meaning the whole person. "Eight souls were saved by water." "There were added unto them about three thousand souls." "Joseph called his father Jacob to him, and all his kindred, threescore and fifteen souls." In each of these the word refers to persons. But while this is so, the expression, "the souls of those who had been beheaded" cannot refer to the entire persons, but must refer to the souls in contrast to, and out of, their bodies.

While the term soul used alone may, and does, signify a person, the term soul of cannot be made to do so by any law of interpretation.

Many interpreters overlook the fact that John had previously seen many of these same souls, but under quite different circumstances. In chapter 6:9-11, he says, "I saw under the altar the souls of those who had been slain for the word of God and for the witness they had borne; they cried out with a loud voice, 'O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before thou wilt judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell upon the earth?' Then they were each given a white robe and told to rest a little longer, until the number of their fellow servants and their brethren should be complete, who were to be killed as they themselves had been."

In this instance the apostle saw the souls of those who had been slain for their testimony. These souls cry out for vindication of their cause and for God's vengeance upon those who had shed their blood. They were each given a white robe as a symbol of their acceptance with God, to reassure them, and they were told to rest a little longer. Vindication or judgment would be granted to them, but first it was requisite that another period of persecution come during which their number be made complete by the slaying of another contingent of martyrs. It is not difficult to see that there are two eras of martyrdom.

The implication is that when the first group had died for the faith, there was a lull in persecution and a partial victory was achieved which led the martyred ones to conclude that the cause for which they had shed their blood was ready for final vindication. But they were informed that the victory was not yet complete and another series of persecutions would be required before their number could be made complete. The revelation would not be complete without depicting the final triumph of these slain martyrs. Accordingly, when we arrive at chapter 20 we see the great enemy bound, and the martyred saints upon thrones. Their number has been completed and now judgment (krima, the vindication of one's right) has been granted unto them.

It remains for us to enquire if there were any circumstances in the treatment of the primitive Christians which accord with these facts. The careful student of history will immediately recognize that there are. Be it remembered that Daniel saw four wild beasts, representative of as many successive world powers which were to act as persecuting agencies against God's people. The first three of these are described in the old covenant scriptures, but it was under the fourth that the kingdom of heaven was to be set up. Therefore, it remained for the new covenant scriptures to complete the canon of revelation and to detail the struggle of spiritual Israel under the last great world power. It was to complete this picture that John was granted the vision on Patmos.

The last of the four world powers was Rome, and it was with this nation that Christianity came to grips. The gospel of the Messiah was in direct opposition to the "emperor worship" which was the rallying ground of paganism. Rome soon recognized that she was up against an opponent such as she had never before met. She fought back with all that she had. She used the sword, rack, stake, strangling cord and banishment. The blood of thousands of saints flowed like rivers from the days of Nero to Diocletian. But it was a losing battle, and when Diocletian abdicated the throne in 305, due to his wretched health and desire for rural retirement, and Constantius Chlorus died a year later, the latter nominated his son, Constantine, as successor, and this was ratified by the army. Constantine, being favorable to Christianity, issued an edict of toleration, and the pagan persecutions were over.

When Roman imperialism was finally ended before the onrushing Teutonic hordes, it appeared that the people of God had gained the victory over the fourth beast. At such a time the souls of the beheaded ones might be expected to cry out with a loud voice for vindication and triumph. But they did not know that the last world empire would manifest itself in two parts. "One of its heads seemed to have a mortal wound, but its mortal wound was healed, and the whole earth followed the beast with wonder" (Rev. 13:3). "It was allowed to make war on the saints and to conquer them. And authority was given it over every tribe and people and language and nation, and all who dwell on earth shall worship it, every one whose name has not been written before the foundations of the world in the book of life of the Lamb that was slain."

The ferocity of Pagan Rome was manifest anew and increased under the sway of Papal Rome. The infidel historian, Gibbon, estimates the number of Christians slain by Pagan Rome as less than 100,000, but the number of Protestants slain in the Netherlands in five years (1550-55) by the Roman Catholic Emperor Charles V was in excess of that figure. The sword of Pagan Rome gleamed again in the hands of Papal delegates, and once more the blood of witnesses flowed in a stream. The souls under the altar who had rested a little while were now joined by their fellow servants and brethren until the number was complete of those "who were to be killed as they themselves had been."

But the days of the universal sway of Papal Rome were also numbered. In 1324 was born John Wycliffe, the "morning star of the Reformation." He developed into a man of intense conviction who was possessed of a genial and humble spirit, and who lived a pure but austere life. He was described as "the unsparing assailant of abuses, the boldest and most indefatigable of controversialists, the first reformer who dared, when deserted and alone, to question and deny the creed of the Christendom around him, to break through the tradition of the past, and, with his last breath, to assert the freedom of religious thought against the dogmas of the papacy." Wycliffe kindled a fire which was never extinguished. His most important task was the translation of the Bible into English from the Latin Vulgate, a work which he completed in 1384, the year of his death. His enemies soon admitted that "laymen and even women know more of the Scriptures than the best educated of the clergy."

A quotation from J. J. Blunt is in order at this time. "An eager appetite for scriptural knowledge was excited among the people, which they would make any sacrifice and risk any danger to gratify. Entire copies of the Bible, when they could only be multiplied by the use of amanuenses, were too costly to be within reach of very many readers; but those who could not procure 'the volume of the book' would give a load of hay for a few favorite chapters, and many such scraps were consumed upon the persons of the martyrs at the stake. They would hide the forbidden treasure under the floors of their houses, and put their lives in peril rather than forego the book they desired; they would sit up at night, sometimes all night long, their doors being shut for fear of surprise, reading or hearing others read the word of God; they would bury themselves in the woods, and there converse with it in solitude; they would tend their herds in the fields, and still steal an hour for drinking in the good tidings of great joy."

The free circulation of God's truth was the chain which bound Satan. When the Bible was chained to the pulpits, Satan was free; when the Bible was free, Satan was chained. The Reformation broke the power of Papal dominion and set the captives free from Babylon's long enslavement. Now those who had died for the freedom of truth lived again in the exaltation and triumph over the forces that had killed them. This was not a resurrection of bodies, but of a cause, and those who died for it lived once more in the spirits of free men who were willing to die. But will this interpretation meet the demands of logic and fairness? Let us see!

The book of Revelation is presented in four divisions. The first consists of a vision of the Christ, a detailed description of his appearance, and his commission to John to write. This occupies the first chapter of the narrative. The second consists of letters addressed to the seven messengers from the congregations of Asia Minor, and these are contained in chapters 2 and 3. The third and fourth divisions each picture history from apostolic days until the culmination of world events at the final judgment. The third division depicts the fate of the Roman Empire, the last of the four great powers of the earth. It opens with a vision of the throne scene in heaven (chapter 4:1) and closes with the sound of the seventh and last trumpet, the judgment of the dead, the rewarding of the saints, and the destruction of the destroyers of the earth (11:15-18). If the book concluded at that point world history would be complete.

However, the fourth division covers the same ground, but with a different view in mind. The third division is dedicated to showing the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, last of the four great world monarchies; but the last half of the book is given over to the rise and triumph of the kingdom of the Messiah. Chapter 20 is near the close of that account. It is not an isolated record of a special purpose to set up a kingdom on earth, but is directly connected with the history of a kingdom set up in the days of John (1:6; 5:10).

The final series of visions begins in chapter 11:19 with a view into heaven, as the preceding series began. In 12:1 John mentions seeing a woman, representative of the church. She is clothed with the sun, symbolic of the light of the gospel; standing over the moon, symbolic of the old covenant as an inferior revelation; having a crown of twelve stars, the chosen envoys or apostles. The woman is in the advanced stages of pregnancy, ready to be delivered. Before her stood a great red dragon (bloody persecuting power) ready to devour her child at birth. She brought forth a male child who was caught up unto God and his throne. The woman fled into the wilderness where she was pursued by the dragon. She was given two wings of a great eagle to enable her to escape, but the dragon ejected water from his mouth like a river in an attempt to overwhelm her. When the earth opened and engulfed the flood, the dragon was enraged against the woman and went to make war on the rest of her offspring who keep the commandments of God and bear testimony to Jesus.

The dragon is identified as the ancient serpent, who is called the Devil and Satan, the deceiver of the whole world (12:9). This is the same being that is bound with the chain in 20:1-4 that he should deceive the nations no more. It is not to be understood that Satan attacked the woman in person. The dragon with seven heads and ten horns is symbolic of Rome, the last of the world empires. The key to the entire series is found in the expression, "The dragon was angry with the woman, and went off to make war with the remnant of her offspring." The woman's offspring are identified as those who keep the commandments of God and bear testimony to Jesus. Thus we have a history of war between two great opposing forces— the church and the party of the dragon. One is Christian, the other is anti-Christian. The church is represented by faithful witnesses who stand for truth through many centuries. The witnesses are not the same persons throughout the centuries, but they belong to the same institution, and form the same party, and therefore, they may be said to be cast down or lifted up, falling or rising, as the party is activated or quiescent, overthrown or in the ascendancy.

The offspring of the woman in conflict with the forces of the dragon pass through various conditions in the prolonged war. Thus we come to chapter 19, and John says, "I saw the beast and the kings of the earth with their armies gathered to make war against him who sits upon the horse and against his army" (verse 19). This is the dragon-party arrayed for a decisive struggle against the forces of the Christ. The result is that the beast and false prophet were captured and thrown alive into the lake of fire that burns with brimstone. "And the rest were slain by the sword of him who sits upon the horse, the sword that issues from his mouth" (19:21). Notice that the effective instrument is the sword of the Spirit, that is, the word of God. With it, the forces of the dragon-party are routed and decimated.

When the word of God overcomes the rest of the dragon-party, John immediately says, "Then I saw an angel coming down from heaven . . . and he seized the dragon . . . and bound him for a thousand years . . . that he should deceive the nations no more." With the dragon under chains to keep him from deceiving the nations of earth, the truth-party was now in possession of the field, and John saw the souls of those who died for the sake of truth, on thrones. So long had truth been obscured by the darkness of error that it was actually like a resurrection from the dead for it to once more have the ascendancy. When the dragon had the nations deceived, the word of God chained to the pulpits, and the church was in the wilderness, the faithful were being slaughtered and truth was hidden. Now, with the enemy of souls imprisoned, and the word of God free, the truth-party is on thrones and victory is apparent. Those who died for the cause of the Christ live again as truth survives and triumphs upon earth in the persons of their successors. This is the first resurrection, the vindication of the cause of truth for which thousands were beheaded.

"The rest of the dead did not come to life again until the thousand years were finished." Who are these? Please observe that "when the thousand years are ended, Satan will be loosed from his prison and will come out to deceive the nations which are at the four corners of the earth." This indicates a resurrection of the dragon-party. While truth is free, universal deception is not likely, but the day will come when Satan is loosed. The dragon-party will then be in power for a little season which will culminate in the final struggle of truth against error, called the battle of Har-Megiddo (Armageddon). The first resurrection is the triumph of the party of truth when the martyrs live again in the persons of those who espouse it; the next resurrection is the temporary triumph of the forces of error and apostacy in the persons of those who revive deception and fraud with its persecuting tendencies. It is interesting to note that the word "rest" in "the rest of the dead" (20:5) is the same as in "the rest were slain by the sword of him who sits upon the house" (19:21).

Is this idea of a figurative or symbolic resurrection a forced one in the chapter? Does it wreak havoc with the context, either remote or adjacent? On the contrary. This interpretation does no injury to the text. It coincides with the remainder of the book and is maintained by the facts of history. The idea of two literal resurrections, one of the righteous, another of the wicked a thousand years later, has to be injected to sustain a theory. It denies other plain texts of scripture. It must supply by supposition essential parts of the theory which are lacking from the revelation of God.

Is there scriptural precedent for interpretation of a rising cause as "a resurrection"? Is it logical to refer to those who have died in behalf of a principle as "living again" in the persons of those who adopt that principle after it has long been buried from sight? In other words, can there be such a thing as a metaphorical resurrection? To this we reply that the word of God abounds in such illustrations. The prophet Isaiah brought comfort to Israel with reference to their captivity by saying, "Thy dead shall live, their bodies shall rise. O dwellers in the dust, awake and sing for joy!" (26:19). When the nation was in captivity in Babylon, with Jerusalem torn down and the temple destroyed, the people of Israel declared, "Our bones are dried up, and our hope is lost, we are clean cut off." But the Lord said, "Behold, I will open your graves, and raise you from your graves, O my people; and I will bring you home again to the land of Israel. And you shall know that I am the Lord, when I open your graves, and raise you from your graves, O my people" (Ezek. 37:11-15). This does not mean that God proposed to literally raise from the dead those who died in the siege of Jerusalem, or those who perished in Babylon. But a remnant returned with Zerubbabel, Ezra and Nehemiah, rebuilt Jerusalem and the temple, and restored the law. This was a resurrection of national hopes and aspirations from the graves of despondency and despair.

That there is such a thing as a figurative resurrection is plainly evidenced by the writer of the Hebrews (11:17-19): "By faith Abraham, when he was tested, offered up Isaac, and he who had received the promises was ready to offer up his only son, of whom it was said, 'Through Isaac shall your descendants be named.' He considered that God was able to raise men even from the dead, hence, figuratively speaking, he did receive him back."

In Romans 11, the apostle Paul deals at length with the present state of the Jews. He shows that as branches of an olive tree they were broken off because of unbelief in order that the Gentiles might be grafted in. By their trespass salvation came to the Gentiles so as to make Israel jealous. If they do not persist in their unbelief, they will be grafted in again, for God is able to do this. The writer asks, "For if their rejection means the reconciliation of the world, what will their acceptance mean but life from the dead?" (verse 15). Their rejection is equivalent to death, their acceptance to life. Since they are now in a state of rejection, if they return to God's favor it will be a resurrection from the dead.

For one to come in the same spirit and power as another is as if the original person came. Malachi wrote, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord comes" (4:5). The Jewish scribes accepted this literally and looked for Elijah to come personally (Matt. 17:10). But Jesus said, "I tell you that Elijah has already come, and they did not know him, but did to him whatever they pleased . . . Then the disciples understood that he was speaking to them of John the Baptist" (Matt. 17:12, 13). In what sense had Elijah come in the person of John? The answer is found in the words of Gabriel, relative to John. "He will go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just" (Luke 1:17). Elijah "lived again" when one came in his same spirit and power.

In this same sense the slain martyrs lived again when others arose in their spirit and power, contending boldly for the same truth for which they gave their lives. It was not necessary for the martyrs to return to earth any more than it was necessary for Elijah to do so. Jesus said "Elijah has already come" and in just the same way the slain martyrs lived again. The scribes looked for Elijah and did not recognize him when he came. They did not see him return personally and concluded that he had not come. In the same way modern scribes look for a literal millennium and may not recognize it when it is here. Because they do not see the "bodies" of the martyrs, they conclude their "souls" are not reigning with the Christ.

The reformers who died for the faith seemed to feel what I am now expressing. We offer as an example, John Huss, who was born in Hussenitz, Bohemia, in 1380. After graduation from the university at Prague, he became a bold contender for the truth. He strongly advocated the doctrine of Wycliffe, and was cited to appear before the general council in Constance, Germany, and answer to a charge of heresy. In spite of a document granting safe conduct, issued by the emperor, the pope, on the basis that "Faith is not to be kept with heretics," had him arrested and thrown into prison upon his arrival in Constance.

When Huss was brought before the council, approximately forty charges and indictments were launched against him. At the close of his trial a resolution was made to burn him as a heretic if he did not recant. He was cast into a filthy prison, and laden with fetters so that he could barely move. At night his hands were chained to a ring in the wall. When four bishops and two lords were sent to urge his recantation upon the basis of the wisdom of the council, Huss said, "Let them send the meanest person of that council, who can convince me by argument from the word of God, and I will submit my judgment to him." When the chain was put about him at the stake, he said, "My Lord Jesus Christ was bound with a harder chain than this for my sake; why, then, should I be ashamed of this old rusty one?" As the wood for the fire was being piled about his feet, the duke of Bavaria again tried to get him to renounce his teaching. Huss replied, "No, I never preached any doctrine of evil tendency; and what I taught with my lips I now seal with my blood."

While still in the prison, Huss made a very significant statement, as follows, "I maintain this for certain, that the image of Christ will never be effaced. They have wished to destroy it, but it shall be painted afresh in all hearts by much better preachers than myself. The nation that loves Christ will rejoice at this; and I awaking among the dead, and rising, so to speak, from my grave, shall leap with great joy." A century later Martin Luther shook the structure of Papacy to its foundations in Germany where Huss was burnt. Pope Adrian, in his letter to the Diet of Nuremberg, wrote: "The heretics Huss and Jerome are alive again in the person of Martin Luther." "They came to life again, and reigned with Christ a thousand years" (Rev. 20:4).

We view the millennium as a period of free circulation of the truth throughout the earth. It is not inaugurated by a literal resurrection of any from the grave, but by the rising of a cause which had been buried beneath a mixture of unholy superstition and tradition. It will continue while freedom of thought and speech are allowed by nations no longer under the deception of an apostate hierarchy. It will be concluded when men no longer cherish these ideals and again allow the forces of evil to throttle them. Then will be resurrected the deceptive spirit which for "a little season" will lead the nations of the earth into captivity.

We visualize the teaching with reference to this chapter as follows:

1. First resurrection. The revival of the party of truth and the rescue of the church from "the wilderness" of obscurity, into which it has been driven by fierce opposition of Satan's forces.

2. Second resurrection. The revival of Satan's party consequent upon his release from the abyss and their return to power at the end of a thousand years. Following the deception of the nations during a little season, the devil will be thrown into the lake of fire, and then will occur the universal resurrection of the just and unjust at the coming of our Lord. This is the prelude for the event described in Revelation 20:11-15, when John saw "the dead, great and small standing before the throne . . . and all were judged by what they had done."

Before we conclude, this chapter we beg permission to append a dissertation which we believe will serve for clarification. We refer to the article by Alexander Campbell on "The Resurrection of the Dead and the Pre-millenial Resurrection." We ask of our readers a careful study of the exegesis prepared by this profound student of the word of God.

> That we may be understood in the contrast between the literal and figurative resurrection, we shall call the former the resurrection of the body and the latter *the pre-millenial resurrection.
>
> Nicodemus was a great literalist when he asked. How can a grown man be born again? As great literalists, perhaps, may they be found who take "the first resurrection" of the apocalyptic visions, to be a literal one.
>
> We have a minute account of a figurative resurrection of the house of Israel by the Prophet Ezekiel. The Lord "opened the graves" and raised from the valley of "dry bones" a living and puissant army. That was a figurative resurrection. In baptism we are both buried and raised with Christ— planted in the similitude of his death, to be raised in the similitude of his resurrection.

The restoration of Israel in Romans 11 is by Paul called "life from the dead." "Since you have been raised with Christ, ascend in your affections," is a part of the beautiful imagery of Paul to the Colossians. If there were two Elijahs, one literal and one figurative, we need not wonder that there should be two resurrections— a figurative and a literal one. Now in the book of types and symbols the presumption is in favor of a metaphorical resurrection, unless something be connected with it that precludes the possibility or probability of such an appropriation.

When any cause is almost or altogether dead, whether it be good or bad, should it suddenly or unexpectedly revive, we would with Paul think of "life from the dead," or with John call it a resurrection. Nay, it may yet appear that John has a first and second figurative resurrection— one before and one after his thousand years; for if, after a long prostrate, dispirited, and ineffectual profession of the faith, a great and unprecedented revival should take place, and a prophet should call it a resurrection, might he not, at the end of that great revival or resurrection of the good spirits of the olden time, when an opposite class began to rise into power, think of another resurrection, which in contrast he would call a second resurrection? This John virtually does by calling one of them a first resurrection; and by afterwards speaking of the "rest of the dead" living again. Whether I have the true secret of interpreting the Apocalypse (chapter 20) the following antithesis may in part demonstrate. We shall only add that while a literal resurrection has respect to the body dead and buried, a figurative resurrection in the Christian religion will not indicate bodies, but souls quickened, animated, and elevated by the Spirit of God. And that as in the same treatise John speaks of the death, and of "the spirit of life" re-animating and elevating to heaven the two witnesses, the presumption is that he is as figurative in the 20th as he was in the 14th chapter of his scenetic and symbolic representations.

1. The resurrection of the body is only a resurrection of the body; whereas the pre-millenial resurrection is a resurrection of souls, and not of bodies. "I saw the souls of the beheaded," says John, "and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. This is the first resurrection." Now of the body Paul says, "It is sown a natural body and raised a spiritual body— it is sown a corruptible body and raised an incorruptible." The pre-millenial resurrection is a raising of souls.

2. The resurrection of the body is general— the pre-millenial is special. "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth." "There shall be a resurrection of the just and unjust." These with other passages of the same significance, apply to the resurrection of the dead, as all admit. But in the account of the pre-millenial resurrection only some will participate in it: for, says John, "I saw the souls of them beheaded for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God, and whosoever had not worshiped the beast nor his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years."

3. The resurrection of the body will be accompanied with the transformation of all the living saints — the pre-millenial will not.

No one pretends that all the living saints will be changed when the first resurrection (as it is called) transpires; and no one can deny that Paul says both the living saints shall be changed and the dead raised, and both ascend together to meet the Lord in the air.

4. The participants of the resurrection of the saints will live and reign for ever; while the participants of the pre-millenial resurrection are only to live and reign one thousand years.

I need not prove that the phrase, "we shall be ever with the Lord," applies to the subjects of the "resurrection of the just," nor need I prove that the limitation of the life and triumphs of the saints to one thousand years, precludes the idea of its being an eternal life and endless reign.

5. The resurrection of the body, its transformation and that of the earth, are almost coincident events: while the pre-millenial resurrection is neither accompanied nor succeeded by any such transformations; nay, it is to be succeeded by another resurrection of the souls of the wicked, called "the rest of the dead."

"The rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were expired." Now as the phrase, "they lived a thousand years," intimates that in that sense and state they lived no more than a thousand years; so the phrase, "the rest of the dead lived not again till the thousand years were expired," intimates that as soon as the thousand years were expired they lived again.

6. The resurrection of the dead immediately precedes the destruction of the last enemy; but the pre-millenial resurrection leaves not only Satan, but death in the field, to gain new triumphs, more than one thousand years after its consummation.

So far from death, the last enemy, being destroyed before the Millennium— so far from Satan being for ever crushed by the first resurrection, it is intimated that he will be loosed, and that he will deceive the nations and raise a war against the saints even after the thousand years shall have been fulfilled. Can any man reconcile this with Paul's affirmation while expatiating on the resurrection of the dead? "Death the last enemy, shall be destroyed." "Death is swallowed up for ever." "Grave, where now thy victory!"

7. It was before shown that the final conflagration and the new creation of a heaven and earth more congenial with the new bodies of the saints, will immediately accompany the resurrection of the body; while the pre-millenial resurrection indicates a residence on the present earth for a thousand years after it is burned up!

These seven specifications of antitheses between the literal and figurative resurrections, may suffice for the present. There are other points that have occurred to us besides these; but these, we presume, incontrovertibly show that the Lord cannot possibly come in person before the Millennium; and that with me, at present, is all that I wish to establish. The events that do accompany, and those that must, according to the very plainest oracles, precede his personal return, are such as forbid any one well read, or profoundly attentive to the subject, to believe or teach the personal coming of the Lord, or a literal resurrection of any portion of the saints, before the Millennium.

Acknowledgment

The author wishes to acknowledge his special indebtedness to David King, whose writings were of great worth in formulating the convictions expressed in this chapter. This saintly man was born in Clerkenwell, London, on February 28, 1819, and died at Birmingham, June 26, 1894. A part of the inscription on his monument reads: "Rejecting all human creeds, he pleaded that the teaching of Christ and His apostles is the only divinely authorized and all-sufficient way of salvation and basis of Christian union." To the brethren now living in Great Britain, and especially to our aged brother, Walter Crosthwaite, of Ulverston, Lancashire, we express deep appreciation, for the willingness to share with us the bound copies of Christian periodicals, now out of print, which have been of great service.

Maranatha

Contents

The word "maranatha" means "The Lord is coming." It is believed by many students that it was a greeting or salutation used by the primitive disciples of the Messiah. When they met on the street, in the market, or in their homes, this was the watchword. The uninitiated pagan who heard would not know its significance, but to the followers of the Messiah it set forth the real foundation of that hope which sustained them in the midst of a heedless society. Perhaps most of the ills attendant upon modern Christendom stem from the loss of that vibrant expectation with which the saints of old comforted each other. To the true believer, the coming of the Lord is a precious promise. The Christocracy is an interim rule to be culminated with the return of the Messiah. The plan of the ages cannot be completed without this capsheaf upon the harvest of the earth.

1. We have the testimony of Jesus that he is coming again. "And when I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and will take you to myself, that where I am you may be also" (John 14:3).

2. We have the testimony of angels. "And while they were gazing into heaven as he went, behold, two men stood by them in white robes, and said, "Men of Galilee, why do you stand looking into heaven? This Jesus who was taken up from you into heaven, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven" (Acts 1:10, 11).

3. The apostle Paul wrote. "But our commonwealth is in heaven, and from it we await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him to subject all things unto himself" (Phil. 3:20, 21).

4. The apostle Peter wrote, "What sort of persons ought you to be in lives of holiness and godliness, waiting for and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God" (2 Pet. 3:11, 12).

5. James exhorts his readers, "Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord" (5:7).

6. Jude wrote, "But you, beloved, build yourselves up on your most holy faith; pray in the Holy Spirit; keep yourselves in the love of God; wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life" (20:21).

7. John sealed the revelation of heaven with the words, "He who testifies to these things says, 'Surely I am coming soon.' Amen. Come, Lord Jesus!" (Rev. 22:20).

What circumstances will attend the coming of our Lord? What will it be like on that great and notable day for which all other days have been made? Again we must proceed with caution, for the information afforded is prophetic, and it is dangerous to become dogmatic about unfulfilled prophecy. The path of history is strewn with the wrecks of theories which once gained credence and seemed impossible of failure. But to proceed with caution does not imply refusal to proceed at all, and as we wend our way carefully amidst the truths revealed, we can be safe if we allow them to enlighten our minds and do not try to shape them by our minds. We must recognize the difference between revelation and speculation.

It would seem that a proper place to begin our survey is with the words of Peter, recorded in Acts 3:19-21. "Repent therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Christ appointed for you, Jesus, whom heaven must receive until the time for establishing all that God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets from of old." The King James Version has "He shall send Jesus Christ, which before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

An analysis of this momentous declaration reveals four important truths: (1) The Messiah is now in heaven; (2) He must remain there until the times of the restitution of all things; (3) This includes all that was predicted as related to his work by all of the prophets; (4) As the consummating act of all things God will send him forth. The background of this announcement is important. It was included in a speech made on the portico called Solomon's, which was a part of the temple in Jerusalem. The address was made to Israelites whose Messianic hopes led them to believe that a great work would be done on earth in the way of restoration, with Jerusalem as its capital city. They held the view that the righteous saints of other ages would be raised and that the faithful would sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in a thousand years of earthly bliss.

This interpretation of the prophecies was dashed by Peter's words. The Reign of the Messiah would not be on earth but in heaven. The conquest was to be made while he was at the right hand of the Father. His coming from the Father was not to inaugurate but to consummate the Reign. To lend strength to this we cite the words "establishing" and "restitution" which are the English translations by two different versions of the Greek word apokatastasis.

This noun form occurs at no other place in the new covenant scriptures. However, there are eight occurrences of the verb from which it is derived. The primary significance of the verb is "to restore." It has to do with the restoration of a thing to its original state, situation, or condition. In Matthew 12:13 it is used of the curing of a withered, shrunken hand. "And the man stretched it out, and it was restored whole like the other." In Mark 8:25 it is used of the restoration of normal vision to a blind man. "Again he laid his hands upon his eyes; and he looked intently and was restored, and saw everything clearly." This is the term used by the apostles in Acts 1:6 when they asked Jesus, "Lord, will you at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" Wrapped up in this query was all of the longing engendered by the teaching of the scribes relative to the Messianic Reign upon the throne of David. It remained for one of those who asked the question to announce that the restoration effected by the Messiah would be accomplished in heaven where he must remain until that time.

This affords an opportunity of pointing out the danger and folly of interpreting the words of the apostles of the Messiah by the prophets of the old covenant. This is one of the fatal errors of the pre-millennial school of thought. The revelation in the new covenant is explained in the light of the old covenant, rather than the reverse. The envoys of the Messiah are the only safe and authorized expounders of the ancient prophecies. He opened their minds to understand the scriptures (Luke 24:45) and those things about which the prophets searched and enquired have now been announced by those who preached the good news through the Holy Spirit sent from heaven (1 Peter 1:10-12). Without access to the new covenant scriptures, the Jewish teachers fell into error in interpreting the words of their prophets and concluded the Reign would be on earth; it is a sad thing that many who have access to the new covenant scriptures fall into the same error. The Jewish scribes did so because they sought to interpret their scriptures before their fulfillment; modern scribes do so because they seek to interpret their scriptures by those previously given.

God will send forth Jesus, but not until the times of restoration of all things. He must remain in heaven until the fulfillment of all the prophets have spoken. The restoration will be accomplished in a heavenly, not an earthly locale. We believe that this is in harmony with the other scriptural references to the Reign. Previously we have referred to the inaugural address of the Father when the Son returned to heaven as a conqueror. The latter was greeted with the invitation, "Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool" (Psalm 110:1). He was told that his people would offer themselves freely and that he should reign in the midst of his enemies. That this is his present status is evidenced by the writer of the Hebrew epistle. "When Christ had offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God, then to wait until his enemies should be made a stool for his feet" (10:12, 13).

What will transpire when the final victory is won and the goal has been achieved? Paul affirms that as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. Then he adds "But each in his own order: Christ the first fruits, then at his coming those who belong to Christ" (1 Cor. 15:23). The context shows that he is here dealing solely with the resurrection and glorification of the righteous dead. The resurrection of the wicked is not under consideration. He affirms nothing and denies nothing with reference to them. The expression "those who belong to Christ" is not used in contrast with a group who do not belong to him. It is used as complementary to "first fruits." The ones who belong to the Christ will be raised at his coming. What follows that coming? This is the crux of the modern controversy. All are agreed that those who belong to the Christ will be raised at his coming, but what follows? Will it be a thousand year reign on earth, followed by the resurrection of another group?

The record is specific. "Then comes the end." But it is argued that the whole passage says, "Then comes the end when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father." The view of some is that the end does not come when those who belong to Christ are raised, but when he delivers the kingdom to God. The contention is that a thousand years will elapse between those events, during which the Messiah will resurrect and sit upon the literal throne of David and rule over the whole earth. The word "end" is from telos, which signifies termination or finality. The word for "comes" is not in the original at all. For that reason Young's Literal Translation has: "Afterwards those who are the Christ's in his presence, then— the end . . . " If there was to be a glorification and reign of the saints after their resurrection this would seem to be a logical place to introduce it. The theme of this chapter is the hope inspired by the resurrection. If the marvelous things depicted in the millenarian view were a part of the heritage of the saints this would be the appropriate place to mention them. But what says the record? "Then, the end." Regardless of what men may seek to read into the text, these three words seem to bar the way to the elaborate story so freely circulated.

After the resurrection of the saints at the coming of the Christ comes the end "when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father after destroying every rule and every authority and power . . . When all things are subjected to him, then the Son himself will also be subjected to him who put all things under him, that God may be everything to every one" (1 Cor. 15:24, 28). It would appear that at the time when the theorists declare that the Christ will begin to reign, the inspired writer says he will cease; at the time when they say he will become a monarch, he says that he will become a subject.

It is our conviction that a collation of all the various events which are plainly revealed as occurring at his coming will preclude any great period of time on this earth subsequent thereto. The coming of the Lord is the grand climax of the ages. It is the consummating act of the drama of the world. The divine testimony must be harmonious. Any interpretation which is in conflict with other parts of the sacred revelation must be rejected. What will transpire at the coming of our blessed Lord?

1. The resurrection of those who belong to the Christ. "For as in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive. But each in his own order: Christ the first fruits, then at his coming those who belong to the Christ" (1 Cor. 15:22, 23). This will be at the last day. "This is the will of him who sent me, that I should lose nothing of all he has given me, but raise it up at the last day" (John 6:39). Now those whom the Father has given to the Christ are those who belong to him. They are the ones who have come to him upon having heard and learned of him. It is by this method the Father draws them to him. "No one can come to me unless the Father which sent me draws him; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:44). Those who belong to the Christ are those who believe in him. "For this is the will of my Father, that every one who sees the Son and believes in him should have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:40). Regardless of what may be inferred from other passages the teaching here is plain. Those who belong to the Christ will be raised at his coming and that resurrection will be upon the last day. There can be no subsequent period of years following the resurrection of the saints, else they would not be raised on the last day. We must not make our interpretation deny the plain teaching of the word of God.

2. The transformation of the living saints. The record informs us that there will be some of the faithful alive at the coming of the Lord. But these cannot inherit the kingdom of God in flesh and blood. The nature of the eternal or imperishable state is such that those who participate in it must be in a form adapted to it. In the case of those who are dead, the resurrected form will not be physical or perishable. "What is sown is perishable, what is raised is imperishable . . . It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body." But those who are still alive must undergo a transformation in order that they may conform to the saints who are raised. This will be instantaneous but it will also be simultaneous with the resurrection. The same trumpet sound which arouses the sleeping ones will signal the transformation of those who are alive.

"We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead will be raised imperishable, and we shall be changed." Observe that the trumpet which signals this event is the last trumpet. Repeatedly, the trumpet is referred to as the signal for the resurrection of the dead. But the righteous dead will be raised and the righteous living be changed at the sound of the last trumpet. If there are still some asleep after the righteous dead are raised, it is obvious that they will have to be raised without a trumpet. The signal for a resurrection will not be given to them, for no trumpet can be blown after the last one!

We are aware of the quibble that is sometimes made that the same trumpet can be sounded more than once, but in reply we point out that it is the sounding of the trumpet in this case which is the last trumpet. The reading is: "At the last trumpet. For the trumpet will sound and the dead will be raised." Since the Revelation letter is the choice hunting ground of the theorists, we suggest that they take note of the fact that John beheld "the seven angels who stand before God, and seven trumpets were given to them" (8:2). As he watched he saw that "the seven angels who had the seven trumpets made ready to blow them" (8:6). The number "seven" was a symbol of completeness or perfection. Since the trumpets announced and ushered in great epochs in the divine plan of the ages, we would expect that the sounding of the seventh, or last, would culminate that plan.

Let us see if this is correct. "Then the seventh angel blew his trumpet, and there were voices in heaven, saying, 'The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.' And the twenty-four elders who sit on their thrones before God fell on their faces, and they worshiped God, saying, 'We give thanks to thee, Lord God almighty, who art and who wast, that thou hast taken thy great power and begun to reign. The nations raged, but thy wrath came, and the time for the dead to be judged, for rewarding thy servants, the prophets and saints, and those who fear thy name, both small and great, and for destroying the destroyers of the earth" (Rev. 11:15-18). The seventh trumpet was the last one. It signaled the completion of the conquest of the Messiah, for the kingdom of the world had been subjugated. It also ushered in the day of God's wrath, the time of judgment of the dead, the rewarding of the saints, and the destruction of the destroyers. This seems conclusive proof that there can be no period of a thousand years followed by another resurrection after the sounding of "the last trumpet."

3. The removal of those who are resurrected and those who are changed from the earth. The congregation at Thessalonica was troubled in mind relative to those who had died. There is some indication that they contemplated the imminent return of Jesus, and they were concerned as to the fate of those who died in advance of that return. Their fear seems to have been manifested in two particulars. Would those who died before the Messiah returned be brought back to life, and if so, would this occur after the living saints had gone to meet him? In his handling of the situation, the apostle allays both fears. "But we would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning those who are asleep, that you may not grieve as others do who have no hope. For since we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so, through Jesus, God will bring with him those who have fallen asleep." That answered the first question and restored hope on behalf of the dead and dying.

"For this we declare unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive, who are left until the coming of the Lord, shall not precede those who have fallen asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a cry of command, with the archangel's call, and with the sound of the trumpet of God. And the dead in Christ will rise first; then we who are alive, who are left, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so we shall always be with the Lord. Therefore comfort one another with these words" (1 Thess. 4:13-18).

This language is plain. Those resurrected from the dead, and those who are changed, are not to remain on this earth. They will leave it to meet the Lord. The Lord is not coming to this earth. He will descend from heaven and those who are his will ascend from the earth. Their meeting is not on earth at all. It is in the air. But a question may be asked concerning the expression, "The dead in Christ shall rise first." This has no reference to the dead in Christ as contrasted with the dead out of Christ. The latter are not under consideration by the apostle. He is comforting the saints with reference to the faithful dead. Whatever the fate or disposition of those may be who are not in Christ, that forms no part of this discussion.

The thing that troubled the Thessalonians was not whether the righteous or wicked dead would have priority in the resurrection, but whether the living righteous would be caught up before the resurrection of the righteous dead. In replying to this anxious question the apostle says that the living will not precede the dead, but rather, the dead in Christ shall rise first, that is, before the living are caught up. It is not the dead in Christ as contrasted with those out of Christ, but the dead in Christ as contrasted with the living.

4. The destruction of the unbelieving and disobedient. The apostle makes an argument in Romans, chapter two, which ought to be here considered. In the latter part of the first chapter he demonstrates that the philosophy of the Gentiles, by its ignoring of God, led to degradation and despair. In chapter two, he proves that the Jew who trusted in his legalism, is equally without excuse, and in the first sixteen verses he deals with the judgment of God. That judgment will rightly fall upon all who judge others while doing what they condemn, and they cannot escape it (verses 2, 3). There are two classes of persons who will face God "on the day when God's righteous judgment will be revealed." "Those who by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, he will give eternal life; but for those who are factious and do not obey the truth, but obey wickedness, there will be wrath and fury." This would have been an excellent place for the apostle to have inserted the teaching relative to the prior glory and honor of the saints, but instead of implying that there will be a thousand year period between the beginning of the glorification of the saints and the destruction of the unbelieving, he rather asserts it will take place "on that day when, according to my gospel, God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus" (2:16).

This coincides with the amplification provided in 2 Thessalonians 1:5-10. Here the subject is the persecution and affliction to which the saints are being subjected. An unparalleled opportunity was afforded to set forth the theory of the pre-millennial coming of the Lord and the reign of the righteous on earth. The apostle sought to comfort those who were distressed and persecuted because of their fidelity to God. But he wrote not one word about an earthly reign with Jesus while the wicked remained in their graves. Instead, he specifically states that the glorification of the saints and the destruction of the wicked will transpire on the same day, and that at the coming of the Christ.

"Indeed God deems it just to repay with affliction those who afflict you, and to grant rest with us to you who are afflicted, when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance upon those who do not know God and upon those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus. They shall suffer the punishment of eternal destruction and exclusion from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his might, when he comes on that day to be glorified in his saints, and to be marveled at in all who have believed." This clearly teaches that Jesus will grant rest to the persecuted, be glorified in his saints, and marveled at by all believers, at the same time he inflicts vengeance, destruction and exclusion upon the disobedient. This will be when he comes! It will all be on that day! In the face of such evidence it is difficult to see how such an elaborate theory as the one under review could have originated.

5. The burning up of the earth and the passing away of the heavens. The inspired record clearly teaches in unmistakable language that the heavens and earth which now exist have been reserved for destruction by fire, and that this will be accomplished at the coming of the Lord. The terms used are such as to indicate a dissolution and demolition of the present order of creation. "By the same word the heavens and earth that now exist have been stored up for fire, being kept until the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men" (2 Peter 3:7). The heavens and the earth that now exist are identified as the ones created by the word of God "long ago" (verse 5). They are doomed to depart. In affirming the imperishable character of his words, Jesus also affirmed the certainty of the passing of the material sphere. "Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away" (Mark 13:31). One might as well deny the eternal existence of the word as to affirm the eternal perpetuity of the heavens and earth created by it.

The Father said to the Son, "Thou, Lord, didst found the earth in the beginning, and the heavens are the work of thy hands; they will perish, but thou remainest; they will all grow old like a garment, like a mantle thou wilt roll them up, and they will be changed. But thou art the same, and thy years will never end" (Heb. 1:10-12). Here the contrast is between the creator and the created. The point of difference is that while the former remains, the latter will be destroyed, or perish. The heavens and earth sustain the same relationship to the Lord, as a cloak or mantle to one who makes it for his comfort or convenience. It is understood that a garment will no longer serve its purpose when it grows old, and it is then discarded or cast aside. The heavens and earth are material in nature and have been created for man in a material state. When that state is changed, the present order of creation will be outgrown and outmoded. The heavens and earth will then be rejected as unnecessary and useless. The Lord is the same. He does not grow old and his years will never end. But the earth does grow old as God's purpose for it nears completion, and there will be an end of its years.

The writer of Hebrews also draws a contrast between the scene which inaugurated the first covenant and that which will culminate the second. He writes, "His voice then shook the earth; but now he has promised, 'Yet once more I will shake not only the earth but also the heaven.' This phrase, 'Yet once more,' indicates the removal of what is shaken, as of what has been made, in order that what cannot be shaken may remain." God has plainly declared he will shake the earth and heaven. He has said he would do it but once more. This implies the removal of what will be shaken. Previously his voice shook but part of the created universe; the next time the whole earth will be shaken, and removed. It will not be here to be shaken again after that.

The heavens and the earth were made. They were made by the word of God. They are now stored up for fire by the same word. The term "stored up" is from thesaurizo, which means to treasure up or reserve for future design or use. The design in this instance is destruction by fire. The heavens and earth are being kept until the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men. There is not a hint that the earth is reserved for a dwelling of the righteous, nor that it will be the abode of the Savior and the resurrected saints during a millennium. It is not being reserved as a dwelling of the good; but it is kept for destruction because of ungodly men. Surely if this earth was destined for a glorious state and was being perpetuated with that intent or design, the apostle Peter would have embraced the opportunity provided for saying so. Instead, he makes no reference to any such purpose but declares that the earth is being kept in store for destruction in the day of judgment.

"The day of the Lord will come as a thief, and then the heavens will pass away with a loud noise, and the elements will be dissolved with fire, and the earth and the works that are upon it will be burned up." The expressions "pass away," "dissolved," and "burned up" certainly are opposed to the idea of continuance. Any speculation which includes the perpetuity of the existing material realm after the coming of the Lord does injury to the revelation of God through the Spirit. The term "elements" is one which designates the primary and minute portions out of which complex and compound structures grow. In all ages and times, men have recognized that the world about them was made up of primary and simple elements. It is true that when Peter wrote, there was not the advanced scientific research or knowledge which enabled men to "crack the atom" but this was not essential to an understanding of his writing. Regardless of what men conceive as being the elements out of which the material universe is formed, those elements will be dissolved by universal conflagration.

Since all the material creation is made up of elements, the dissolving of these will signal the burning up of the earth and all that pertains to it. God made the earth from simple elements. Men have arranged the products of earth in various forms, shapes and structures. These constitute the works of the earth. They are of the earth, from the earth, and on the earth. That which God created and that which man has made will alike be burned with fire. There will be "a removal of the things that are made."

Let us summarize and see just what is to take place at the coming of our Lord. If, in such recapitulating, we find no provision for an extended reign of resurrected saints on earth, or if we find that a theory of such reign would deny or disarrange what the word of God teaches, we may be relatively certain it is not a part of "the plan of the ages." We have found that at the coming of the Christ the ones who are asleep in Jesus will be raised, those who remain on earth will be changed, both will be caught up from the earth to meet the Lord, the wicked and disobedient will be punished with everlasting destruction, the heavens will pass away with a great noise while the earth and all the works that are therein will be burned up. These are plain truths positively stated. Any idea which ignores them or denies them is a denial of the very language of the Holy Spirit.

But we are asked what we propose to do with Ecclesiastes 1:4, which states, "A generation goes, and a generation comes, but the earth remains for ever." The problem is no greater for us than for those who interpret the passage to mean that the earth will not pass away, for they must then meet the positive statement of Jesus that it will do so. It should be no more difficult for us to explain how a thing can be created after another is burned up and dissolved, than for exponents of the opposing view to explain how that which is burned up and dissolved may still remain. However, the crux of the matter lies in the definition of the word "for ever."

This is from the Hebrew olam which means "age lasting" or "through the age." The duration implied in any given place is limited to the age under consideration, and this must always be determined by the contextual usage. In Ecclesiastes 1:4 the contrast is not between the perpetual existence or destruction of the earth, but between the brevity of life of a generation of men and the duration of the earth. "A generation goes, and a generation comes, but the earth remains for ever" It does not come and go with the generations of men who inhabit it. The age, then, is that during which men will be born, and the earth will continue only so long as the generations of men are born and die. There is no contradiction with the passage which declares that the earth will be burned up, for the time of final conflagration will mark the end of successive generations.

What will constitute the realm of the kingdom of God when the earth and its works are burned up? Of this we are not left in ignorance. "Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Peter 3:13). An analysis of this passage shows there are three specific points: (1) There will be a new heavens and a new earth; (2) This is according to promise; (3) The new creation will be a dwelling place of holiness. As to the first of these, we are fully aware of the arguments made in favor of a renovation of the present order, but they are such as would not ordinarily occur to the humble student who had no prior theory to sustain. The language employed indicates an abolition of the existing order or state in all of its phases, and the creation of a wholly new order of things. To this the apocalyptic writer gives strength with his statement, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea" (Rev. 21:1).

There are two heavens and two earths mentioned here. One is designated as "the first," the other as "new." The former will pass away in order that the other may come into existence. At the time when John wrote this, he was standing upon the "first earth" but was permitted a view of the distant future when he could see a new earth. If it was the same earth upon which he then stood, merely purged and purified, it is unlikely that he would describe it as "a new earth," or use the expression "the first earth" for the one upon which he then resided. The scriptural import of the expressions "new" and "first" when used in conjunction may be found in Hebrews 8:13, "In that he saith, A new . . . he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away."

The present earth was created for man in his present state. It was first created and the body of man was then made from it. When he dies his body returns to the earth from which he was taken, and becomes a part of it. A physical earth is adapted to physical men. When men no longer possess physical bodies they cannot dwell on a natural earth. "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy, and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly" (1 Cor. 15:48). The present earth was created for man made from it, and for all who bear the image of that man. A change in image will require a change in nature of the residence. "As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. 15:49).

This is the very reason that a change is required. "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption" (1 Cor. 15:50). The argument that the earth will be purified of the effects of sin and restored to its original state, and that men will dwell upon it as Adam did before the fall, breaks down at this point. Adam was flesh and blood before he sinned. "The first man is of the earth." The heirs of the kingdom of God will not be flesh and blood. They will be no more adapted to a life like that in Eden than would other celestial beings. It is for this reason we conclude that when the Messianic reign is succeeded by the unbroken theocracy, the citizens will have a completely new creation as their realm or habitat.

We look for such a state, says Peter, according to promise. It is no doubt that the apostle here refers to such passages as are found in Isaiah 65:17; 66:22. The fact that these may have a two-fold meaning and application in no sense militates against the use which he makes of them. In the new heavens and the new earth holiness will dwell unmarred. "There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie" (Rev. 21:27). "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God" (1 Cor. 6:9, 10).

Those who accept the sovereignty of Jesus, the Messiah, over their hearts and lives, are in the kingdom of God; yet they have an even more glorious state awaiting them. The purposes of God are ever unfolding in majesty and power. As children we are heirs. A rich heritage lies just beyond. We enter the present state of the kingdom through faith, and upon that foundation we are expected to construct a character consonant with the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. The stones which go into this superstructure are those of virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and love. If we add these things, we shall never fall. The gracious promise is "For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. 1:11).

The kingdom of the Messiah, the Christocracy, exists as an interim of conquest and subjugation. It is to be succeeded by the everlasting theocracy. As the Father gave the rule to the Son in order to accomplish his divine purpose in "a plan for the ages," the Son will deliver up "the kingdom of God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power" (1 Cor. 15:24). The Christocracy was made necessary by revolt in heaven and rebellion on earth. When the revolt is overthrown and the rebellion overcome, the rule of the Messiah will end. "And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all" (1 Cor. 15:28).

That God may be all in all! This is the goal of the Reign of heaven. This is the theme of angels and archangels. This is the message of apostles and prophets. Is it also your aim in life, the purpose of your existence? "Thou shall have no other gods before me." This was the cornerstone of the constitution given to the trembling seed of Abraham at the foot of quaking Sinai? It should be the touchstone of your being! "Wherefore, beloved, seeing that you look for such things, be diligent that you may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless."

This book was not written to create an argumentative situation with those who are gracious enough to read it. It is not a lawyer's brief to be presented formally to a jury of peers, but a sharing with others of the simple faith which is the hope of one man's life.

The author knew what it meant as a boy to pad barefooted along country lanes shaded by trees which created cool tunnels with their interlacing branches above. And in such an environment he came also to walk by faith in a God who was in heaven, and yet not remote from the earth which He had made. Now, in the asphalt jungles created by that state which is called growing civilization, there has arisen the need for examining again the grounds of such belief to determine if they are adequate to a mature person in a more sophisticated age.

Not only will you read the author's conclusion but you will also be treated to the reasoning by which he arrived at it. That rationalization may not always appear logical to you, and the conclusion may be divergent from your own, but the book is not intended to be a profound treatise. It represents the reflection of a plain man and makes no pretension of scholarship or erudition. It re-states the faith of a one-time country lad caught up as a man in the whirling vortex created by an urbanizing culture.

It is not the contention of the author that everything new is bad, and everything old is good. Rather than either of these views, he holds that there are certain values which are unchanged and changeless, and that it is these which form the solid rock to be gripped by the anchor of hope. The boulders dislodged by doubt and rolled along the bed of the turbulent stream of modern thought may provide subjects for dialogue but not a foundation for a stable life.

If the reader is motivated to give earnest heed to the things which God has spoken and to examine his own life in the light of what has been revealed, the prime purpose of this little volume will have been achieved.

About the Title

When I was a boy our family lived on a farm. We were only a quarter of a mile from the cultural center of the rural community which was represented by a frame schoolhouse and frame church building, both sitting on an acre of ground which had been conveyed by an early settler to be used for educational and religious purposes with a clause in the deed that if it ever ceased to be so used it would revert to the heirs and assigns of the donor. It was my good fortune to be selected as janitor for both buildings, a task for which I received six dollars per month from the schoolboard and two dollars per month from the church treasurer.

In memory I can still smell the sweeping compound which I sprinkled upon the pine floors to allay the dust, and I can still see the shed on the back of the lot with one side filled with corncobs to be used for kindling and the other side with coal to be used for fuel once the fires were started. We were a simple people of humble tastes and the facilities for teaching during the week and for corporate expression of praise on the Lord's Day were very limited. There was a general feeling that scholars should not be pampered and that "frills and fancy fixin's" were out of place in the worship of the lowly Nazarene.

The meetinghouse was a stern box-type structure without steeple, but with a belfry, because the bell had to be rung each first day of the week, even if all of the worshipers were already present. It acted as a signal that the service was ready to begin and no one would have thought of commencing until the dangling rope had been pulled at least ten times. There was a concrete porch in front which served as a convenient place for the men to pause and discuss current weather and crop conditions. During the week it became an outdoor dining area for the schoolboys who could lay out upon it their sandwiches of cold biscuit and colder bacon while the boiled eggs rested on the lid of the sirup bucket which served as a lunch pail.

There were two entrances to the meetinghouse, one for women and girls, the other for men and boys. Little boys lived for the day when they could be free from the clutch of their mothers and could sit on "the men's side." The seats had been made by a neighborhood carpenter, cynically referred to as a "wood butcher." Those who sat in them for long came to realize how pitifully meager must have been his knowledge of human anatomy and posture. They also looked forward eagerly to the opportunity of standing for prayer. Several of the seats were shortened on each side of the stove which was a large one. When it was glowing red on a cold day it was noticeable that the one or two obdurate sinners in the community sat farthest from it since it gave obvious and forceful illustration of the fate awaiting them as described from the speaker's platform.

That platform was not large but it was covered with a piece of Axminster rug which had been donated by a family at the time of their removal from the community and who wanted to give the congregation something by which to remember them. The speaker's stand was painted a drab gray to match the seats. This was known as "lead color" and it was easiest mixed in that day before various hues and tints became popular.

The worshipers dressed for meeting in quite simple fashion. Each of the women had a "Sunday dress" of black which was also worn to funerals. The older ones wore a stiff bonnet made on the same lines as the limper ones worn while working in the garden on weekdays. The men wore a clean pair of bib overalls with a colored hickory shirt. No one owned a white shirt, which was locally called a "biled shirt" because such an item required boiling in the huge iron wash kettle in order to remove the soiled appearance created by dust and perspiration. In any event a white shirt soon became yellowed after being subjected to the strong homemade lye soap which gave out a pungent odor even when the huge chunks were lying on the shelves in the smokehouse.

By modern standards the services would be sneered at because of their casual and informal nature. They always began with a song announced by the leader, with the congregation making up in volume and enthusiasm what they lacked in harmony and musical finesse. Several hymns were sung, followed by a scripture reading and prayer, after which the Bible study was led by one of the men, generally an elder, and then the Lord's Supper was observed. The entire congregation marched forward during the singing of a hymn and laid the contribution, a free-will offering, upon the table. Little children were permitted to go forward and put in a penny with the same concern that their parents put in their dimes and quarters. Occasionally someone who had been to the city to work returned and put in a five dollar bill. Such sums were thankfully received at the same time they aroused suspicion as to the giver's life while he was away from home.

Since I have grown I have traveled in many parts of the world and have spoken to thousands. I have visited famous cathedrals and have gazed at shrines regarded as sacred by various peoples. I have heard famous theologians and listened to renowned choirs. But I am not sure that I have found a way of spiritual life more satisfying than that I knew when I was a country lad. Then there was no discussion of the relative value of faith and works. It was taken for granted that the child of God would exhibit both. One did not share with a sick neighbor because it was his duty but because it was a part of his own life. "If one member suffered all of the members suffered with him."

Charity drives were not necessary because the persons whom you would solicit were already over where the emergency existed doing their best personally to help out.

There have been great revolutions and upheavals in thought and behavior patterns. The industrial and technological advances which have been made under the impetus of scientific research, the ushering in of the Space Age with its thrilling and challenging potentials— these have combined with other factors to change us from an agrarian society and a rural populace to an urban society. Life is no longer simple but complex. Existence is not a mere struggle for survival against the forces of nature in our affluent culture. And the result is seen in our contemporary worship habits.

Housing projects and subdivisions now cover the land which a few short years ago was the haunt of rabbits and quail. Conformity is the rule in everything but the religious structures in suburbia. In these the architects allow their inventiveness to run wild and some of the results are bizarre and strange. It is as if those who dwell in deadly sameness during the week must find respite in something different on the first day of the new week. Sermons are carefully prepared to really say nothing when it appears that something is being said. The audience no longer consists of participants but of spectators. Frequently they draw nigh to God with their lips and honor him with their mouths but their hearts are far from him.

There is a tendency under these circumstances to look with supercilious disdain upon the lives and habits of our parents and grandparents. We speak with condescension of their lack of formal education and of the meagerness of their thinking. We tend to pity them because they were unworldly and other-worldly. But there was a peace and serenity within them which has escaped us in these days. I cannot help but believe that it came because they lived very close to God. They came to Jesus as a personal friend and they never doubted that he knew and understood both their joys and trials.

When I was casting about for a title which would define, as well as designate my purpose in this little volume I thought again about some of the "invitation songs" which were sung as the congregation implored their friends and neighbors who were unsaved to come to the cross of Christ. One of these songs lingers in my heart unto this day. It was entitled, "Will You Come?" The chorus is as follows:

O happy rest, sweet happy rest,

Jesus will give you rest;

O why won't you come in simple trusting faith?

Jesus will give you rest.

I have come to the conclusion that rest can only result from simple trusting faith. No other kind of faith can produce it. It is only when men repent and become as a little child that they can enter the kingdom. To those who could criticize this personal witness as being childish, I merely say that I prefer to think of it as child-like. As the apostle said, "We also believe and therefore speak."

"But without faith it is impossible to please him; for he that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him" (Hebrews 11:6).

The writer of the letter to the Hebrews devotes that section of his epistle which comprises chapter eleven to a roll-call of the faithful who lived in the ages preceding the advent of Jesus. Among these was Enoch, the father of Methuselah. Of him it is affirmed, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death: and was not found because God translated him; for before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God" (verse 6).

The original Greek term rendered by our English word "translate" simply means "to transport to another locality or place." During his lifetime Enoch pleased God to such an extent that God allowed him to escape the pangs of death. He was transported directly from this world to the next without experiencing the separation of the spirit from his body. And this was the result of his faith in God.

The example of Enoch provides an opportunity for the author to point out the impossibility of pleasing God without faith, and to show the minimum requirements of faith demanded of those who come to God. The entire context demonstrates that faith involves a firm trust or confidence in God, and this must begin with the acceptance of God's existence, that is, the fact of his being. However, the faith that pleases God cannot stop with a mere intellectual assent to his existence. It must recognize the personal concern of God for those who are concerned with him and who demonstrate that concern by seeking after him.

In spite of the fact that rewarding faith must begin with an acknowledgment of the existence of God the sacred scriptures nowhere devote time or space to presenting direct proof of it. The Bible starts with the simple declaration, "In the beginning God," and speaks of him as a functioning being performing the majestic act of universal creation. We believe that the absence of such proof from the Bible is attributable to at least two factors.

1. The nature of its content. The Bible purports to contain a divine message addressed to man in that form of communication best adapted to his understanding. To find much of it devoted to proving that the author really existed would be like receiving a letter from an earthly parent who spent half of his epistle in affirming his existence and identity. Such a course would create more doubt and suspicion than faith.

It is obvious that the character of the author will be revealed in his writing. One who is human cannot write a divine narrative and one who is divine would avoid those pitfalls which would identify a narrative as human. If we have a document which attests that it is from a divine source, and if internal evidence indicates it could not have been produced by human power or ability, we must assume the prior existence of God as its author. This is exactly the basis upon which the Bible begins. It is the logical manner in which a revelation from God should begin.

2. *The nature of revelation. Our word "revelation" is a translation of the Greek *apokalupsis. This word signifies to unveil, uncover, lay bare, or make naked. When that which has previously been hidden is uncovered it is said to be revealed. If it is tangible it is perceived by the senses, if it is intangible it is comprehended by the mental faculties. The thoughts and purposes of God are uncovered for us by the words of holy scripture. Thus these scriptures are a revelation of the mind of God.

Man is a rational being and God will not deal with him in such a manner as to offset, stifle or discourage his reasoning powers. To do so would be to treat him otherwise than as a man for it is his rationality which distinguishes him as a human being. For his own mental development and stability man must exercise the domain or faculty of reason. This requires taking cognizance of those things which can be perceived by the senses and properly analyzing them in their relationship to the rest of the universe.

Simple reasoning involves the combination of two known or accepted facts in such a manner as to arrive at a third or new fact, called a conclusion. This enables one to arrive at concepts of those things that are intangible, from observation of those that are tangible. The unseen can be concluded from the things that are seen. The revelation of God only uncovers for man what he cannot discover for himself.

Man can arrive at a satisfactory conclusion concerning the existence of God without access to direct verbal revelation. From personal experience as well as from the testimony of history man has been made aware that there are definite limitations upon his own power of creativity. There are bounds beyond which he cannot proceed either individually or collectively. Results achieved and established above and beyond these bounds are, therefore, attributable to super-human power. Now that which is superhuman we regard as divine. The word "divine" is the term we use which indicates that which belongs to, or proceeds from deity. By observation of the phenomena related to the created universe it will be seen that certain characteristics manifested are superhuman in nature and can belong only to a divine being. It is this fact to which Paul alludes in Romans 1:18-20.

For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness; because that which may be known of God is manifest in them: for God hath showed it unto them. For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhood: so that they are without excuse.

It will be a worthwhile project to analyze this remarkable statement and determine what is implied in its content.

1. Heaven is interested in and concerned about the affairs of men on earth.

2. Man is a responsible being and accountable to a power outside of, and greater than himself.

3. God is not neutral as relates to the behavior of men but actually expresses his displeasure with their irreligious and unjust actions.

4. This characteristic of God may be ascertained by observation and study of his created universe.

5. Intangible and invisible things may be reasoned out clearly from things that are made.

6. Since men have access to source material from which they have opportunity to learn about the nature and attributes of God they are without excuse for ungodly conduct in the divine presence.

The wrath of God is the divine displeasure with or indignation against the behavior described. Such behavior is an offence against the majesty of God and destructive of the spiritual, moral and ethical ideas incumbent upon those who are his creatures. It is designed to convince those who deny the existence of God of his personal being. For rational beings to engage in the kind of life here described indicates a doubt of the existence of God or of the divine nature which cannot tolerate that which is ungodly or unjust. If they cannot be convinced otherwise punishment must be meted out which will leave no question.

The word "ungodliness" is from a term which implies impiety, irreverence, or lack of respect for deity. Such an attitude may manifest itself in neglect of worship and homage as well as in overt acts and declarations. One need not blaspheme the name of God in order to be ungodly. To withhold from God the honor that is due him will place one in this class.

"Unrighteousness" relates to iniquity toward men. It means unfairness, inequity, or injustice. These two cover the whole scope of our responsibility. Jesus declared that the first and greatest commandment was to love God, and the second was to love one's fellowmen. He affirmed that all the law and the prophets were suspended from these and were thus dependent upon them. Just as love for God and man embraces all of God's commands, so ungodliness and injustice comprehend the full gamut of human wickedness.

The expression "hold the truth in unrighteousness" is misleading. To the extent men hold the truth they are righteous, and unrighteousness exists in proportion to their refusal to hold and be governed by the truth. The correct idea will be ascertained when it is remembered that the word translated "hold" had two meanings. It literally means to hold down and men hold things to maintain or keep them in possession, or to hinder or restrain them. This last is the clue to the meaning in this instance. The truth is held back or hindered by the impiety and injustice of men.

There is no excuse for conduct which deters or hinders the advancement and dissemination of truth. Those who are guilty of such behavior cannot plead ignorance of God. "That which may be known of God is manifest to them." The apostle speaks primarily of those in the pagan world. The Jews had an advantage in the fact that the oracles of God were committed unto them (Romans 3:2). They were entrusted with the sacred writings. God revealed himself unto them through the word, but he manifested himself to all men through the world.

Not everything can be known concerning God. There are some things beyond the horizon of human perception. The apostle does not imply that those without a special revelation can know as much about God as those who have such revelation, but there are many things that can be known. The existence of God, the power of God, the nature of that power, the attributes of God, the divine wisdom and mercy and justice— all of these can be deduced from application of the rational powers to the created universe. What one can learn he is obligated to learn. The purpose of the apostle is to demonstrate that enough may be known concerning God as to leave men without an excuse for impiety and iniquity. It is not essential that one have a knowledge of the specific requirements of God in a verbal revelation in order to know the nature of God. All nature bears testimony to the divine existence.

It is asserted that "the invisible things of God from the creation are clearly seen." The "things" here mentioned are the traits or characteristics of God. No one can perceive God by the senses. The attributes of God are not discernible to the eye and cannot be discovered by physical sight. But the creative activity of God made available to man a great storehouse of investigative material. This can be seen. It is visible and as man reasons upon it the invisible factors in the character of God are made manifest. These are specified by Paul as eternal power and Godhood. They are uncreated but are understood by what was created; they are intangible but are understood by the tangible. One reasons from the known to the unknown; from the seen to the unseen. All acquisition of knowledge is conditioned upon proper usage of the knowledge already possessed. One must have a foundation upon which to build.

In view of the fact that the invisible traits of God are understood by the things that are made, we need to determine the rational processes by which we arrive at justifiable conclusions concerning the nature of God. It must be noted that there are three different things involved: power, eternal existence and deity. All of these it is affirmed can be reasoned from the visible manifestations in creation.

1. Creation is obviously an effect and for every effect there must be a cause and this cause must be adequate to produce the effect.

2. The effect which we call creation is so intricate and complex and interdependent in its various relations as to preclude its having come into existence by a mere fortuitous concourse of atoms.

3. The only alternative is to conclude that the effect is the product of an intelligent designer who possessed the ability to conceive the universal plan and execute it, as well as maintain it. This involves both originating and perpetuating power.

4. While it is justifiable to speak of the "great first Cause" as a designation for an intelligent being, it is not justifiable to use the expression if it is implied that creation proceeded from, or is maintained by, a non-intellectual source, for such source is not adequate as a cause to produce the known effect.

5. Since matter does not, and cannot, possess intelligence, the cause which produced the universe must be personal and the power exerted in the creative process must be personal force or energy properly guided and directed to achieve the desired end.

To this rational process various objections are filed by those who will to believe that the universe of which they are a part is not a product of personal might or power intelligently applied to achieve a previously designed purpose. We are obligated to notice some of these and to file a reply to them.

1. The objection is made that it is a purely arbitrary conclusion that the universe is an effect, and that if it were it cannot be proven with such certitude as to be made a basis for further rationalization.

This objection, if sustained, would render all human experience invalid as a criterion and make a mockery of all human rationalization. All of our actions in the present, our predictions as to the future, as well as our interpretations of the past, are predicated upon the basis of causation of which mankind universally has an intuition. Upon this basis men have sought to account for the universe in all ages and places. It has universally been regarded as an effect by philosophers and peasants, by savants and savages. The fact that some have regarded it as a supernatural production and others with a superstitious premonition only serves to accentuate our contention that all alike agree that it is an effect, and what they have tried to do is to isolate and understand the cause.

There are two groups of modern thinkers who are specifically concerned with denial of the postulate of an intelligent and personal prime cause— evolutionists and atheists. Yet the universe is here and they are a part of it. They must either ignore it or seek to explain it. Man cannot consistently ignore that of which he is a constituent part, and these groups are compelled to try and account for the present constitution of the universe. In doing so, both have been forced to join the mainstream of human thought and regard the universe in its current state as an effect, for evolution is simply the theory of a cause leading to the effect which we observe and experience. That which is universally admitted should not require proof seeing there is no one to whom it needs to be proven.

There devolves upon one who presents a chain of reasoning from which he draws a conclusion, the obligation to substantiate and validate each link as he proceeds. For that reason one may justifiably take the time and make the effort required to establish that the universe is an effect. This may be done by application of the following truth.

Any result which is observable or acknowledged, and which was achieved by an obvious relation and connection between those forces or principles operating in such a manner as to bring into being the said result, implies cause and effect. The acknowledged result is proof of the power of such forces or principles to produce it.

Our entire universe has been demonstrated to be one great system of causes and effects. On this basis we make application of all the discoveries of science. Our welfare, happiness, and even our very existence are contingent upon our conclusion that like causes produce like results, when there is no interference of secondary causes. This one great system operates as a unit, so that the multiplicity of causes producing a multiplicity of effects, constitute, in the aggregate, one great effect, interrelated, co-ordinated and harmonious. We must conclude that, if the whole universe is a system of causes and effects, and if these, in combination, form the universe into one great effect, there must be a cause possessed of the potency to produce the universe, and this one cause is responsible for this one effect.

It seems that there are but two ways by which the force of this can be evaded. One might deny the whole concept of causation and attempt to throw out of the court of human opinion all reasoning conditioned upon it. But to do this would make all history invalid, render all scientific application impossible, and bring utter chaos to the whole realm of thought. Such irrationality need not be noted except to point out its ridiculous aspects.

The only other alternative would be to deny the unity of the universe and to argue that the functions of the powers producing the effects are not harmonious and sustain no relationship to each other in such a manner as to make one great unified whole. To this we reply that the scientific approach is based upon the postulate that there is a regular and invariable connection between the forces and their results, and between all of the forces as a coordinated system and all of the results as a coordinated system. Each cause is related to every other cause and each result to every other result and all are related to the whole. The conclusion must be that all power has a common source, and this common source of power is adequate to produce the universe as a whole, and is the very basis for every secondary cause and result in the universe.

2. The objection is made that one cannot possibly deduce an intelligent cause from a study of natural creation. It is urged that research can only disclose a relation between physical causes and results, all directly related to and concerned with matter, its properties and characteristics, and there is no logical connection by which an intelligent Cause can be apprehended or predicated.

This objection might have some validity (although we question it) if everything of a material nature was isolated and separated from all else, but it breaks down when it is observed that there is a correlation of the forces of nature into a harmonious and functioning whole, and that such a systematic or methodical process is essential to the preservation of nature itself and without it nature in all of its forms would be extinguished and perish. Even the most ignorant observer of nature sees evidence of adjustment and adaptation which proceeds according to law and gives indication of having resulted from plan and forethought.

The eye would be useless without light and the highest function of light would be abrogated without the eye. The eye is adapted to light and light is adapted to the eye. It is quite impossible for one to create the other. The eye could not make a single tallow candle yet it can penetrate what otherwise would be darkness and envision what otherwise would be hidden when a candle is lighted. It is evident that the light was made for the eye and the eye was made for the light, and the purpose of both must have been known before either came into existence.

The element in which an object, an organ, or an organism must exist and function must always be present before the organ or organism which depends upon it for being can exist. Thus the earth was made before plants, water was made before fish, and atmosphere before animals or man. So light also preceded the eye. And all of this indicates design— rational design.

The close inter-relationship between animal and plant life is so striking as to cause even the most skeptical to think in terms of design. In some instances the plant depends upon an insect for its continued existence through pollenization while the insect depends upon the plant for its food supply. In such cases the plant is peculiarly designed so that as the insect secures his nourishment he automatically becomes laden with pollen. Moreover, the plant is particularly adapted to a specific species and this species is so shaped as to fit the plant. The bumblebee has a hairy body which is so rounded that it fits the bell of the foxglove flower almost perfectly, and the honey can only be obtained by contact with the arched stamens and the style which are placed ideally to insure maximum coverage.

Some flowers have traps which automatically close when an insect is within. The struggle of the prisoner to escape causes him to become coated with the pollen before the gently relaxing petals open to allow him to escape. In other plants the insect upon entering must cross a barrier of sticky material which assures that he will secure a good share of the pollen. One type of orchid deposits its insect visitors in a bath of water so that as they crawl out the precious substance clings to them. In another flower there is a sensitive spot on the stamen. When the insect touches it a spring release causes the stamen to react in such a manner as to release a shower of golden dust. I have long thought that anyone who considers the remarkable fig-wasp would be forced to acknowledge the presence of intelligence and design in creation.

In the mineral field science has broken down various compounds and identified more than a hundred elements. These combine in various proportions according to certain laws to produce various substances. In many instances one of the elements has a greater affinity for another than the one with which it combines, but a combination with the affinity partner would create a destructive substance. For example, let us consider water, a substance which is absolutely essential to plant and animal life. It is composed of two gases, hydrogen and oxygen, in mathematical proportion of two parts of the former to one part of the latter. Hydrogen manifests a greater affinity for chlorine than it does for oxygen, but the governing principle affecting the universe sublimates this and compounds it with oxygen.

If the balance were disturbed to the extent that a union was formed of two parts of hydrogen and two parts of oxygen the result would be hydrogen peroxide and life for all breathing creatures would cease. Nitrogen is a gas which constitutes almost four-fifths of the atmosphere by volume. Water and atmosphere come in contact with each other constantly, but if hydrogen, nitrogen and three parts of oxygen were to combine the resultant compound would be nitric acid and again all life would end on earth.

Yet, nitrogen in the form of protein, is important to the proper constituency of animal tissue. Accordingly, bacteria in the soil act upon it to convert nitrogen taken from the atmosphere into nitrate, which is a form adaptable to the need of plants and fitted for their absorption of it. Animals eat the plants and man eats both plants and animals, and thus obtains the protein. Nitrogen is taken from the atmosphere and converted for use as plant food; man takes the plants and converts them to human diet, and thus the protein is derived. Such synchronization is not the result of mere chance nor can it be.

The postulate that there is an intelligent cause responsible for the universe is seen to be valid because it is not based upon mere matter, but upon the manipulation, arrangement and function of an intricate and inter-related system of physical entities. It would seem ridiculous to assume that such organization could result without an organizer. To believe such a thing would make one far more credulous than to acknowledge faith in an intelligent designer and creator. The universe is the result of a demonstration of personal power both in origin and maintenance.

ETERNAL POWER

It is affirmed by the apostle Paul that not only can we determine God's power from what has been made but also that his eternal power is manifested. There are two Greek words which are sometimes translated "eternal." One is aionios, the other aidios. The first applies specifically to duration undefined, the second to permanence and unchangeableness. It is the second of these which the apostle uses in Romans 1:20, with which we are now concerned. Whereas "power" accounts for the origin of the universe, the fact that it is everlasting accounts for the continuance or maintenance of that which has been created.

To one who accepts the universal concept of causation it will at once become apparent that the universe as a whole and as one unified system, must have resulted from one prime cause, and that this cause existed prior to all creation, and the power exerted in producing the universe was, therefore, an uncreated power. To that which is uncreated and which may exist apart from and independent of all secondary causes, we give the designation "eternal." Upon this basis the ancients regarded God as "The Eternal."

The continuity and preservation of the created order requires a demonstration of the same power as was requisite for its origin. It is impossible to account for the uniform and constant operation of the material universe simply by reference to the laws of matter and motion. The primary cause must be something more than mechanical, otherwise we would have to conclude that an endless progression of motions has been communicated from matter to matter without any first mover. Our very reasoning about "laws of motion" must proceed upon the basis that matter is inert. There was a power outside of, and superior to all of the force manifested in the universe, which placed in motion the entire system. The fact that it has continued in constant operation is evidence that the same power sustains it.

Chance can no more govern the world than it could make the world, and to argue that the world was brought into existence by chance, that it is a mere fortuitous concourse of atoms, and that subsequently chance imposed laws upon nature by which it was forced to act with regularity and uniformity, is to argue that chance operated in such fashion as to put an end to chance. That which operates by law cannot operate by chance and while it might be argued by the unlearned that a single and detached law might be discovered or imposed by chance, it would be ridiculous indeed to suppose this with regard to an intricate system of laws requiring meticulous synchronization.

All human experience would lead us rather to conclude that, without an intelligent power to repair the decays of nature and restore it with frequency, chance would be much more likely to destroy the world than to create it. Any machine left to itself deteriorates and any system without intelligent direction tends to distortion and dissolution. If the majestic planetary system simply happened by chance and is maintained by the same chance which produced it, that chance has acted with certainty and design. But that which so acts is not chance at all. If the solar system, by mere chance, were to be disturbed until the sun came but a few degrees nearer the earth all life on our planet would go up in a ball of flame, if it moved a few degrees father from the earth the result would be a shroud of ice many feet thick.

That which is indebted for its very existence to power is wholly dependent upon the power that made it. If it could not have existence originally without application of power, it cannot continue in existence without that power. If it be argued that originally it was conceived and created by power but that subsequently it is controlled by "laws of nature" this simply means that the power which made it now governs it by principles imposed. It matters not whether such laws were announced as specific precepts or whether they proceed from certain ingrained characteristics, their origin and result are the same. There can be no principle of self-subsistence in the world independent of its cause. The permanence of universal functions argues the perpetuity of divine power. The government of the world requires such wisdom and power as no other being besides its Maker could possibly possess. The world is either governed or it is not. If it is governed it must be governed by the Creator. The existence of the world is a testimony of power. Its continuation bears witness that this power is eternal.

To one who accepts the declarations made in the Bible as valid these things present no problem. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews declares that the Son of God "upholds all things by the word of his power" (1:3). All things were made by the power of his word, all things are maintained by the word of his power. In Colossians 1:16, 17, it is said, "For by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist." The original word translated "consist" literally means "to stand or hold together." Thus these remarkable verses affirm that the creation and preservation of the universe are invested in the same being. The one who brought all things together in creation holds all things together in perpetual recreation.

The ancient psalmist, recognizing that the forces of nature combine to prove the eternal power which brought them into existence, urges them thus, "Praise him, sun and moon: praise him all ye stars of light. Praise him all ye heavens, and ye waters that are above the heavens. Let them praise the name of the Lord; for he spoke the word and they were made; he commanded, and they were created. He hath made them fast for ever and ever; he hath given them a law which shall not be broken" (Psalm 148:3-6).

This one passage expresses the following concepts: (1) Creation was the act of God and was accomplished by the power inherent in the divine being; (2) The instrumentality of creation was the word of God; (3) The creative power is identical with the sustaining power; (4) The universe is maintained by law and the law of maintenance is also of divine origin.

GODHEAD

The apostle affirms that from nature, that is, the things that are made, one can come to know three traits or characteristics of God, as follows: (1) power; (2) undiminishing or permanent force or energy; (3) divinity. This last is expressed in his word "Godhead," which might better be rendered "Godhood," as embracing all that is generally attributed to divinity. However, without becoming too technical we need to be very careful that we understand exactly what can be learned about the nature of God from reasoning on the things created, and the limitations beyond which, nature cannot go as an instructor.

A good place to start is with the two uses of the word

"Godhead" in the scriptures. These occur in Romans 1:20 and Colossians 2:9. The careless student might conclude that they mean the same thing, while the indifferent student, upon ascertaining that they are derived from two divergent terms might argue that this made no difference.

The fact is that the word used in Romans 1:20 is theiotes, while that in Colossians 2:9 is theotes. Neither of these words is found at any other place in the sacred scriptures. Richard Chenevix Trench, Archbishop of Dublin, in his "Synonyms of the New Testament" asserts that these two do not have the same origin, and that, "there is a real distinction between them, and one which grounds itself on their different derivations."

Briefly, the distinction is as follows. In Romans 1:20 the apostle is speaking only of "that which may be known of God" by considering his creative work. Nature can reveal much to us about God and thus we can know about him. We can know enough about him that we are left without excuse. But we cannot know God in a personal sense except as he is revealed in the person of his Son. We can learn of the divinity of God, his majesty, glory and might, from a study of creation, but we cannot know him in the intimacy of personal relationship except through Jesus. Perhaps the distinction between "divinity" and "deity" may express the difference.

The "Godhead" which we can deduce from our observations of and rationalizations about the created universe is related to the majesty exhibited in creation. It is of this the psalmist exclaims in his familiar words, "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the ends of the world" (Psalm 119:1-4). There are some things in which this passage is very important to our study. An analysis of it will be quite revealing. While we cannot be exhaustive in our treatment of the verses we would like to mention a few salient points.

(1) The planetary system is the result of God's creative power and is a source of glorification for him.

(2) The heavens convey knowledge and proclaim the wonders of God's power.

(3) The declaration is not made in articulate language and no sound is heard.

(4) The glorification of God is universal in scope as the planets can be observed throughout the whole earth.

This brings us to the point where we may summarize our conclusions about God and detail those things we can know by the application of our reasoning faculties to the created things around us.

1. God is the first cause of all things and thus is uncaused and uncreated. He is self-existent as a being and is an intelligent designer as recognized in the intricate synchronization of natural forms.

2. God is personal as evidenced in the creation of man. The capacity to know and to love can only logically be accounted for on the basis that man is a product of a creator who has the same ability. It is obvious that the creator must possess a personality far superior to ours, otherwise he could not commit to others what he does not himself have.

3. God is spiritual, and is unlimited and unconfined by time or space. He suffers no restrictions and is infinite or unlimited.

4. He is immutable. In view of the fact that God possesses all things good and is perfect, he cannot acquire a perfection nor lose one. One who experiences perfection in the absolute can find nothing to adopt, else he would not be perfect, seeing that he lacks something. By the same token he cannot be divested of any attribute or quality that he possesses and remain perfect.

5. He is eternal as we have previously shown.

The minimum of faith essential to coming to God is a belief in his existence coupled with the conviction that he is interested and concerned with us as persons and that he manifests this concern by rewarding those who seek him diligently. "Faith is a firm confidence as to things hoped for, a firm conviction as to things not seen" (Hebrews 11:1).

My Personal Apology

Contents

Our word "apology" is an interesting one. It is not a translation but a transliteration of the Greek apologia. In our day it is frequently used to designate an expression of regret for some improper or injudicious remark or act. This was not its original sense at all. Instead, it referred to a statement, either oral or written, in justification or defense of one's conviction about a matter under challenge.

In its early days Christianity became the butt of attack by pagan philosophers and politicians who were masters of the art of ridicule. Many of these were brilliant men in positions of authority in heathen schools and governments. But there were also men of ability who wrote in behalf of the faith, and the second and third centuries of the Christian era produced some noble apologists. From their replies we can ascertain the charges made against the followers of Jesus, and can determine how these accusations were countered.

We shall introduce here only one of the apologists who is especially interesting because of the format of his presentation. Minucius Felix was originally a Roman orator and rhetorician. When he was converted to the Christian faith he directed all of his talents toward the defence of that which he once hated. His learned treatise was probably published about 210 A. D. Following the best style of that day it was in the form of a dialogue between Caecilius, a heathen, and Octavius, a Christian, with Minucius sitting as moderator between them.

Caecilius, during the course of his remarks, produces all of the current arguments in defence of polytheism, and makes all of the charges then in vogue against Christianity and the persons who had embraced it. In behalf of the various deities who were alleged to inhabit the summit of Olympus it was urged that history revealed that the gods had not only protected those who faithfully devoted themselves to their worship, but avenged them of their enemies who unjustly attacked them. It was argued that miracles had been wrought through their power and those who possessed a special dispensation to divine had foretold events which had subsequently come to pass. Caecilius also affirmed that a Supreme Deity had always been revered and worshiped in conjunction with many gods, and that there had ever been one who was regarded as the chief of the gods.

Against the Christians various charges were hurled. They were accused of having deified a publicly executed malefactor, the chief witness against whom were his own countrymen. It was urged that they demanded a blind faith as opposed to a rational system of philosophy; that they invited the illiterate, sinners and criminals into their society; whereas, only the instructed and pure of heart were initiated into the heathen mystery cults; and that the various Christian sects were intolerant toward each other, exhibiting animosity toward those who professed to be followers of the same God. Caecilius also pointed out the poverty and persecution which dogged the steps of the Christians and attributed this state to the weakness of the one whom they worshiped.

Caecilius further indicted the Christians as a desperate and unlawful faction composed of those who sought to import a religion from a provincial territory and impose it universally in ruthless disregard for the gods of other people. He declared that they heaped contempt upon all other deities than the one they worshiped, scoffed at their priests and derided their temples and sacred places.

Throughout the lengthy harangue, Octavius quietly listens without interrupting or heckling his accuser. At the close of the charges he speaks calmly to the chairman, Minucius, and informs him that he will endeavor by a clear statement of truth and fact, to exonerate Christianity from the foul aspersions cast upon it by Caecilius. He begins by admitting the truth of the charge that Christians held in contempt the gods of the heathen. He declares that such gods are but the creations of men and are helpless, and that all worship of them is vain. Here is part of his rejoinder.

> The mice, the swallows, and the bats, gnaw, insult, and sit upon your gods; and unless you drive them away, they build their nests in their mouths; the spiders weave their webs over their faces. You first make them, then clean, wipe and protect them, that you may fear and worship them. Should we view all of your rites, there are many things which justly deserve to be laughed at— others that call for pity and compassion.

After this introduction, Octavius proceeds to deal with the reasons for his faith in a logical and systematic fashion. In doing so he shows that the apologetic for one God was equal to the presentation of any of the philosophers in his day. Making his appeal to common observation and knowledge, he points out that man differs from the lower orders of animals, chiefly in this, that the beasts of the field are created prone to the earth, bent downward by nature, and contemplating always that only which will fill their bellies and satisfy physical needs. But man was created to be erect and upright, capable of looking abroad and of contemplating the heavens, possessed of rational powers, of conscience and a moral sense, all of which are calculated to lead him to knowledge of God, which, in turn, make him want to ascertain the will of God and please him. He proceeds to deny atheism as an absurdity, and postulates the need of a great first cause as dictated by the clearest light of reason and conscience. You will appreciate his approach in the following magnificent sentences.

When you lift up your eyes to heaven and survey the works of creation around you, what is so clear and undeniable, as that there is a God, supremely excellent in understanding, who inspires, moves, supports and governs all nature. Consider the vast expanse of heaven, and the rapidity of its motion, either when studded with stars by night, or enlightened with the sun by day; contemplate the almighty hand which poises them in their orbs, and balances them in their movement. Behold how the sun regulates the year by its annual circuit, and how the moon measures round a month by its increase, its decay, and its total disappearance. Why need I mention the constant vicissitudes of light and darkness, for the alternate reparation of rest and labour? Does not the standing variety of seasons, proceeding in goodly order, bear witness to its divine author? The spring with her flowers, the summer with her harvests, the ripening autumn with her grateful fruits, and the moist and unctuous winter, are all especially necessary. What an argument for providence is this, which interposes and moderates the extremes of winter and summer with the alloys of spring and autumn — thus enabling us to pass the year about with security and comfort, between the extremes of parching heat and of cold? Observe the sea and you will find it bounded with a shore, a law which it cannot transgress. Look into the vegetable world, and see how all of the trees draw their life from the bowels of the earth. View the ocean, in constant ebb and flow; and the fountains running in full veins; with the rivers perpetually gliding in their wonted channels. Why should I take time in showing how providentially this spot of earth is cantoned into hills, dales and plains? What need I speak of the various artillery for the defence of every animal— some armed with horns and hedged about with teeth or fortified with hoofs and claws, or speared with stings, while others are swift of foot or of wing? But, above all, the beautiful structure of man most plainly speaks of God. Man, of stature straight, and countenance erect, with eyes placed above like sentinels, watching over the other senses within the tower?

Having shared with you this much of the speech of Octavius in reply, I feel it would be unfair not to let you further read his answer to the charge that Christians were generally poor and despicable, and often persecuted and held in contempt by the more sophisticated members of society.

> That the most of us are poor, is not to our dishonor but to our glory. The mind, as it is dissipated by luxury, so it is strengthened by frugality. But how can a man be poor, who wants nothing, who covets not what is another's, who is rich towards God? That man is rather poor, who, when he has much, desires more. No man can be so poor as when he was born. The birds live without any patrimony; the beasts find pasture every day, and we feed upon them. Indeed they are created for our use, which, while we do not covet, we enjoy. That man goes happier to heaven, who is not burdened with an unnecessary load of riches. Did we think estates to be useful to us, we would beg them of God, who, being Lord of all, would afford us what is necessary. But we chose rather to contemn riches than to possess them, preferring innocency and patience to them, and desiring rather to be good than prodigal. Our courage is increased by infirmities, and affliction is often the school of virtue.

There are certain things which we may deduce from the foregoing and other Christian documents of the same era. Let us mention a few of them for your consideration.

1. The Christian concept has encountered opposition ever since its introduction into the world. Because of its conflict with "the wisdom of the age" it has been attacked repeatedly by the materialistic philosophers of every generation.

2. The early Christians did not flinch from their attackers but faced up courageously to the onslaught. They welcomed every examination of the basis for belief and heeded the admonition to be ready always to give an answer to those who queried them about a reason for their hope.

3. They were prepared to make the ultimate sacrifice for conviction, holding a firm trust that they might accomplish in death what they could not in life. It was this which prompted Tertullian (about 200 A. D.) to close his apology which was addressed to the emperor and his counsellors, in the following words:

> But do your worst, and rack your inventions for tortures for Christians. 'Tis all to no purpose; you do but attract the notice of the world, and make it fall the more in love with our religion. The more you mow us down the thicker we spring up— the Christian blood is the seed you sow; it springs from the earth again and fructifies the more. That which you reproach in us as stubbornness, has been the most instructive mistress in proselyting the world — for who has not been struck with the sight of what you call stubbornness, and from thence prompted to look into the reality and grounds of it; and who ever looked well into our religion that did not embrace it? and whoever embraces it (on proper grounds) that was not ready to die for it? For this reason it is that we thank you for condemning us, because there is such a happy variance and disagreement between the divine and human judgment, that when you condemn us upon earth, God absolves us in heaven.

4. It will be noted that the charges directed against Christianity in our twentieth century are not new, but are simply those of the second century introduced in a different garb. A careful analysis will show that not one novelty has been urged by modernistic skeptics. It would appear that neo-paganism has simply borrowed a leaf from the book of more ancient philosophy and revised and amended its content to meet the more refined age in which we live.

5. The weaknesses and frailties of the Christians are still urged as objections to their profession. The spirit of antagonism evidenced in sectarianism and factionalism is still a hindrance to the cause of Christ in our day. It would appear that the heathen in all ages expect more fruit from the Christian tree than do its branches. But sad as the derelictions of Christians may be, it remains that these are not the result of following Christ, but of refusing to do so. And the condemnation of the hypocrisy of his professed followers is an indirect testimony to the purity of Jesus.

Perhaps I should apologize for offering my own apologetic. It is that of a plain man and not of a philosopher. There will be nothing profound about it and it will undoubtedly be rejected by many because it will be presented in the common language in which a simple believer must communicate his thoughts. There will be nothing new or startling about it and it will serve only to recall that which has often formed the foundation for the meditation of most of us in our quiet hours.

I believe in God. There are reasons why I believe. I have pondered them over and over. These reasons appear to me to have validity for my own life and thought. I offer them for consideration because I have personally considered them and they have relevance in the formation of my approach to life. I shall mention five different items. Four of these will be positive; the fifth will be negative. The last will be devoted to a discussion of the inadequacy of an alternative to faith.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF THE IDEA OF GOD

The idea of a supreme being has been a vital factor in the thought of every nation in the world. As far back as the history of mankind reaches into the remotest annals of time, this has been the case. And the idea of God has not been a fleeting thought or a wandering vagary in a few more enlightened minds. It has been the dominant factor in the formation of the varied cultures. It has been the thing to which men gave their allegiance when all else failed, the one belief which could not be banished permanently from the human heart. Religion has been the regnant principle which moulded the laws, shaped the lives and conditioned the attitudes of every race, tribe and tongue.

Whether a people were considered primitive or advanced in civilizing influences, they had in common a belief in deity, and this promoted religion which, in turn, prompted action and conduct compatible with it. The American Indians who roamed the vast plains or lived among the forest trees, believed in a Great Spirit and contemplated a happy hunting ground where hunger and hardship would come no more. The Aztecs of Mexico, and their Toltec predecessors, sought to propitiate their gods with human sacrificial victims. Barbarous as this appears to us in a more enlightened age, it betokens the fact that deity was regarded as deserving the best that man could offer, and thus shows a strange paradoxical regard for human life even by those who so often sacrificed it.

Long before the Romans pushed their way northward into Europe the savage tribes which inhabited the area worshiped gods and poured out libations unto them. They glorified and deified their heroes who were credited with real and mythical exploits. Regarding immortality as being the reward for valor alone, they considered that the bodies of the brave after being purified by fire would again be invested with their spirits and conducted into the great banquet-hall of the gods for an eternity of feasting and rejoicing.

The Romans borrowed many of their own deities from the Greeks, so that the gods of the Greeks have exact counterparts in the Roman pantheon. The fertile imagination of the Greeks peopled the universe with so many gods that the poet Hesiod said there were actually thirty thousand of them. The Persians had their supreme being, Mithra, and under him the two inferiors, Oromasdes and Ariman, the gods of good and evil respectively. The Babylonians worshiped Bel and Nebo, and the Assyrians before them had their deities.

It is impossible for anyone to write the history of an ancient nation without devoting a great deal of space to religion. So interwoven is religion with the customs, laws, habits and events of every tongue and tribe that a recital of its events is actually a recounting of the impact of its religion upon the life of the people. Even the professed atheist who derides the idea of a supreme being, and who denounces religion as an opiate of the people, must admit that the idea of God is as universal as mankind.

When such a skeptic writes a letter, if he puts down the name of the week day or the month, he often is forced to use the name of a heathen deity; when he puts down the year he pays tribute to the entrance of Jesus into the world. The poetry he reads is replete with allusions to the gods of the ancients or to the words of the sacred scripture. If you were suddenly to remove every reference to religion or every quotation related to it, the literature of the world would become threadbare. The masterpieces of writing and speech would disappear.

If the idea of God had occurred only among barbarians and savages, one might conclude that it was a superstitious notion conjured up by the rude and uncultured. Or, if the idea was found only among the more enlightened he might reason that it was an outgrowth of the intellectual faculties, an invention to meet the need for explanation of certain intangibles. If the idea were limited to a certain clime in a certain age it could be argued that certain factors of environment, created by time and place, necessitated the concept, and it was devised because of this. Admittedly, no such reasoning could be justified but it might be more easily indulged.

But the truth is that all people, tribes and tongues, have believed in a supreme being. This has been as much a part of their existence as the eating of food or propagating the species. And it would seem to be instinctive as the satisfaction of hunger or breeding to produce offspring. Just as you could not find a race of people who did not eat to sustain life so you could not find a race that did not believe in a deity. Can it be possible that this one deep longing and hunger for companionship with a supreme being, felt by all men everywhere, is the only passion without provision, the one desert of disillusionment without a single oasis? Would man create a desire to cruelly torment himself and perpetuate a myth with which to tantalize his own person? And if one man would do so, would all men do it? Would they do so simultaneously in a universe where many of them had no communication with any of the others?

It may be argued that many of the aboriginal nations were superstitious in matters of religion, and this is true. But it cannot be argued that they were not sincere. In their ignorance the object of their faith was misdirected, but the effect was not. Their conduct was consistent with what they did believe and they were held in check by what they held in awe. Their government, their customs, their cultures, were an outgrowth of their religion. How may we account for a universal belief in God if there was no God of the universe in whom to believe?

THE ANTIQUITY OF THE IDEA OF GOD

It is an interesting fact that when one goes back as far as historical research permits he finds that every nation had its traditions concerning creation, the primeval state of man, the origin of sin, the deluge and kindred matters. Concerning the origin of the existing natural order there is a remarkable agreement among the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Phoenicians, Assyrians and Greeks. All of the traditional views begin with a chaotic condition, all hold that light was created first after the chaos, all agree that with the coming of light, orderly development followed, all concur in the placing of the sun, moon and stars as regulatory bodies in the heavens.

We are limited in our examination of the veracity of a people to the evidence at hand. For this reason we cannot go beyond the bounds of recorded history. But the earliest such records show that all the nations already held traditions which they believed and accepted as coming down to them from the very beginning. In fact, the recording of these traditions lest they become lost or forgotten actually gave rise in some instances to the inception of permanent records among them. We may express doubt as to the accuracy of the traditions but we cannot deny the existence of them. Since they did exist and were regarded as traditions and since they are beyond the pale of possibility for accurate evaluation, it would seem the role of wisdom on our part not to be arbitrary in our pronouncements. How do we know that they did not possess adequate and credible evidence to support them in a belief so universal?

Of course it is generally urged that, in spite of the agreements we have mentioned, there were also divergencies as to detail and various disagreements in the traditions. This is correct but instead of it disproving the traditions or weakening the fabric of agreement woven from them, it does the opposite. A tradition is "a handing over or a handing down." It refers to that which is handed down from one person to another, or from one generation to another. It is recognized that in all transmission of thought from one generation to another discrepancies arise. Men are not accurate either in speaking or hearing, and these inaccuracies are thus perpetuated. Where there is deliberate collusion and individuals conspire to make their stories conform this does not occur in written records.

Of one thing we can be sure, that the stories credited to ancestral origin are traditional and genuinely so. This does not prove the basis of the tradition to be factual but it does demonstrate that succeeding generations deemed it of sufficient value to pass on to their posterity. Having determined that accounts are genuine traditions, our task is to ascertain the element, or elements, basic to all of them, and we will then know the core of the original, free from the later modifications and amendments created by passing time.

Traditions must have a beginning and that beginning must either be in fact or in supposition. In the case of the traditions to which we allude it can be said that those who received them believed implicitly that they accounted for the origin of the earth and of mankind. This indicates that those who conveyed them also accepted them and transmitted them as factual. It would appear that the antiquity of the traditions would be strong evidence for the existence of God and the creation of the material universe.

NATURE AND GOD

For a great many centuries men have pointed to nature as demonstrating the existence of God. In our previous chapter we cited the statement to this effect as made by the apostle Paul to the Romans. Other writers of the scriptures, both old covenant and new, have made the same appeal. In addition to these, great thinkers through the centuries have regarded the natural realm as an effect which demanded a supernatural and intelligent personality as essential to its origin.

Any attempt to explain the universe by eliminating God does not solve the problems or answer the questions. It increases both. It is as if an inventor created an intricate lock mechanism for a huge safe containing untold wealth, and provided the proper combination for access, only to have those in charge of the safe throw the combination away to experiment blindly with millions of possibilities in an attempt to gain entrance to the treasure. It is useless for those who reject God from their thinking to argue that their intellectual integrity is at stake for one must be much more credulous to accept their substitute theories than to believe in God.

Some men are so foolish as to think that God can be discounted and they themselves be considered as honest doubters. This is not the case at all for the mind cannot continue as a vacuum. Man is so constructed as to require faith. All business and economic progress is based upon this principle, and in transacting our daily affairs we actually and practically "walk by faith and not by sight." The same thing is true in our attitude toward the world and ourselves. In the final analysis the choice is not between faith on one hand and doubt upon the other, but between rival systems of faith. It is not a question of whether we shall believe or not believe, but simply one of what (or whom) we shall believe.

Since the question is one of divergent forms of faith, it is obvious that the same criteria must be applied to the form of faith which denies God as to that which accepts Him. It is here that the "unbelieving believer" fails to measure up. He is like a merchant who has two sets of scales; one to use in purchasing, the other in selling. Or, like a man with two "yardsticks" of different lengths. When the same rigid tests are applied to the alternatives offered for God in creation, as are applied to the concept of God, it will be found that what is called honest doubt is not honest at all.

Men talk about having an open mind and infer that such a mind is one which settles on nothing. But there are absolute truths and upon these the mind is designed to close and retain them as foundational or axiomatic to the rational processes. On the farm where we lived we had a gate which insisted on swinging shut while we were trying to drive through to the field, so we propped it open with a chunk of wood. At the end of the season when we tried to close it we could not do so because the hinges had rusted and no longer allowed the gate to function. An open mind is not always a flexible one especially when it is kept open by an arbitrary prop. Some minds stay open because they cannot be closed and everything goes through while nothing worthwhile is retained.

It has long been a feeling of ours that the majority of those who live closest to nature have an abiding trust in God. There are exceptions, of course, but generally speaking, men who wrest a personal living from the soil feel a sense of nearness unto God. This may prove little, or nothing, about the subject at hand, but the humility which comes from a recognition of one's inadequacy to make anything grow, coupled with the thrill of creativity as a partner of unseen forces, produces a feeling of relation to and reliance upon the Creator of the universe. Who should have a firmer trust in God than one who works directly with the elements He has made and the forces He has set in motion.

There was a time when mention of this fact was countered with the reminder that those who worked the soil were less educated and unsophisticated. That day is past and modern skeptics can no longer make it appear that "the greater the ignorance, the greater the faith." The argument was not even valid in the days of restricted educational facilities in rural areas, for there have always been men like Sir Isaac Newton, to affirm, "The whole diversity of created things could have its origin only in the ideas and the will of a necessarily Existing Being."

We rejoice at the new discoveries in the physical realm. It would seem obvious that, if God exists and created all things, the deeper we penetrate into a study of the result, the more we will come to appreciate the cause behind it. The true believer welcomes all objective research and thrills at every scientific breakthrough. A few years ago we were limited to a study of the atoms in the world, now we can study a world of power in each atom. There is no danger of displacing God by learning more about Him and how He works. The God of the ages will command the Space Age, as he did the Stone Age, the Iron Age, the Machine Age, and even the Dark Ages.

If it was essential to postulate God in order to explain the presence of universal power, how much more essential is it to rest upon God as the explanation of atomic energy. It is hardly conceivable that the power which exists in the atom was self-generative, and to argue that such could happen would involve interminable guesswork as to what "triggered" it originally. The power to pull the trigger must reside in someone or something before it is applied to the trigger and this destroys the very idea of self-generation by conditioning it upon application of existing force. Since it is the nature of energy unconfined to expend itself, and since the power brought to bear in order to confine it must be greater than the energy, how can we account for energy being confined to the atom?

It is our own conviction that the natural realm argues the existence of God on the basis of two things: what has happened and what has not happened. The universe is here. We are a part of it and so conditioned that we can hardly continue in it without seeking to account for it. We must seek an explanation for what we see and experience. But our investigation has led us to discover potent chemical forces which would destroy the universe itself except that they are kept in intricate balance. To us, the most satisfying explanation is that of a personal and intelligent being "one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all and in you all."

In our previous chapter we spoke of design in nature and reasoned that this presupposed a designer who was intelligent. The highest expression of mind and the greatest demonstration of mental ability, is to take a number of unrelated physical things which are unconscious, and set them in such relationship with each other as to make them function in unison and serve the purpose of conscious design. Being wholly unconscious of relationship, function, design or purpose, such unity in consistent function can only result from an intelligent consciousness acting purposefully upon such things.

This can be demonstrated by such simple objects as the alphabet blocks with which little children amuse themselves. The blocks are simply material composed of wood or plastic and are wholly unconscious of any relationship to each other. The letters of the alphabet imprinted upon them are visible symbols which have come to be accepted as representative of certain speech sounds. If we enter a room and find the blocks arranged in such a fashion as to spell out a simple sentence such as, "See the cat and dog," we immediately arrive at the conclusion that someone possessed of mental power has consciously arranged them thus. We know that neither the letters nor the blocks have power to arrange themselves so as to convey thought and we also recognize that the law of probabilities precludes the possibilities necessary for the blocks to fall into line and into the required sequence when casually tossed into the air. We have no hesitancy in concluding that personal conscious power was brought to bear upon them and arranged them to conform to design.

But such an illustration is far too simple to even approximate the complex relationships in the physical realm. Let us suppose that we go by a printing shop and see the fonts of type with thousands of upper and lower case letters. The next day we pass that way again and find the letters now composing a masterpiece of literature. Will we not know that an intelligent power has created the masterpiece? Could there have been "A Tale of Two Cities" without the mental direction of Charles Dickens, or a "Pilgrim's Progress" without the conscious effort of John Bunyan? Could "The Gettysburg Address" have formed itself without the mental genius of Abraham Lincoln?

Think of the seven notes in music. Each of these is a symbol for a tone which is merely a vibration in the air. The note, the tone and the air are all unconscious. But the marvelous genius of Bach or Beethoven could arrange the tones in such a manner as to create music to thrill the hearts of men and women in all generations. The mind of Handel is indelibly stamped upon the Hallelujah Chorus. In the same fashion the mind of God is imprinted upon the universe and "the singing of the spheres" is a composition of supernatural genius intelligently directed. The world of nature is the result of personal creativity as certainly as was Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" or Whittier's "Snowbound."

HUMAN NATURE AND GOD

Physically, man is an animal. His body is composed of bones, muscles, sinews, tissues, veins and blood, as are the bodies of other animals. But if there is a difference between man and the other animals we need to know what it is. The fact that others are called "lower animals" indicates that man is higher and more majestic. What is the difference? Sometimes man is called "a thinking animal." Sometimes he is called "a religious animal." This implies that other animals are not rational, that is, they are not capable of reasoning, so they are not capable of worshiping or reverencing a higher being.

There is some quality in man which makes it impossible for him to be satisfied with material things. A hog can fill his stomach and lie down without a care. But man can dwell in a state of luxury and still be restless. His stomach may be full but his heart and life may be empty. There is a yearning deeply imbedded in the human personality which no earthly companionship can ever fully satisfy. The spirit of man reaches out for the source of all life. Not long ago we took some flowers in for the winter and placed them in the basement not too far from a small window. It was not long until every plant was bending toward the sunlight which filtered through the glass. In the same fashion the soul reaches out its invisible tendrils toward the Sun of righteousness.

The ancient psalmist said, "My heart pants for God as the hart pants for the water brook." The picture we conjure up is that of a deer relentlessly pursued by dogs or wolves. The frightened creature runs with tongue hanging out and body dehydrating because of perspiration, while the throat becomes dry and constricted due to the rigors of the chase. But finally respite comes at sight of a brook of clear, cool water which serves to revive the flagging energy. The animal is so constructed as to require water to survive and water is to be found in every part of the earth. The longing finds an answer and the need is met.

It would be incongruous indeed if provision was made for every need of man except the highest and noblest. The testimony of millions will show that there is no void or vacuum at the summit of human desire and longing. They have not reached out into emptiness but have found a response to their cries. The hungering soul is fed. The thirsty heart is refreshed. The lonely are comforted with the thought of companionship which is real, though unseen.

Inherent in mankind is a sense of justice which demands that wrongs be righted, that inequalities be adjusted, and that ruthless oppression be punished. This has driven men to defy tyrants at the cost of life, to plead for recognition of human rights and to establish courts of equity. Still there is a constant sense of futility in the attempt to secure absolute justice in this life. Man has an ideal which he has not been able to reach. He is cognizant that there are shortcomings in any system which he creates.

There are no judges able to read the hearts of men or to determine actual motivations. Any attempt to set up a scale of responsibility ends in failure. The judges that are appointed sometimes fall victim to their own cupidity and are not free from taking bribes to thwart the demands of justice.

Is the principle upon which man proceeds— that every crime deserves punishment— a valid one? If it is not, then a criminal is as guiltless as a just person, and in the final analysis there is no such thing as crime. Against this form of theorizing the whole experience of the human race cries out and every law lifts up its voice in protest.

If the principle is valid, who will bring justice to attainment? Who will deliver to the dock the greedy and rapacious who have trampled roughshod upon the poor and helpless and exploited them in their insane attempts to command power and wealth and bask in luxury? Who will avenge the millions of widows and starving orphans who have been bereft of their husbands and fathers by warmongers who have literally waded through the warm blood of those innocent ones whom they have slaughtered?

Who will repay the callous-hearted who have herded men into gas chambers by the millions and have snuffed out human lives as carelessly as they would extinguish the flame of candles on a birthday cake? Who will exact retribution for the blood of martyrs burned at the stake, or flayed into ribbons of bleeding flesh at the gibbet, or reduced to insensibility on the rack?

Will there be no final vindication of the life of idealism or the cause of righteousness? Will the future be simply an increasing and eternal struggle to determine the validity of the two opposing concepts that might makes right or that right makes might?

Is there no umpire in the struggle of life, no ultimate referee? Will there be no final whistle blown to announce the end of the conflict? The very history of mankind cries out for a decision which will be universally pronounced upon what the poet calls "man's inhumanity to man" which he says, "makes countless thousands mourn."

Shall those who have fattened themselves upon their fellows and wallowed in the pens of their own swinish greed have no day of slaughter? Will the books never be closed and no trial balance ever taken? Surely there must be a Judge and a judgment day, else life itself is meaningless, useless and purposeless.

There is another aspect of human existence which we must not overlook. The deep longing to live forever argues that the grave cannot be the end of human destiny. In a hundred subtle ways the concept of the better life beyond intrudes itself into our thinking. It is the source of the purest hope which sustains man in a world which is often filled with problems which defy solution. All of us have had the experience of working late to meet an examination or to complete a project, only to have the solution escape us. We have comforted ourselves with the thought that after a night of sleep we may arise to a new day when the answer may become plain.

We struggle throughout life's day for the real meaning of existence. When we have some of the data of experience collected until we can begin to understand the purpose of life, we find ourselves powerless to hold our eyes open and we drift off into the dreamless slumber called death. Is there to be no awakening to a fairer day when faith can be realized in sight?

Those whose bodies are wracked with pain through a great part of their earthly sojourn, or whose limbs are crippled and distorted so as to defy normal use, sigh for a world where pain is banished and "the crooked will be made straight." Fathers and mothers who see the lives of their children warped by sin and who behold the tragic fruits of excess and immorality pray for a world where sin cannot enter and all that defiles will be debarred. Those who follow the caravans which wend their way to the silent cities of the dead, whose frames shake with sobs and whose cheeks glisten with tears, longingly look for a day when all tears will be wiped away and there will be no more sorrow, separation or death.

There is in most of us a rebellion against the philosophy that the intellect which can probe the secrets of space, discover the power of the atom, and direct the channels of electronic skills, can be rudely extinguished forever by a drunken and irresponsible driver, or by a crazed dope addict with an assassin's blade. Even those who ridicule the thought of a life beyond, find themselves, when really confronted with the death of a loved one, in an inner turmoil which cannot resolve itself by the forced thought of utter oblivion.

A classic example of this fact is found in the case of Robert G. Ingersoll. After years of lecturing against Christianity for a fee, and of scoffing at the Bible and the church, the renowned orator found himself called upon to speak at the funeral of his brother. As he gazed upon the casketed form of one whom he described as "a brave and tender man," his eyes filled with tears he could not hide and finally he bowed his head upon the coffin in uncontrollable grief. It was only after a great struggle for composure that he read the funeral oration which contained the following memorable words:

> Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing.

The star of which the noted infidel spoke is the glimmering light of eternity inherent in the human personality from the beginning; the rustling wing is that of the celestial messenger of hope come to conduct the faithful to a better clime. Victor Hugo said, "The thirst for the infinite proves infinity."

THE FUTILITY OF REASON WITHOUT GOD

There is either a God or there is not. Every nation in history has paid tribute to a belief in deity. This belief has been so predominant as to affect the laws, customs and cultures of the nations. It is a universal belief and it is also one which is as old as the written records of these nations. The earliest of those records affirm that they are but written accounts of tradition alleged to have originated in the beginning.

Such traditions either have a basis of fact or they do not. Man either derived the idea of God from tradition from the beginning, based upon fact; or from the external testimony of nature; or the internal and inherent principles which are a part of the human personality and being— or the idea is the product of his own reasoning.

It is this last upon which the atheist depends for an answer. But if this be true it is evident, according to its advocates, that man's reason has worked a universal deception and cannot be trusted at all. Would one place any confidence in an international counterfeiter who had palmed off his nefarious and worthless creations upon the most learned of all nations?

The idea of God exists. It is as old as mankind. If that idea is purely the result of reason and reason is so deceptive how can the atheist know that he has not been deceived, and that his reasoning has not led him into a blind alley?

We have no intention to derogate reason or its powers, but reason is the means by which we test and measure theories to determine whether they are true and factual. It is admitted by all that human reason is imperfect because no one has all of the data at his command. Is there no perfect Mind in the universe by which reason must be measured?

The Bureau of Standards in our national capitol maintains the perfect ounce as the basis of weights and the perfect inch as the basis of length. There is an observatory which constantly corrects time to offset deviation in official clocks. If one did not know what constituted a straight line he could not identify or designate another as crooked.

We believe that the very nature of reason demands that there be a Mind that is perfect and that where there is science there must somewhere be omniscience as the final arbiter. Jean de La Bruyere said, "The very impossibility in which I find myself to prove that God is not, discloses to me His existence."

God Has Spoken

Contents

We have long been aware that when one accepts the truth that God is, and thus concedes that there is One who is God, he will be led to expect that such a Being will reveal his thoughts and ideals to the rational beings whom he has created. Indeed, one might well believe that a non-communicative God would not be God at all. There are certain aspects of life which rational beings long to know and which could only be ascertained by revelation from an omniscient being. To withhold such information when it could be given would be cruel, and since God could provide the information and it is his nature to be good, it is not presumptuous to expect him to do so.

Laying aside, for the moment, the claim of the sacred scriptures to contain a revelation from God, let us turn to the scientific method of arriving at a knowledge of a fact or truth. This requires that we move from the realm of what could be to the realm of what is or has been. The three steps are those of possibility, probability and certainty. If a thing is deemed impossible because of the nature of the subject this will at once eliminate the other two steps from consideration. This is not the case with probability which is a relative term. The degree of probability will be increased or diminished by certain factors which are so generally recognized that they are actually designated "laws of probability."

To demonstrate that a thing is possible does not argue that it is probable; to prove it is probable does not argue for its certainty. To establish possibility removes it from the realm of the "cannot be" to that of "could be;" to establish probability advances it one more step to "might be." It is still another important step to the domain of "is." Those who begin with the admission of the existence of a personal God will have no difficulty with the question of possibility for it would appear to be a necessary corollary that "with God all things are possible." However, we shall assign the reasons for our personal conviction that it is possible for God to communicate the divine thoughts and will.

All reasoning for the acquisition of knowledge must proceed from the known to the unknown. Whether in mathematics or philosophy we must begin with the recognized factors. Man, as a creation of God has a mind with which to think and the ability to convey his thoughts. It is unthinkable that, in his creation of man with such ability, God exhausted his power. To argue thus would be to contend that God created himself out of existence, and in the process made man a God. He who possesses the whole power of God is God, and if man exhausted the power of the Creator and appropriated it to himself, this would be in contravention of reason which affirms that the creator must be superior to the created and exist before it.

Since God could not bestow a power that he did not have, and since such power could not be exhausted in the process, the fact that man is possessed of the organs and faculties of communication, demonstrates that it is possible for God to convey thought and to communicate his will to other intelligent beings. Although our immediate appeal is not the scriptures, it is not inappropriate just here to point out that they do not oppose the scientific method, but rather endorse it. Thus we have the ancient prophet asking, "He who planted the ear, does he not hear? He who formed the eye, does he not see?" (Psalm 94:9). It may be just as appropriately asked, "He that made the tongue, does he not speak?"

The nature of God and the needs of mankind constitute an argument in favor of the probability of God having spoken to the human family. God has exhibited himself as being kind, benevolent and loving. He is eminently good and has shown this by blessings bestowed upon the human family. He is called God which is but a form of the word "good." He is the Good One. It is a remarkable feature that mankind in primitive simplicity so referred to and described the Creator, and the Creator acknowledged the designation. The earth owes its existence to goodness. In spite of the wisdom and sagacity, the power and might, exhibited in the creation of the material universe, the Creator was not described by a word or words that indicate these. Although possessed of both omnipotence and omniscience, it is said, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." This world was a product of goodness in a pure and untinctured state.

We have previously affirmed that God has provided those things essential to the existence and happiness of man. He created an environment which forms a natural habitat for mankind. He has supplied the means for satisfaction of every urgent desire. Man is capable of curiosity out of which research and investigation grows, and yet he is limited in what he can ascertain through his own powers of study. The primary intellectual urge is to know of his origin and destiny. He cannot go back beyond the first man, he cannot pierce the veil of the future beyond his own death. It is evident that he must receive any information as to these two matters from the Eternal One.

Nothing else challenges man in his thought processes to the extent that his origin and destiny do. One of the first questions of importance asked by the child is, Where did I come from?" Equally important is the query as to where we go when we die. The child is an incipient philosopher for these questions are at the basis of all philosophy. It is not probable that one who was good would withhold from man the information so necessary for well-being and freedom from anxiety, and we must conclude that a benevolent God would without doubt reveal the truth about these things.

The highest form of communication between rational beings is speech. Having suggested that the nature of God and man constitutes an argument in favor of God's having spoken, we now urge that the nature of speech is another such argument. Man is able to speak. He can employ the organs of speech in such a fashion as to convey his thoughts. The act of speaking is a responsive and repetitive process. No man speaks who has not been first spoken to. If one were born under such circumstances as to be immediately secluded from human society he would not be able to speak.

Children speak the language of the family into which they are born. This is so obvious that no one questions that a child born into a family where German is spoken will speak the German language, while one born into a home where French is spoken will speak that language. Since man speaks, it is highly probable that he does so because he was first spoken to. Since the Creator preceded the creation the first man could have heard only his voice.

In conformity with this, Moses records the fact of God speaking before anything is spoken by man, and when man does speak it is in response to God. Every period of creation is introduced with the expression, "And God said," but it is only when we get to Genesis 1:28, when human beings have been created, that we have the expression, "And God said to them." The rest of the creation was governed by instinct, but man as a rational being must be governed by instruction.

The difference between rational and non-rational creation is another basis for contending for the probability that God has spoken. Of all created beings man is most helpless at his entrance into the world. At birth he has no knowledge of life and no power to use any instinct available unto him. He cannot defend himself nor hide from his enemies. He has no protective coloration conformable to his surroundings to conceal him from those who would destroy him. He cannot forage for his own food nor secure his own drink. He possesses no power of locomotion. He cannot discern color. He is born without a thought or a habit. He is dependent for survival upon the interest of other rational beings.

What is true of a human infant in one place is also true of human infants universally. We know it is true of those of three or four generations previous to our own and have no reason to doubt that it has always been true. In view of the need of the human being for the instruction of another interested and rational being in order to survive, it would seem that the first man in the infancy of the race, received such communication as was essential to his well-being from the Creator.

Further, it would appear that a communication given by God to man would be preserved insofar as it was of interest to the whole race. A number of factors may be urged for such a conclusion. We cite but a few of them.

1. Reverence for deity would prompt those to whom God spoke to hold as sacred any word received from him. Certainly if it is the tendency of men to treasure the words of great leaders and enshrine them in permanent memorials they would be even more concerned in guarding the word of God.

2. The generation receiving the communication would manifest every concern for transmitting it to succeeding generations as proof of the existence of God and his direct concern for their fathers. No one to whom God has actually spoken would fail to convey the message to his heirs.

3. The need for guidance from on high would not be limited to one generation and the same consideration which provoked the message originally would continue to demand its repetition. Since God does not do for man what he can do for himself, or what another man may do for him, the communication once given would be continued by men.

4. Divine providence would operate to preserve the oracles of God, for the same power which gave the message originally could act to maintain it, and would do so because of the same need which prompted it in the beginning.

This being true, we should be able to locate a communication purporting to be from God, and bearing such marks as would validate its claims. Is there such material known to us? Every reader will immediately think of the Bible in this connection. Here is a collection of writings designated as "holy scriptures" and demanding the attention of mankind by its claim to be of divine origin. Is the Bible the kind of Book one would expect from God? If we draw up a compilation of requirements which must be met by any volume claiming to originate with Deity, will the Bible meet the criterion thus established?

1. A CENTRAL THEME

It will be agreed by all who believe in the existence of God, that if he intended to personally interrupt the onward flow of human history by a divine breakthrough in which the happiness and well-being of the human race was involved, he would point forward to it prior to its advent, and backward to it after its occurrence. That is, he would prepare mankind in advance for such an event, and ever after relate men to it. The nature of the revelation would be affected by whether it occurred before or after such divine visitation.

This is precisely the design of the Bible. It affirms that in Jesus of Nazareth dwelt all the fulness of Godhood bodily (Colossians 2:9). We use the word "Godhood" in place of "Godhead" as in the King James Version, for the simple reason that the term signifies all that is involved in Deity. Just as "priesthood" encompasses all that is related to the functioning of priests, and "manhood" embraces all that is related to the state or character of being a man, so "Godhood" includes the state or character of being God. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself."

The self-revelation of God would obviously be the median line in history for all revelation from God. The Bible is eminently faithful to this requirement. "God who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son" (Hebrews 1:1, 2). God hath spoken! This is the most important statement ever made. It assumes the existence of God and affirms the communication of his will to men.

Revelation, as to time, is divided into two eras— time past, and these last days. As to agency, it involved the prophets then, and the Son now. As to nature, it was originally in many parts at various times, now it is complete.

The prophets laid the groundwork for the prime event in history. They informed the world in advance of where, when and how the divine-human encounter on a personal level would take place. The first national prophet of the Israelites was Samuel, which accounts for the statement of one of the eyewitnesses of Jesus that, "All the prophets from Samuel and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days" (Acts 3:24). The same witness said upon another occasion, "To him give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins" (Acts 10:43).

The apostles universally pointed men back to the cross as the hope of salvation. "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Corinthians 2:2). "But we preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumblingblock, and unto the Greeks foolishness, but unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God" (1 Corinthians 1:23, 24). In the matter of design the Bible is manifestly the kind of volume which God would produce.

2. ADAPTED TO NEEDS

Again, it would appear obvious that any revelation from God must be adapted to the need of mankind at the time and in the place when given. The nature of the revelation at any given period would thus be defined and affected by the condition of those to whom it was vouchsafed. The world of mankind is composed of individuals and it passes through the same stages as do the individuals. The world has its infancy, childhood, adolescence and maturity. One does not communicate with mature men as he does with children.

The Bible is faithful in this respect. It actually presents the relationship of God to mankind in four dispensations— a patriarchal, a legalistic, a preparatory, and a mature state. In each age the revelation is given just as would be expected under the circumstances then prevailing. Each era becomes a foundation for the one succeeding it. The fact that God has so ordered his revelation has become the occasion for criticism from careless and casual thinkers. These have frequently objected to some things in the old covenant scriptures as childish and puerile, and unworthy of God. But the very word "childish" contains a clue to the reason for these things.

If a grown man stoops down to talk upon a level with his little son, and uses object lessons which appear to be trivial to mature observers, we regard this condescension upon the part of the father as an act of understanding love. If a parent insisted upon trying to teach a two year old child from a textbook on trigonometry and calculus instead of with building blocks we would conclude that such a parent was mentally unbalanced. On the same basis we must not expect God's revelation in the childhood age of the world to be upon the same level as that in these last days.

All learning is done upon an ascending scale, using the knowledge previously gained as a stepping-stone for acquisition of additional information. Consequently all systems of instruction must recognize the need for conveying facts in conformity with this natural law, beginning with the elemental features and progressing to the more complex. As the creator of rational beings, God understands the heart and mind of man and adapts his communication to their nature. The ancients declared, "O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising, thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways" (Psalm 139:1-3).

That God has proceeded according to the universal law of instruction is evident in one passage which censures those who did not progress in knowledge as they should have done. "For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat" (Hebrews 5:12). The original word for "first principles" literally referred to the letters of the alphabet and can be translated as the A, B, C's. In this place it refers to the old covenant scriptures as constituting the elemental revelation from God.

3. UNIFORMITY OF WITNESS

If there are two systems of revelation adapted to the needs of mankind in succeeding ages, both professing to be of divine origin, the latter must consistently recognize and respect the former and defend its authority for the age to which it was given. Any attempt to reflect upon the origin and validity of the previous revelation would result in one of three conclusions: the first was not of divine origin, or, the second was not of divine origin, or neither of the two was of divine origin. God would not undermine his own authority and no revelation given by him would do so.

In this respect the Bible passes the test required of a compilation purporting to come from the same divine author. The system of religion and the scriptures regarded as sacred among the Jews, are both represented as being divine in the new covenant scriptures. Jesus attests to the divine origin of the Jewish system, and every writer in the new covenant scriptures who has occasion to mention the preceding dispensation recognizes the hand of God at work.

In the matter of primacy, Abraham was recognized as the father of the race, and Moses as the lawgiver. In John 8:52-59 is recorded a clever attempt of scribes and lawyers to trick Jesus into a conflict with what was known about Abraham but he resolved the controversy by saying, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad." The implication was quite plain that if Abraham was glad about the coming of Jesus on the basis of the meager testimony available unto him, those who professed to be his children should have been overjoyed when the Lord came.

In Acts 3:12-26, Peter made a speech to a multitude which assembled after a lame beggar, who was a public character, had been made to walk. The speech resulted in the arrest of Peter and John and their incarceration in the common jail. During his remarks the apostle affirmed of his hearers, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed."

In Galatians 3, the apostle Paul actually hinged his masterful argument on justification through faith, upon the authenticity of the old covenant scriptures. "And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed" (verse 8). The same thing is true in Romans 4:3, "For what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness. There can be no question of the attitude of the new covenant writers toward the origin of the promises unto Abraham.

What was true of the father of the patriarchs was equally true of the man who stood at the threshold of the legalistic age. Jesus said, "And as touching the dead that they rise: have ye not read in the book of Moses, how in the bush God spake unto him saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?" (Mark 12:26).

Nothing is clearer than the consistency with which the writers of the new covenant scriptures assign the old covenant scriptures to the power and the implementation of the Holy Spirit. Those scriptures were divided into the law, the psalms, and the prophets, and all of these are ascribed to the instrumentality of the Spirit.

Peter affirms that no prophecy of the old covenant scriptures was the result of mere human interpretation of events or trends. The message did not originate with the messenger. "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of men; but holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21). In harmony with this he asserts that it was the Spirit of Christ in the prophets which "testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow" (1 Peter 1:11).

In Acts 1:16 Peter affirms that a certain scripture had to be fulfilled, having been given by the Holy Spirit through the mouth of David. He then declares, "It is written in the book of Psalms" (verse 20). This is important to notice. It gives the divine agent of revelation— the Holy Spirit; the human agent for transmission— David; the method of revelation— oral speech; the means of preservation— writing. In a few words purely incidental to a narrative we have provided for us the whole scheme of revelation. The fact that it is incidental, and thus undesigned, makes it all the more valuable.

It is hardly necessary to multiply the examples from the new covenant scriptures in which the validity of the old covenant scriptures is asserted and upheld. The reader can seek these out for himself. However, we would like to mention a point of interest which, although it approaches the matter from the negative aspect, is very significant. Critics of the Bible have meticulously investigated every word of both the old and new covenant scriptures. Many of these critics have been prejudiced against the Bible. They have approached their research with pre-conceived notions adverse to the authorship and authority of the Book.

These men have listed any minute discrepancy in testimony, and mistakenly branded it as contradictory. We can be certain that if they could have located one place where they could turn the scriptures against each other it would have been grist for their mill and they would have kept it grinding incessantly. But the old covenant scriptures purport to be a message from God pointing forward to the coming of a new covenant, and the new covenant scriptures purport to be the fulfillment of the old, and affirm over and over again the divinity behind them. The critics are thus forced to use their inventive ability and imaginative quality to make any case at all which will appeal to the credulous reader.

4. WORTHY MOTIVATION

If it is concluded that God created man as a rational being, and that the purpose in doing so was to provide for mutual delight in each other of the creator and the created, it would appear reasonable that any communication directed toward the latter must proceed from a motivation worthy of the creator. Any selfish and unworthy motivation exhibited would lay the communication open to serious question as to its origin. If, upon examination of the scriptures called "sacred" there should appear a trivial and insignificant reason for the message contained in them, our intellects would rebel against acceptance of the information as coming from God. A divine communication should manifest the following characteristics:

1. It must uphold the majesty of the infinite and the splendor of one who is the object of all glory, honor and praise.

2. It must exhibit that grace which is an expression of God's goodness and which enables him to bestow benefits upon those who are undeserving and unworthy. Since we can plead no merit of our own, a communication from God must proceed from that attribute which imputes merit, else the communication would either be impossible or worthless.

3. It must, as we have previously suggested, take into account the nature of man, including his circumstances, needs and ability, and be couched in such language as to convey divine thought in terms that are understandable and comprehensible.

4. It must proceed from such motivation as transcends all other purposes, means and causes, and which is of such nature that all abuse of it by unworthy men can never permanently damage or finally destroy its value. The motivation must be as eternal as God himself.

The highest motive from which intelligent beings may act is love, and the Bible constantly holds out to us that it was this which prompted God's action in behalf of sinful and undeserving mankind. Since the word means so many things and covers so many categories in our day it is well to mention that the love (Greek agape) which motivated God was not mere sentiment or affection. Although no one can define this love, or confine it to mere terms, a working description of it may be, "That active and beneficent good will which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object."

This love is never passive, and once appropriated by a rational being, creates a responsiveness which manifests itself through that person. It thus becomes a dynamic which can truly save the world. John declares that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son" (John 3:16), and again, "By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (1 John 3:16).

Paul declares that it is the one absolute without which nothing else is valid, and while faith, hope and love are abiding principles, the greatest is love. It is twice affirmed by John that "God is love." Any elaboration upon this matter would be simply repetition of that which the earnest student may read for himself in the scriptures, and is not necessary here.

We accept the scriptures as being a revelation from God. They meet the criteria for such a revelation and bear a stamp of their origin in the form of internal evidence upon themselves. It is our conviction that God has spoken to man, revealing or uncovering for man what he could not discover for himself. We regard the Bible as containing that revelation and it is authoritative, not because of its beautiful literary composition, but because it is the word of God.

The Word Made Flesh

Contents

Man is so constituted that he learns best by demonstration. Since God formed him thus it is but natural that he would accommodate his revelation to this trait. We should not be surprised that, in addition to what we may learn of God through creation and verbal revelation, we have His Son sent down to share our lot and allow us to experience a personal relationship with the Father. Jesus said, "And he who sees me sees him who sent me" (John 12:45). Again, he informed the disciples, "If you had known me, you would have known my Father also, henceforth you know him and have seen him" (John 14:7).

One of the most challenging statements ever written was penned by John in these words, "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth; we have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father" (1:14). "The Word became flesh." Who was that word? How did he become flesh? In what sense was he full of grace and truth? To answer these questions is to probe the very secret of eternal life. Let us look at the context of the statement.

"In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." The translators have capitalized the term "Word" indicating that it should be considered as a proper noun. This is not the designation of a mere thing but the name of a personal being. John actually wrote in Greek and he uses the term "Logos." This has been translated by "Word" in our English vernacular. Who was the Logos? That he was with the Father from the beginning and that this extended beyond creation and preceded it is evident. "By him all things were made and without him was not anything made that was made." This certainly implies that the Logos was uncreated and was the agent of all creation.

Among the Greeks the word "logos" did double duty. It was the term for both "reason" and "word." There is a danger that we may, because of our modern connotation of the term, regard reason as a mere process by which we take cognizance of the world about us, and inductively or deductively reach certain conclusions by which we regulate our lives and conduct. There is nothing wrong about this, but it may betray us into placing limitations upon the term which are unjustifiable and which may operate in such fashion as to obscure a greater and more precious perspective. Reason can never be divorced from personality in a conscious being. If it be true that "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he," reason makes the person what he is. It is creative!

Thus, it is more nearly correct to say that reason is power rather than a process. The latter is simply a demonstration of that power in one aspect, the formulation of concepts from perception and observation. We must distinguish between power and its manifestation. Just as each man is what he is because of reason, so God is what He is because of the divine mind. Man is limited by time and space, but God is not. The attempt of modern science to conquer both is really an attempt to become like God. Although many researchists who seek to extend life and penetrate space, deny the existence of Deity, their very efforts are unrecognized attempts to attain the divine.

Those who are in the flesh and are by nature subject to spatial and temporal restraints hardly conceive of the manifestation of personality except by the presence of the body. But this may confuse the person and the form which is simply an adaptation given because of the environment in which the person dwells. And there is ever the tendency to think of God as a man and to restrict Godhood by the chains which bind manhood. Sober thought will convince us of the folly of such rationalization and will free us to recognize that the divine Reason (Logos) may be manifested in two persons, or expressed aspects of Godhood, at the same "time." Deity is not subject to the restraint of time.

It is impossible for man to express his ideas without words. It is even impossible to think without words. The term "embodied" is very appropriate since words are the bodies of which ideas are the soul or spirit. As the body without the spirit is dead so a word devoid of an idea is also dead and powerless. The expression of the divine mind must also be in the word—The Word. But the very being of God is invested in such expression and thus The Word is not merely a vehicle of divine thought but the personification of divine being. The Greek "Logos" is admirably qualified because of its historic and philosophic emphasis to express the message of the Spirit with reference to the Son of God. Time and space, the two forces against which we always struggle, will not permit us here to detail that emphasis. We must trust our readers to accept the wisdom of the spirit in this choice and proceed from there.

"In the beginning was the Word." John is not saying that the Word began with the beginning of the world. Instead he is affirming that when the world began the Word was already present. The Word preceded the creation, thus was uncreated or self-existent. The Word is not a consequence, but a Cause; not a result, but The Source; not a production, but The Author.

"And the Word was with God." This indicates association and intimacy. It reveals a relationship which portrays sharing elevated to its highest degree, sanctified by divine nature. So close was the relationship it was as if God communed with His own mind. Thus we gather that the Word was with God in purpose and intent, in plan and perfection of plan.

"And the Word was God." Students in depth have found this a perplexing statement and many have stumbled over it. Some cultists with special theological axes to grind have taken advantage of a peculiarity in the Greek to warp the passage so as to lend some credence to their own mistaken views. A part of the difficulty lies in the difference between the way Greeks used a noun in a sentence and in the way we use such a special form in modern English. Generally when a Greek employed a noun he preceded it with a definite article. We would expect to find ho theos used here, as theos was the word for God, and ho was the definite article.

But the article was not used in this case. When the article is not employed the noun becomes primarily descriptive. It is apparently the intent of the Spirit to convey the idea that the Word is not identical with God. There is a distinction as to person as shown by the clause immediately preceding, but the Word possesses the same nature, character or essence as God. Whatever was required to constitute Deity was to be found in the Word. The attributes of Godhood were attributable to the Word.

"All things were made by him." To this is added "And without him was nothing made that was made." The universe owes its existence to the Word. He is the divine creative power or energy personified. If it be true that all things, without exception, were brought into being by his agency, it is easily seen that his pre-existence must be admitted, and he is in the realm of the uncreated. This must be accepted by faith. "Through faith we understand that the world was framed by the word of God, so that the things which are seen were not made of things which do appear."

"In him was life and the life was the light of men." The Logos was living. But there is more to it than that. Life is being but it is more than mere being. It is existence but it is more than mere existence. It is more than extension of existence or duration. Eternal life is the life of the Eternal One, and this life was in the logos and it was the light of men. It revealed that which previously was shrouded in mystery. The minds of men were thus free to penetrate the truth of ages because the true light, the real light, had come at last. And the darkness in the universe could not extinguish that light.

Now we come to verse 14. "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth; we have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father." The Logos became flesh. The creative Word who brought all things into being as the very pronouncement of God, the controlling Reason who regulated the universe as the very Mind or Spirit of God, now breaks through the flesh curtain which had separated pure Spirit from the material and thrusts himself into the historic continuity of human existence. This was a concept undreamed of by all of the heathen poets and philosophers.

The word "flesh" cannot be explained away on some higher or more elevated plane than we usually think of it. It is a translation of sarx, the word for our human nature, frail, subject to temptation and desire, "He emptied himself, taking the form of a slave, being born in the likeness of men" (Phil. 2:7, 8). This is almost too staggering for us to grasp or accept when we contemplate its full implication. God was unwilling to dwell aloof or in isolated splendor away from man. The Creator subjected himself to the state of the created. He involved himself directly in our predicament. God stooped down to minister and to save, and by this one act of intervention forever glorified such bending down for such a mission.

This is the basis of the Christian concept. It is not a philosophy, a ritual, a code of laws or a religion. It is a fact, a historical fact. Something happened toward which all of the past had pointed and toward which all of the present still points. The broken threads of human existence were gathered up in a moment, the hopes and ideals of the world were brought into focus. The problems of the ages were summed up and the total was found to be the correct answer.

The Word became flesh and the seed of the woman was born who was to tread upon the head of the serpent and deprive him of his power over those who were all of their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death.

The seed of Abraham arrived through whom all the families of the earth would receive a blessing. "Now the promises were made to Abraham and his seed. It does not say, 'And to seeds,' as if there were many, but rather 'And to your seed,' which is Christ" (Galatians 3:16).

The Shiloh, the great Peacemaker, predicted by the aged Jacob as he prepared to die, entered the world and the gathering of the people unto him began as he had said.

The branch of Judah came forth as a root out of dry ground and the Lion of the tribe of Judah was introduced to the world.

Bethlehem of Ephratah, small and inconsequential, now became a place which the world would never forget.

The land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, once an area viewed with contempt, now were made ready to see a great light where once the people dwelt in darkness (Isaiah 9:1, 2).

It was as if all the rivulets running down the side of the mountain of prophecy now converged into one, and became a mighty flowing tide carrying everything before it.

"The Word was made flesh . . . and we beheld his glory." This places the personal advent of the Word in the flesh where all historical events belong which are to be accepted as fact by succeeding generations, the realm of testimony. Testimony must be furnished by witnesses, and witnesses must present that of which they have direct knowledge through experience. Those of us who live now do not know that Jesus lived upon the earth, but we believe that he did. That belief is based upon testimony.

There are certain criteria which witnesses must meet, and certain rules for admissible evidence, and when the witnesses and the evidence fulfill these requirements, honest men must accept the testimony as factual. To do otherwise would be to reject the only basis upon which we can accept any event as having happened before our day.

We have the testimony of certain persons that Jesus lived on the earth and that he presented to them convincing proof that he was the Son of God. There are enough witnesses to establish the truth related to the fact, for "In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established." A fact is a fact whether there are witnesses or not, but belief in that fact requires witnesses. Though a plurality of witnesses is all that is sufficient to establish a case, the more witnesses there are the stronger the faith may become in the fact.

The witnesses for Christ were qualified for their special task. They were humble tradesmen or simple working men who had no theological philosophy to promote. They were singularly free from all preoccupation with ideas and systems which would require defence, and were capable of receiving the impress of facts. They were alert, observant and quick to respond. They did not speak the language of the schools but they could tell a plain tale of what they saw in language which was forceful by its very simplicity. They were willing to live in, and if necessary, to die for it as proof of that belief.

Moreover, they were trained as witnesses. They were chosen, called and qualified as witnesses. Their task was not to develop or define a systematic theology, but simply to tell of their relationship to a person, and they were constantly with him for well over three years. When one of their number defected and committed suicide they enunciated the qualifications for his successor in these words, "So one of the men who have companied with us during all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John until the day when he was taken up from us— one of these men must become with us a witness to his resurrection" (Acts 1:21, 22).

In Luke 24:48 Jesus told them that they were witnesses of the things which had happened; in Acts 18 he declared, "You shall be my witnesses in all Judea and Samaria and to the end of the earth." In Acts 2:32, they said, "This Jesus God raised up, and of that we all are witnesses," and they repeated it in Acts 3:15. In Acts 10:40 one of them testified that God raised Jesus "on the third day and made him manifest, not to all the people but to us who were chosen by God as witnesses, who ate and drank with him after he rose from the dead."

When an event becomes a matter of testimony one who was not present cannot logically deny the event. In order to do that he would have had to be present and examine the alleged event at the time. After that his only recourse is to deny the testimony. But one cannot do this arbitrarily unless he admits to being deeply prejudiced and inconsistent. He must examine the testimony and reach an unbiased opinion or belief based upon it.

With reference to Jesus it is admitted that there are those who testified to having been with him both before and after his resurrection from the dead. There is a sufficient number of such witnesses to satisfy any impartial court of law. To deny the fact of Jesus one has only three alternatives, but none of these can eliminate an examination of the testimony. He may present proof to show that the character of the witnesses is such as to render their testimony worthless; or he may show that the witnesses were not sufficiently acquainted with the fact to which testimony is given; or he may show that the testimony of the witnesses is contradictory and thus self-invalidating.

1. The character of the witnesses. As stated before, the chosen witnesses were humble and rugged men. They were not taken from the extremely poor nor selected from the rabble. They were engaged in their several occupations and supporting themselves when they were called.

They were accustomed to observe the flow of events around them and were articulate enough to describe what they saw. They were not prejudiced in favor of the resurrection of Jesus but were hard to convince. When they were first apprised of the fact they did not believe it. When Jesus appeared among them "they were startled and frightened and supposed they saw a spirit" (Luke 24:36). It was necessary for him to talk with them and calm them with the words, "See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me, and see; for a spirit has not flesh and bones as you see that I have" (Luke 24:39). In spite of this they still disbelieved and Jesus had to take food and eat it before them.

One of those who was not present at first would not accept the word of the others. He made a positive declaration that he would not accept the fact of the resurrection unless he had personal proof of it. This was no indication of doubting and he has often been maligned as "doubting Thomas." He simply demanded evidence and in such fashion as to remove all question. When confronted by Jesus and invited to thrust his finger into the nail prints in his hands, and his hand into the spear wound in his side he was convinced immediately of the identity of Jesus and of the fact of his resurrection.

Since the testimony of the witnesses is before us it is evident that it must be true or false. Either these things happened or they did not. If they did not happen it is quite obvious that those who said they did were either deceivers or deceived. It can be argued that they were not deceivers from the nature of the testimony.

The one thing a forger or deceiver dreads most is investigation and close scrutiny. For this reason he always writes in generalities and avoids minute details. The more he connects his account with particular persons and places, and with specific dates, times and events, the more liable is he to detection of the fraud which he seeks to perpetrate. This is especially true if his work is to be circulated during the lifetime of those mentioned and in the places to which he refers.

To be meticulous in such documentation would serve to provide the cross-examination with every conceivable advantage. If there were in existence those who opposed the purpose of the narrative all they would need to do to throw suspicion upon it would be to summon those to whom reference was made and prove by them that what was alleged did not transpire, or by showing grave discrepancy between the testimony and the facts of history and geography, to demonstrate that the witness was unfamiliar with time and place, and not to be trusted in other details.

So widely accepted is this that it is said, "Generality is the cloak of fiction." Accordingly, when a writer who purports to give a record of historical fact supplies many details related to time, place and person involved, it is an assumption that he is stating facts and has no fear of scrutiny or examination. This is especially true when it is known that the writing was in general circulation during the lifetime of those mentioned therein. Truth fears no investigation and can provide minute details without hesitancy.

This is the very method employed by the writers who have recorded the facts related to Jesus of Nazareth. Consider, for example, the scrupulous details provided with reference to the forerunner, John the Baptist. We are given the name of his father and mother, the priestly status and course of the former, his occupation at the time when he was given information about the forthcoming birth of his son, and even the spot where the messenger stood while giving the information.

Even more impressive is the documentation relative to the time when John gave his announcement. We are told that it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Caesar, and are supplied the names of the governor of Judea, the tetrarchs of Galilee, Ituraea, and Abilene. For good measure we are also provided with the names of Annas and Caiaphas, who were said to be high priests. This last is most interesting, because at that time, according to history, the Jews recognized Annas as high priest, while the Romans with their occupational forces had deposed him for obduracy, and dealt with his son-in-law, Joseph Caiaphas, in his stead.

As another case in point, consider the account of the raising of Lazarus from the dead. Lazarus is identified by his relationship to two sisters, and one of these is further identified by a public act performed. The name of the village is given, its distance from Jerusalem, and also the name of one who volunteered to accompany Jesus on his mission. The time of death is given as is a description of the grave and the method of closing it. We are told that many Jews were present and told why they had come and what they said and did. In the actual coming forth of Lazarus his condition is described, and the need for those about to release him from his winding-sheet.

The narrative does not stop there. It continues by relating the effect upon the Jewish observers, some of whom believed while others hurried to report the happening to the Pharisees. We are even told that these summoned a meeting of the council, and one of the speakers is named and a record of what he said is preserved. The continuing interest of the Jews in Lazarus is mentioned and the fact that many came to Bethany out of curiosity to see Lazarus, so the chief priests plotted his death because "on account of him many of the Jews were going away believing on Jesus."

In view of the fact that this was written and circulated at the time when many of the people of Bethany, or their children, were still living, and many of the Jews survived, it is obvious that if there were any untruths the entire account would have been discounted and discredited long since. Apparently the writer was not in the least afraid of close study of what he wrote, even by the principals involved.

Another point worthy of consideration is the fact that the writers, even though aware that the nature of the material was startling and extraordinary, made no attempt to convince the readers of the truth of the statements. It is noticeable that when men anticipate doubt and questioning they seek to bolster their message with proof drawn from various sources. But those who wrote about Jesus did so on the basis that what they set down for perusal was generally known and their only purpose was to present a straightforward account so that the facts might be preserved.

Even in dealing with some of the greater miracles there is no effort to explain or account for what would seem inexplicable, no attempt to answer in advance the cavilling and ridicule of skeptics, or to anticipate objections. Indeed the apostolic testimony is as noteworthy for what it omits as for what it included and the restraining hand of the Spirit was as evident as the permissive power. We must not forget that "the fame of Jesus was spread abroad throughout all Syria. . . . And great crowds followed him from Galilee and the Decapolis and Jerusalem and Judea and from beyond Jordan" (Matthew 4:24, 25).

If the writers had been attempting a deception their approach would have been altogether different. They would have presented arguments calculated to reinforce and strengthen their narrative and to make the things they recorded appear plausible. The apostolic witnesses relate the most astounding events in matter-of-fact fashion, assuming they are already generally known and need only to be casually mentioned in order to be called to mind.

We must remember that the enemies of Christ did not even attempt to impeach the character of the witnesses nor did they deny the facts to which they testified. It would seem incredible that twelve men would band together to perpetrate a hoax which would fool the most intelligent people of the earth for twenty long centuries, and yet never be discovered by those who lived at the same time as themselves. Even more astonishing is the fact that all of them were so convinced of the truthfulness of their message that they were willing to die rather than renounce it.

We are aware that such willingness does not establish the truth of a proposition but it does show that those who died for it believed it was true. If it is true that "seldom for a righteous man will one die," it is equally true that "seldom for a right principle will one die," and not at all for what he believes to be a palpable untruth. We do not believe that at this late date the character of the witnesses can be impugned and their testimony discredited upon the basis of their reputation.

2. Acquaintance with the facts. If it can be shown that even though the witnesses were men of veracity, they had no adequate knowledge of that to which they testified this will at least cast doubt upon the validity of that to which testimony is given. A witness must be qualified as well as honest, conversant with the facts as well as upright in demeanor. With reference to the resurrection which established the claims of Jesus to be the Son of God, we have the obligation to enquire if the witnesses had sufficient access to Jesus as to enable them to know without question that he arose from the sepulcher.

Let it be recalled that for one to be ordained as a witness of the resurrection he had to accompany the body of witnesses "all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from among us" (Acts 1:21, 22). Such a person would be so thoroughly acquainted with the person of Jesus that it would be highly unlikely that he would not recognize him, or that he would mistake another for him. He would be able, given proper exposure to his person, positively to identify him when he saw him. The point which immediately concerns us then is whether or not the witnesses were given ample opportunity to observe the one who claimed to have risen from the dead so as to make immediate identification possible.

This would involve the number of appearances before the witnesses, the time and nature of such appearances, and the opportunity provided for scrutiny and observation.

a. Jesus appeared to both men and women. If he had appeared only to the latter it would have been argued that they were emotionally upset by his death and victims of an overwrought imagination.

b. He appeared to individuals and to groups, the largest number being in excess of five hundred.

c. He appeared in a garden, in closed rooms, on the open road, at the seashore, and on a mountain.

d. He appeared at an early morning hour, during the day, as dusk was closing in, and at night.

e. He conversed directly with the witnesses and ate and drank with them.

f. He summoned them by name, identified himself and invited inspection.

g. He referred to his past associations and called attention to communications made prior to his death.

h. He ascended in their presence, and they were confronted by celestial beings who called him by name and predicted his return at a date yet future.

i. He later appeared to Saul of Tarsus who was so convinced of his presence that his entire life was transformed.

Some of these witnessed his death, observed his burial, inspected the tomb after his resurrection and provided a description of what happened in his various appearances. There is no logical way to account for their testimony except upon the basis of fact unless one can prove collusion and deliberate hoax. Such proof will need to be conclusive and must be documented in order to offset what appears to be a straightforward account.

3. The only other alternative is to show that the testimony is of such contradictory nature that the witnesses rebut each other and render what is said incredible. The written account of the witnesses has been available for nineteen centuries and has frequently been under intense attack, yet it has always survived. It must be remembered that, if a number of witnesses testify to a certain fact, the question to be ascertained by their testimony is whether or not they agree in establishing the truth of that fact. That they may arrive at their conclusion from different angles, or that one may add incidentals which another omits, or that the various points of proof do not appear in the same sequence or in chronological order is inconsequential in the final summarization and analysis.

I have examined the testimony of the witnesses and I find no discrepancy which invalidates the conclusion that Jesus is the Christ. All agree that he lived, that he was crucified and that he was raised from the dead. The various accounts of such matters as the inscription on the cross have no bearing upon the fact that one was nailed to that cross, and that he was identified as Jesus of Nazareth. I find no trouble in believing that "the Word was made flesh" or of placing my hope in him. I believe that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah. I believe that he is the Son of God.

The Virgin Birth

Contents

In simple trusting faith I accept the accounts of the virgin birth of Jesus as factual. There is nothing within my rational constitution which recoils from the thought that he was begotten in Mary by the Holy Spirit and born of her body in so far as the flesh was concerned. I do not find myself inclined to speculate about how this could be or how it was accomplished, nor do I feel obligated to account for the means in order to accept it. When men talk about the impossibility of accepting this intellectually, they speak of a type of intellect which I do not possess.

I see no reason for training my feeble intellectual powers to be skeptical of everything they cannot immediately grasp or fully explain. Intellect need not be opposed to faith and it is dangerous to regard it as being so. On this basis some have even come to doubt their own existence or the reality of the world in which we are placed. My faith does not preclude my intellect in that area where it operates. It is a function of that intellect making possible its outreach into unexplored vistas, and even into regions which cannot be analyzed because of human limitations. I do not hamper or cripple my intellectual powers by proceeding upon the basis of faith. Instead, I enhance them.

It is argued that the virgin birth is contrary to our scientific findings and must be rejected either because it cannot be subjected to scientific criteria, or because it contradicts all that is known as a result of the application of such criteria.

Actually this is based upon a presupposition as I shall show in my next chapter, and I simply do not acknowledge the validity of that presupposition. To say that our advanced "scientific knowledge" will not allow us to accept a thing is to speak unscientifically. Science is knowledge. The word is from the Latin scientia, to know. As we employ it, the term denotes knowledge according to system, or knowledge properly classified.

Science embraces the branches of knowledge of which the subject is ultimate principles, or facts as explained by principles, or laws arranged in natural order. To talk of "scientific knowledge" is the equivalent of saying "knowledge knowledge." It is obvious that man has not exhausted the field of knowledge, or all experimentation would immediately cease. Therefore, there are areas to which knowledge does not extend. Anything within those areas, or in areas outside the realm of investigative procedures used by science, would be in the domain of imagination, speculation or faith. About such things science could only theorize.

The individual who accepts the idea of a divine being upon what appears to him to be valid evidence of the existence of such a being, and who further accepts the idea that this being has revealed his thoughts will act upon faith with regard to the matters covered in that revelation. Another who rejects either the idea of a divine Being, or a revelation, or both, will proceed upon the basis of speculation, theory or opinion in reference to such matters. This is not the same as saying that science is opposed to faith. The most that can be said is that the scientist, acting upon the basis of previously accumulated data, doubts the possibility of the virgin birth. This points up two important factors. One is the limitations of science which makes it impossible for science to dogmatically deny that which is accepted upon faith. The other is that those things which lie within the scope of the divine are not subject to the scientific experimental process. To argue against the possibility of the virgin birth is to reduce it to the domain of the natural. If supernatural power operates in such a situation it is not impossible at all. To doubt the virgin birth is really to deny the possibility of supernatural power in the universe.

The birth of Jesus has always been a problem to those who view the universe from a purely natural standpoint. Certainly the one person who would be most concerned about the virgin birth would be the virgin selected to bear the child. The one who would be most skeptical would be the man to whom she was engaged. And in the individual encounter of the divine messenger with these two we find all of the questions, but we also find the answers!

The angel first sought to quiet the fears of Mary and then said, "You will conceive in your womb and bear a son, and you shall call his name Jesus." The natural question was, "How can this be, since I have no husband?" In her simplicity Mary was fully aware of the impossibility of pregnancy without impregnation. The answer of the angel was, "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you." Then came these words, "For with God nothing is impossible."

This forever placed the matter in proper perspective. The question after centuries have gone by, is still, "How can this be?" Some have denied absolutely that it could be, some have tried by devious means to supply a man in order to make it rational. One of the most frequently quoted statements in our day is that of a theologian who writes, "The birth stories, are to be sure, most improbable . . . for this reason, the simplest thing to believe may be that Joseph was the natural father of Jesus." He concludes that if this is not the case, "Jesus must have been the child of a German soldier. After all the claim develops, such is the experience of many girls near military camps."

As to Joseph, the record is quite clear. We are told, "Now the birth of Jesus Christ took place in this way. When his mother Mary had been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together she was found to be with child of the Holy Spirit; and her husband Joseph, being a just man and unwilling to put her to shame, resolved to divorce her quietly. But as he considered this, behold, an angel of the Lord appeared to him in a dream, saying, 'Joseph, son of David, do not fear to take Mary your wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit.'" Thus the two persons most vitally concerned in the event were satisfied with the divine explanation.

MYTHICAL ACCOUNTS

In recent times those who would deny the truth of the record of the virgin birth of Jesus, have sought to strengthen their case by affirming that many religions of the world outside of Christianity, have their traditions of a virgin birth, and the history of most primitive peoples is replete with mythical accounts of the union of gods and mortals. The implication is that the narrative contained in the new covenant scriptures also constitutes the folklore by which a simple and superstitious peasantry sought to give meaning to their belief.

There are some facts which should not be overlooked, however, by those who are concerned with arrival at truth. The first is that many of the myths contain within themselves the grounds of their own refutation. A close examination will show that a great number are not actually related to virgins at all.

One of the frequently cited cases is that of Romulus and Remus, reputed to be the sons of Mars, god of war, and Rhea Silvia, a Vestal Virgin. If these legendary twins ever existed, they were conceived in illicit intercourse, and the legend takes note of this by recounting that they were thrown into the river Tiber because of their mother's sinful alliance. To compare this with the incarnation in the gospel records appears somewhat ridiculous.

The nature of the so-called "miracle births" in mythology is enough to prove that there is nothing divine involved in them, but that they were inventions of depraved human imagination. Every form of sexual deviation is connected with them, and many of the stories reek with licentiousness, animalism, and effeminacy. Frequently they are couched in language descriptive of brutal and insensate orgies, and invest the gods with every type and kind of human debauchery.

It was characteristic of many rulers greedy of power to claim affinity with the gods and thus enhance their ability to prey upon the ignorant and superstitious masses. Apollo seems to have been a popular claimant as a sire, with Pythagoras, Plato and the Roman emperor Augustus, all alleging him as father. Alexander the Great propagated the opinion that he was begotten of a god who approached his mother in the form of a serpent, although more accurate history makes him the son of Philip of Macedon, and of Olympias, a princess of Epirus, and places his birthplace at Pella, the capital of ancient Macedonia.

It is worth noting that in all of the myths the purpose of "miraculous births" was to exalt men to the stature of gods, while in the gospel records the incarnation was to empty one of equality with God to take upon himself the form of a slave, made in the likeness of men. Before Alexander died he ordered the Greek cities to worship him as a god, but proved he was a man by dying. Jesus proved that he was a man by dying, and the Son of God by the resurrection.

It appeals to me as a matter of common sense that, in the final analysis, the validity of the scriptural account of the conception and birth of Jesus, cannot possibly be affected by recounting the "miracle birth" stories of myths and legends. One who is prejudiced against acceptance of the virgin birth may seek to find comfort for his antagonism by citing the similarities, remote in nature as they are, but this proves nothing pro or con about the factuality of the birth of Jesus. There is hardly a facet of authentic history that has not been duplicated either before or after the event, by fanciful myth.

But the historicity of an event cannot be invalidated by the citing of legendary similarities. The myths serve only to prove the scope of human imaginative powers. The science fiction writers two generations ago were producing such wild tales of the conquest of space that children were forbidden to read their far-out speculations. Now their grandchildren watch on television the launching into orbit of vehicles which make the stories of yesteryear laughable because of their simplicity.

That Jesus of Nazareth lived on earth is an established fact. The circumstances of his advent were carefully and meticulously investigated by a physician, who interrogated the eyewitnesses, and who then set down his findings and addressed them to a Greek political ruler. Many who lived in the century following the birth of Jesus accepted without question the testimony as given. That testimony is either true or false. But the truth or falsity of it can never be affected by any imaginative or speculative accounts preceding it, regardless of any apparent likeness.

No act of history or fact of testimony can ever be proven false by the mere citation of multiplied cases known to be spurious. Doubt may be cast upon all by association, but doubt in itself disproves nothing. It serves to show the lack of logic upon the part of one who confuses doubt with proof, when doubt itself exists because of lack of proof, or because of lack of study or examination of existing proof.

THE PROPHECY OF ISAIAH

At this juncture we come to the place where we must note a prophecy concerning the birth of Jesus as recorded in Isaiah

7:14. Honesty and candor in interpretation force us to study this in spite of the fact that we may differ with many scholars whom we greatly love and respect. We could simply ignore the passage and make no reference to it and thereby escape the wrath of some and the misunderstanding of others, but this appears to be unfair. We will risk any repercussion.

The King James Version reads, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." The Revised Standard Version reads, "Behold, a young woman shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel." This version has a footnote reading, "or virgin."

I concur with the Revised Standard Version rendering. This is not because I do not believe in the virgin birth of Jesus, but because I do. I believe that the birth of Jesus was absolutely unique. He was the only person in the history of the world who was born of a virgin.

To me, it seems quite clear that the prophecy of Isaiah has a two-fold application, as is true of so many old covenant prophecies. It has both a primary and a secondary application. The primary application was to be immediate. It was to happen shortly after the utterance of the prophecy. The secondary application was remote and in the future. It was to take place after many centuries had passed.

To shorten our approach to the matter, let me state that I believe that the son to whom direct reference was made was Isaiah's own son, Maher-shalal-hash-baz. He was not born of a virgin. The secondary application was to Jesus. He was unquestionably born of a virgin. We only ask for an impartial and unbiased examination of the scriptures directly related to both births. We crave your patience while we first investigate with you the information furnished in chapters 7 and 8 of Isaiah. If nothing else is accomplished we will share in a good lesson in Bible history.

The contextual background for this lesson goes back several hundreds of years prior to the time of Isaiah. The people of God had divided into two kingdoms during the reign of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon in 975 B. C. Ten tribes revolted and set up the kingdom of Israel, later establishing their capital at Samaria. Since this was in the tribal inheritance of Ephraim the kingdom was frequently referred to as Ephraim. The remaining two tribes of Judah and Benjamin maintained their capital at Jerusalem. Their kings continued in an unbroken line from David of the tribe of Judah.

In 759 B. C. Pekahiah was completing a two year reign over Israel in Samaria. One of his captains, Pekah the son of Remaliah, conspired against him with a band of more than fifty men from Gilead, and assassinated him in the royal palace, and after this military coup Pekah installed himself as king.

In the seventeenth year of the reign of Pekah, in 742 B. C., Jotham the king of Judah died and was succeeded by his twenty-year old son Ahaz. Isaiah was living at the time and was active as a prophet in Jerusalem. The kingdom of Syria, which joined Israel on the north, with its capital at Damascus, was governed by Rezin.

As soon as the young Ahaz came to the throne of Judah, Rezin the king of Syria and Pekah the king of Israel, entered into a plot to besiege Jerusalem and destroy the dynasty of David and install a foreigner, the son of Tabeal, in place of Ahaz. They reckoned without the fact that God had made a covenant with David that he would never lack a descendant to sit upon his throne. But as soon as the news reached the palace in Jerusalem that the kings of Israel and Syria were preparing to march against the city, Ahaz and his advisors were so frightened that they literally quaked.

At this time Isaiah had one son, whose name was Shear-jashub. God told Isaiah to take his son and go up to meet Ahaz and reassure him. The very name of his son was a sign of God's protective care, and that name had been purposely given. It meant, "The remnant shall return." Shear-jashub had been so named to comfort Judah with the thought that they would not be exterminated.

Ahaz was inspecting the water supply of Jerusalem, probably in preparation for an anticipated siege, and Isaiah and his son met the king at the conduit of the upper pool along the Fuller's Field highway. Isaiah informed Ahaz that he should remain calm and not be scared of "the two tails of these smoking fire-brands." This designation of Rezin and Pekah indicated that they were but two flaming sticks and that God could easily extinguish them. Isaiah pointed out that they would not succeed in overthrowing Ahaz because he was protected by the promise to David and God had revealed concerning the prophecy, "It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass."

The prophet went on to predict that Damascus and Syria would be rendered helpless and that within a period of sixty-five years the ten tribe kingdom would be destroyed until it could no longer even be counted as a people. Apparently the young king was too frightened to trust in this prediction, because Isaiah said, "Do you not believe? It is because you are not stable," that is established in and trusting the promises of God. In order to produce faith God requested Ahaz to ask for a sign that Isaiah was indeed conveying a divine message.

Isaiah said to the king, "Ask a sign of the Lord your God; let it be deep as Sheol or high as heaven." This simply meant that Ahaz was free to request any phenomenon which could be demonstrated in the created universe. He could ask for divine assurance through any kind of a sign which would indicate God's faithfulness to His covenant promises.

But Ahaz, who had been worshiping heathen gods and burning incense unto them in the high places, suddenly turned very devout and replied, "I will not ask, and I will not put the Lord to the test." And the prophet said, "Hear then, O house of David. Is it too little for you to weary men, that you worry my God also?" Ahaz had refused to listen to the counsel of Isaiah and his son, and now he stubbornly refused to ask a sign of God to confirm the promise that the king of Syria and the king of Israel would be destroyed and the theocracy would continue to govern through the house of David.

Then the prophet uttered the prediction with which we are especially concerned. "Even though you refuse to ask for a sign, the Lord himself will give you a sign. Behold, a young woman shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel . . . For before the child knows how to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land before whose two kings you are in dread will be deserted."

I submit that this sign to Ahaz that God will destroy the two kings who were a threat to Jerusalem is as plain as language can make it. A young woman would conceive a son who was to be a sign to Ahaz and Judah, and before that child reached the age of accountability the enemy lands were to be divested of their kings. In spite of the plainness of the passage many have been so conditioned by their previous teaching that they will not be able to see it without meticulous explanation. We ask the indulgence of our readers as we make a detailed exegesis.

1. This sign was given to Ahaz at a time of apparent crisis. It was to prove to him that God would not allow the seed of David to be displaced or replaced by a usurper, like the son of Tabeal. The sign was given to Ahaz for it was he who refused to request a sign. It had to be something that he could see in his day, else it would not have been a sign to him as promised.

2. A young woman would conceive and bear a son who would be a sign to God's people that God was with Judah and Jerusalem and that the conspirators against them would not succeed. His name was to be called Immanuel, which means "God with us," that is with the house of David, as opposed to Israel and Syria. This was in accord with the promise which God made to David, "I will raise up your offspring after you, one of your own sons, and I will establish his kingdom . . . I will be his father, and he shall be my son . . . I will confirm him in my house and in my kingdom forever and his throne will be established forever." What was to happen to the conspirators within the period of infancy of one child would be proof that God was not slack concerning his promise!

3. Concerning the child it was said, "He shall eat curds and honey when he knows how to refuse the evil and choose the good." Curds and honey were eaten in time of peace and plenty. God spoke of Canaan as a land that flowed with curds and honey when he wanted to illustrate the wealth and productivity of it. But at the time Isaiah made this prediction Rezin and Pekah were marching toward Jerusalem to lay siege to the city. Ahaz was frightened at the thought of the coming calamity, but the prophet declares that instead of privation, starvation and hardship, a child conceived at that time would eat the very best of foods by the time he reached the age of accountability.

Nothing could be more indicative of the coming failure of Rezin and Pekah than to predict that the inhabitants of Jerusalem would be feasting on the richest diet in the next several years in spite of their attempted siege.

4. Ahaz was informed that before the time when the son borne by the young woman was at the age of discretion, "the land before whose two kings you are in dread will be deserted." A child conceived in 742 B. C. would not be born until nine months later, or about 741. In 2 Kings 16:5 we learn that the siege against Jerusalem in 742 B. C. was unsuccessful. In 740 B. C. (when the child would be about a year old, Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria captured Damascus, carried the people into exile and killed Rezin. The next year, 739 B. C., Hoshea made a conspiracy against Pekah and killed him in Samaria. At this time the child would be about two years old. The two smoking tails of firebrands were to be extinguished before the child was able to choose the good and refuse the evil.

Even before Pekah died Tiglath-pileser swooped down upon Israel and carried away the inhabitants of a great part of it including Gilead, Galilee and Naphtali. You may read of this in 2 Kings 15:29. The two kings were gone and the land deserted before the child was much more than two years old.

5. We must remember that Isaiah also predicted the breaking of Ephraim so the kingdom could no longer be called a people. After Hoshea assassinated Pekah he reigned six years before Shalmaneser, then king of Assyria, tired of his rebellion against the imposed tribute, came up and laid siege to Samaria. The siege lasted three years until 721 B. C. when the city fell and Israel was carried into exile because of their idolatry.

IDENTITY OF THE CHILD

Now we come to the most interesting part of our narrative — the identity of the young woman and the son who was given as a sign to Ahaz and Judah. We believe that the context shows that the young woman was the prophetess, that is, the wife of Isaiah and that the son whom she conceived and bore as a sign was Maher-shalal-hash-baz, the second son of Isaiah.

In order to guarantee that this sign would be understood by future generations as well as the one then in existence, Isaiah was instructed to take a scroll and write in it, using common letters that could be understood by all, "Testimony concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz." This name means "The spoil speeds; the prey hastes" (Isaiah 8:1). The indication was that God would speedily spoil the conspirators and haste to make them a prey to divine vengeance.

After penning this testimony Isaiah called two witnesses to attest it with their signatures, so it could be proven in the mouth of these two that the testimony was written before the child was conceived. After the testimony was duly certified Isaiah went in unto the prophetess, his wife, and she conceived and bore a son, exactly as it had been foretold to Ahaz. When the child arrived the Lord told Isaiah to call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "for before the child shall have knowledge to cry, My father, and my mother, the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria shall be taken away before the king of Assyria." We have already learned that the child was not over a year old when Tiglath-pileser despoiled both territories.

But what about the name Immanuel? It was distinctly said that the young woman who conceived and bore the child shall call his name "Immanuel." The answer lies in the fact that this was a prophetic term used because of its meaning. The literal name of the child was Maher-shalal-hash-baz, but he was called "Immanuel" because his birth was a sign that God was with Judah and the house of David. Later the same could be said about Jesus. Although he was referred to as "Immanuel" his literal name was Jesus, but his advent signified that God was with mankind in a new and unique way.

Let us see if this can be substantiated with reference to the first child. It is significant that the word "Immanuel" occurs in the King James Version only twice as a proper name. Once is in Isaiah 7:14 where the name was to be given to the son borne by the young woman, and the other is in the same context, in Isaiah 8:8, in the chapter dealing with the birth of Maher-shalal-hash-baz. But it also occurs in the same chapter in its translated form. The first occurrence (8:8) is one of the most interesting in the word of God.

In 8:5 the Lord tells Isaiah that the people of Israel had refused the waters of Siloam that flowed gently and rejoiced in Rezin and Pekah, who were firebrands and revolutionaries.

Siloam was a small stream and pool which helped Jerusalem to survive by furnishing water for the inhabitants. But the people of the northern kingdom had turned away from the city where God had written His name and now placed their trust in men.

"Now therefore, behold the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river, strong and many, even the king of Assyria and all his glory." The waters of the Euphrates were wide and turbulent, and unlike the water of Siloam. Since the ten tribes had shown a preference for such turbulence God promised them that he would send the fierce nation from the region of the Euphrates and the army would be like a river at flood stage. "He shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks, and he shall pass through Judah; he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even unto the neck."

All of this came to pass and the armies of the Assyrians inundated the land of Syria and the land of Israel, and flowed over into the land of Judah. There they were halted by the direct action of God and returned to their banks. The land of Judah is referred to as that of Immanuel in verse 8. God was with Judah but he was not with her attackers.

In verses 9 and 10 the conspiring nations are challenged to associate together, far countries are urged and challenged to gird for battle, and all are told to counsel together, but still it would come to nought. "Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear all of ye far countries: gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces. Take counsel and it shall not stand: for God is with us (Immanuel)." This coincides with the promise to Ahaz about the conspiracy, "Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass" (7:7).

What did Isaiah do with the scroll, or testimony which he had written? He was told to "Bind up the testimony, seal the teaching among my disciples" (8:16). This meant that in the presence of those who had been taught concerning God's purpose as demonstrated in the son born to the young woman, he was to roll up the evidence which had been signed by Uriah and Zechariah, and he was to place a seal upon it.

Isaiah then declared, "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord has given me are for signs and portents in Israel from the Lord of hosts who dwells on Mount Zion" (8:18). The children whom God had given Isaiah were Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz. When Isaiah was sent to reassure the frightened Ahaz he was told to take his first son with him. The very name of this lad should have strengthened the king, but when he doubted, another son was promised who would be a definite sign from the Lord. "Therefore the Lord himself shall give you (Ahaz) a sign; Behold, a young woman shall conceive and bear a son, and his very name will mean that God is with us."

God promised a son as a sign to Ahaz and Judah. After Isaiah had carefully inscribed a roll with this information he went in unto his wife and she conceived and bore a son. Isaiah then positively declared that he and the children which God gave him were signs and portents in Israel. We fail to see how it could be made any plainer that the son of the prophet was the sign given to Ahaz and Jerusalem.

What purpose was to be achieved by preservation of the sealed and attested witness concerning the son who had been promised and the destruction of Syria and Samaria before the child came to the age of discretion? The answer is plainly given. It was to be a constant reminder in time of national danger to rely upon the Lord instead of upon other advisers and counsellors. The common tendency of people when rumors of attack were rife was to consult spirit mediums or necromancers and seek to learn from the spirit world what was going to happen. Instead, Israel was to turn to the sealed teaching and testimony as a sign that God would not desert Judah.

"And when they say to you, 'Consult the mediums and the wizards who chirp and mutter,' should not a people consult their God? Should they consult the dead on behalf of the living? To the teaching and to the testimony! If they do not speak in harmony with this message it is because they are unenlightened" (Isaiah 8:19, 20). The context plainly shows that the teaching and testimony consisted of the scroll relating to the birth of the second son of Isaiah.

We do not believe that the young woman who conceived and bore the son who was to be a sign to Ahaz was a virgin. She was the wife of the prophet and had already borne one son, Shear-jashub, who was a sign and portent to the house of Jacob.

A great many students have been betrayed, by their zeal to defend the virgin birth of Jesus, into adopting an interpretation which will make for two virgin births, and thus destroy the uniqueness of the birth of Jesus. All of these overlook one prime factor. In the case of Jesus, the nature of the birth was essential to establishing his deity and thus of fulfilling God's purpose.

But in the case of the sign given to reassure Ahaz, the nature of the birth had little to do with the reason. The question concerned the time element involved in destroying two kings who were plotting to overthrow Ahaz and set up a usurper in Jerusalem. The sign was not how a child was to be conceived and born, but the fact that a child conceived at that time would eat the bread of peace and prosperity rather than the scraps of siege and famine, and that by the time the child would attain the age of discretion the hated land would be forsaken of both her kings.

In the sign which God promised directly to Ahaz miraculous conception and a virgin birth were not requisite to the divine purpose at all. The manner of conception was not the issue but the swift and speedy vengeance of God upon cruel conspirators before a child grew out of its infancy.

I am firm in my conviction that Jesus was born of a virgin and was the only person in all human history to be so born. There were not two virgin births, one in the days of Ahaz and another in the days of Herod the Great. I would believe in the virgin birth of Jesus if Isaiah had never lived or written. Unfortunately, a great many who are so influenced by tradition and emotion that they have not taken the time or trouble to investigate in depth, rush to the defence of the language of a prophetic statement and hinge their whole theory of inspiration upon a single English word used to translate a Hebrew original. It is thought that this is being true to God in defence of the virgin birth.

In reality this is probably an exhibition of lack of faith. To chain God to a translation in the days of Isaiah and deny that He has a right to make another application of His language or to infuse the body of prophecy with a secondary and greater application does not commend itself to me personally as being a demonstration of faith in either the power of God or the wisdom of God.

I happen to believe that the same Spirit which spoke through Isaiah also spoke through Matthew and Luke. I do not doubt the ability of God nor question His right to take any message that He has ever delivered and invest it with new meaning to accomplish His purpose. It can be proven beyond doubt that this procedure was actually followed with most of the prophecies which came to be applied to Jesus. Many of these had an original and limited application, but were given a new and broader application when referred to Jesus. We cannot refer to all of them but we will suggest a few.

1. Matthew says that Joseph, Mary and Jesus, remained in Egypt until the death of Herod that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet saying, "Out of Egypt have I called my son" (Matthew 2:15). This is a quotation from Hosea 11:1 which directly related to the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage. No one who read this prophecy in the days of Hosea would ever dream that it was even remotely related to bringing Jesus back into the land of Palestine to reside in Nazareth. We would never have made this secondary application without the explanation as given by Matthew.

2. When Herod sent and slew the children in Bethlehem, Matthew writes, "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremiah the prophet, saying, In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they are not" (Matthew 2:17, 18). Actually, Jeremiah originally had no reference to the slaughter of the innocents.

Ramah was the headquarters in Palestine for the king of Babylon. There he assembled the exiles for deportation to a foreign land beyond the Euphrates. The lamentation and bitter weeping of these displaced persons reminded the prophet of the sorrow of Rachel who died in childbirth and was buried along the road near Bethlehem, after giving birth to her second son whom she called Benoni, "son of my sorrow." When the children were slain at Bethlehem the wails were so loud it was as if they could be heard in Ramah, and as if Rachel were once again screaming in anguish for her loved ones.

3. Again Matthew declares that Jesus lived in a city called Nazareth, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene." Of course this expression is not found in our old covenant scriptures, although Matthew says it was spoken by the prophets (plural). The word Nazareth is from the same Hebrew root as the word for "branch" and the allusion here is to the words of Isaiah (11:1); Jeremiah (23:5); and Zechariah (3:8), etc.

4. When David prepared to build the temple and was restrained from doing so by Nathan, he was told that God would raise up his seed, and "he shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son" (1 Chronicles 17:12, 13). David summoned Solomon and directly applied this prediction unto him (1 Chronicles 22:9, 10). Yet Peter said on Pentecost, "Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, he seeing this before spoke of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption" (Acts 2:30, 31).

5. Of just as much interest is an application made in Hebrews 2:13 of the words of Isaiah about his sons, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz. Isaiah said, "Behold I and the children which God hath given me are for signs and portents." The writer of the Hebrew letter drops the latter part of the sentence and makes the remainder applicable to Jesus and the saints. "Behold I and the children which God hath given me."

The higher critic will point to these places as indications of the arbitrary manipulation of scripture in order to justify a theory or bolster a supposition. But it must not be forgotten that the critics also frequently have a presupposition which they seek to establish and they are not above assigning motives to Biblical writers without proper grounds for so doing.

To one who believes in divine prescience and recognizes the right of Cod to interpret revelation, as I do, no problem is presented at all. The simplest statement may have a deeper meaning than man could ever imagine and God can reveal that deeper meaning as well as the original message. I refuse to limit the meaning God attaches to a statement by my understanding of it.

The real problem with the virgin birth has never been the virgin birth at all. Rather it has to do with the nature of the God in whom one believes. If one recognizes God as omnipotent and omniscient as I do, the virgin birth presents no difficulties. Nothing is impossible to the God whom I serve. As the author of all life and the ruler of all nature he can bring human life into existence by any means commensurate with his purpose. I believe that he has done so by four different means: direct creation from elements previously created; from a part removed from a human body by divine surgery; by natural reproduction; and by impregnation of a human ovum through agency of the Holy Spirit. I think that a great many in our day who rebel against the thought of the virgin birth because of what they term "the intellectual barrier," do not stop to analyze the relationship of their doubt to either the antecedents or consequences. The only way by which a divine personage could enter the realm of humanity and actually partake of human flesh would be by a miracle. If the fulness of deity was to dwell bodily in Jesus he could not be simply a product of a natural procreative process. If he had both a human father and a human mother he was no more the Son of God than any other person. The divine Sonship is clearly predicated upon divine begetting. "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Almighty will overshadow you, therefore the holy thing which is begotten shall be called the Son of God" (Luke 1:35).

It will be obvious, I think, that the views which we have expressed indicate that as respects the virgin birth, at least, we concur with the rendering of the Revised Standard Version. Because of the prominence of the attacks made upon this particular version on the very point at issue in this thesis, there needs to be some clarification.

I have no favorite version. I use a great many of them, and one of my favorite methods of study is to open up a number of versions to the same passage and examine them all. I am not at all interested in defending one version against another but I am solely concerned with an unprejudiced attempt to arrive at the truth revealed by God. There are some weak spots apparent in all of the translations which it is hoped may be corrected in future attempts at revision.

We believe that the context of Isaiah 7:14, coupled with the announced purpose of the sign to Ahaz favors the rendering "a young woman." We believed that way before the Revised Standard Version was published. We honor the translators for the footnote reading, "Or virgin." No doubt this was added because, in spite of the context, it must be admitted that the Hebrew almah, used seven times in the scriptures, generally implies a virgin.

Too, the Septuagint Version with which the translators were quite familiar, used the Greek word parthenos in Isaiah 7:14. But it is significant that in every instance in the new covenant scriptures where the birth of Christ is unmistakably under consideration, the Revised Standard Version is true to the idea of a virgin birth.

"When his mother Mary had been betrothed to Joseph, before they came together she was found to be with child by the Holy Spirit" (Matthew 1:18).

"All this took place to fulfil what the Lord had spoken by the prophet, Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and his name shall be called Emmanuel" (Matthew 1:22, 23).

"When Joseph woke from sleep, he did as the angel of the Lord commanded him; he took his wife, but knew her not until she had borne a son; and he called his name Jesus" (Matthew 1:24).

"In the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God to a city of Galilee named Nazareth, to a virgin betrothed to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary" (Luke 1:26, 27).

With these plain quotations before us, for one to affirm that the Revised Standard Version denies the virgin birth is a demonstration of rather audacious ignorance or of a wilful intent to deceive. Surely those who make such claims must rely upon the hope that those who listen to them will never read for themselves. And they may be right!

While I am not a particular defender of this version of the scriptures as opposed to others I must confess that I have never found it in any sense prejudiced against the virgin birth of Jesus Christ. Instead, it upholds that teaching without doubt or quibble. I agree with its translation, both in the original prophecy and in the application as made to Jesus.

The direct connection between the prophecy of Isaiah and the birth of Jesus is easily understandable. Isaiah was to give a sign to Ahaz in a time of crisis that God was with the family of David and would not permit his kingly covenant to be abrogated by the designs of men. Jesus was the natural inheritor of David's throne and was destined to sit upon it as an heir of David, so a prophecy related to the preservation of that throne was applicable to Jesus who was proof from heaven that God was with us.

I have read a great many books by those who would cast doubt on the possibility of the virgin birth. I have earnestly sought to understand their position and motivation. But each time I have returned and read the scriptural account once more, and the more I read it the more steadfast does my faith become. I accept the virgin birth of Jesus as a fact and reality and it is very precious unto me. I am grateful that when He decided to visit us and share our lot that He passed through every phase of our personal experience, embryonic, foetal, and otherwise. I am thrilled that, as a babe, he entered the world as I entered it, gasping for that first precious breath of air that spelled life on our planet.

And I am pleased that he was a firstborn son and that his tiny body caught up in the convulsions and throes of the expulsion process called delivery, paved the way for the sons and daughters of Joseph who followed. I accept the truth that the mother who bore him knew the ecstasy of divine union before she experienced the paroxysm of physical and sensual orgasm. I acknowledge the validity of the virgin birth and I believe in the one who entered our sinful world through this medium. To me he is the Son of God, and my blessed Savior. I love him with simple, trusting faith!

The Case For Miracles

Contents

Did Jesus of Nazareth once feed a throng of five thousand men, besides women and children by direct multiplication of five loaves and two fish? Did he later repeat the action with four thousand men plus women and children? Did he calm the waves of the Sea of Galilee with a spoken word? Did he raise the daughter of Jairus, the young man of Nain, and Lazarus of Bethany, from the dead?

Are these legends which grew up as men told about his activities? Is the language employed in the realm of myth? Must we strip it off and seek for the kernel of fact hidden within it?

In simple trusting faith I accept the accounts as historical and factual. I am quite content to discuss them as genuine miracles. Miracles have to do with demonstrations of power and the God whom I serve is unlimited in power. That is why the word "miracles" is used for our benefit. There are no miracles with God for what appears supernatural to us is merely natural to Him. There can be no power above or beyond the source of all power. Nothing is "super" to one who is over all. But since the terms related to miracles are employed for our benefit perhaps we should seek to understand those terms for by doing so we can learn something of the nature of miracles.

The first word we shall note is "wonders." This has to do with the effect of the miracle upon the beholder. The act performed is strange and excites amazement. Here the effect is put for the cause and the act is termed a wonder, although it should be remarked that the original is always translated in the plural. The astonishment betokens both the nature of the act and the limitations of the one so affected. Certainly the arousing of amazement is not the chief aim, perhaps not even a lesser aim, of the miracle but it can be used to testify of the nature of the act. It provides another way by which God's strength is exhibited in our weakness.

It is possible that we have lessened the force of "wonders" by our common usage. We say that a man who remodels an old house "worked wonders" with it; or that a woman who designs her own dresses "worked wonders" with the material. In such cases the result is a matter of skill rather than of power, and it is extraordinary because of aptitude rather than supernatural endowment. We are prone to mistake commendation and approval for the sense of awe and amazement with which men view a real miracle.

Let us take a miracle of Jesus for an example. When he came to Capernaum upon one occasion the news rapidly circulated that he was at home. People came from every quarter in such numbers that they filled the house and barred the way to the door. Four men carrying a paralytic could not get close so they lifted the cripple to the roof, removed a sufficient number of tiles and let him down in the immediate presence of Jesus. Upon beholding this demonstration of their faith Jesus at once declared that the man's sins were forgiven. Some of the scribes were present and these questioned in their hearts if Jesus was not guilty of blasphemy by assuming the power of God to forgive sins.

Jesus pointed out to them that it was much easier to tell a man his sins were forgiven than to tell him to arise and walk. The bystanders could not tell whether one had succeeded in forgiving sins but they could immediately detect any failure to cure his infirmity. Jesus then rested his power to forgive sins in a physical demonstration and instructed the man to take up his pallet and go home. Immediately the man arose, took up his pallet and walked out in the presence of them all. It is written, "So that all were amazed and glorified God, saying, 'We never saw anything like this.'" It was such an effect which caused the word "wonders" to be used.

It may be argued that there is nothing in such an effect which indicates supernatural power, and this is correct when the term is used by itself. One who has dwelt all his life upon the plains may feel a sense of awe when he first surveys the lofty snow-covered peaks of a lordly mountain range. Another may have the same sensation when he stands upon the ocean beach and sees the rolling swells foam themselves out in breakers at his feet. In many such experiences we may say, "We never saw anything like this." For this reason it is well to remember that the word "wonders" never appears as a designation of miracles by itself. Every other term is used upon occasion without an accompanying expression but "wonders" is always employed in conjunction with others.

The effect upon the observer is not the primary purpose of the acts. They were not done simply to startle, frighten or amaze the onlookers. The fact that they did so indicates that they were outside the realm of previous knowledge of those who beheld them, and could be measured by no law with which they were familiar. Thus they were calculated to secure attention to the message upon the part of those who saw and who gathered close to those who performed the acts. (Cp. Acts 3:10, 11).

SIGNS

Those who go forth on a mission representing a sovereign are expected to produce the necessary credentials to validate their authority. One who claims to represent a natural realm requires only natural certification; one who is an envoy of a supernatural power must exhibit supernatural credentials. The word "signs" is thus employed to designate miracles which are demonstrations to prove the divine mission of one who performs them.

Since men in the ages prior to Christ were dispatched as representatives of God we would expect God to grant them the power to perform such acts as would prove their claims to be legitimate. A good example is found in the case of Moses. After he had been in the land of Midian for forty years God prepared to send him back to Egypt to deliver His people. He had to establish himself both in the eyes of the Israelites and of Pharaoh. Accordingly it is said, "Then Moses and Aaron gathered together all the elders of the people of Israel. And Aaron spoke all the words which the Lord had spoken to Moses and did the signs in the sight of the people. And the people believed."

God knew that Pharaoh would demand supernatural proof that Moses was sent as his ambassador so we read, "And the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, 'When Pharaoh says to you, Prove yourselves by working a miracle, then you shall say to Aaron, Take your rod and cast it down before Pharaoh that it may become a serpent'" (Exodus 7:9).

The apostles were ambassadors of Christ and God made his appeal through them (2 Corinthians 5:20). For this reason the apostle writes, "The signs of a true apostle were performed among you in all patience, with signs and wonders and mighty works" (2 Corinthians 12:12).

When Jesus cleared the temple of commercial hucksters and money-changers on the basis that they were desecrating his Father's house, the Jews said to him, "What sign have you to show us for doing this?" (John 2:18). Upon one occasion the Pharisees and Sadducees came to test him by asking him to show them a sign from heaven. He reminded them that when it was evening they predicted fair weather because the sky was red, and when it was morning they predicted stormy weather when the sky was the same color. He said, "You know how to interpret the appearance of the sky, but you cannot interpret the signs of the times."

This is an interesting criticism. These men had learned from observation that the face of the sky betokened certain conditions, but they were not as careful in their evaluation of history, else they would have seen the prophecy of God being fulfilled in their day. The oracles of God which they diligently studied had come as a revelation from heaven and constituted a sign of God's purpose, but their lives were not ordered by it.

When Jesus declared that "an evil and adulterous generation seeks for a sign," he did not imply, as so many think, that they were evil because they asked for a sign. But they had God's revelation which they ignored and thus were guilty of evil and adultery contrary to God's law which was a sign unto them. To ask for a sign from heaven while trampling under foot the covenant of heaven was gross hypocrisy. Thus Jesus said to them, "It is Moses who accuses you, upon whom you have set your hope. If you believed Moses, you would believe me, for he wrote of me" (John 5:46).

Of those who reject the miracles of Christ we have a perfect right to demand that they specify the kind of proof one would need to present who claimed to be the Son of God sent down from heaven. Granted that one came who professed to be from heaven, what credentials would be demanded of him? Would it not be necessary for him to do such things as man, unaided by direct divine endowment, could not possibly do? Would not his acts have to be such as transcended all human experience? To reject the miracles of Jesus because they are incredible when measured by human performance is ridiculous. It is this very quality which makes them valid for the purpose for which they were intended.

MIGHTY WORKS

Our word "dynamic" comes from the Greek dunamis, which also gives us our English words dynamo and dynamite. This is the word which is translated by "miracle" in Acts 2:22; 19:11; 1 Corinthians 12:28; and Galatians 3:5. It is rendered "wonderful works" in Matthew 7:22, and "mighty works" in other places.

Dunamis* signifies inherent power, that is, the power which belongs to a person or thing by reason of the nature of that person or thing. All power is of God and the performance of those works or deeds which are beyond the ability of the one who does them signifies that he is endowed of God for such special work.

It is sometimes argued that since all nature is a source of wonder to the one who beholds it, and is a demonstration of divine power, there is no such thing as a miracle. All is either miracle, or nothing is. It is true that there are many forces in operation about us which we cannot understand or measure. We are caused to wonder at the power which we call gravitation, an arbitrary term we have coined to designate something we do not comprehend, and the same is true with electrical energy and magnetic force. By observation and experiment we have learned that these proceed by what we call "laws" and we can define those "laws" and anticipate action and reaction in harmony with them.

Even those who are not versed in knowledge of energy are fully aware of the marvels of the common-place. The planting of a tiny seed is the prelude to a bursting forth of a beautiful flower. A small acorn develops into a stately oak. A black cow eats green grass and produces white milk with yellow butter in it. Various kinds of animal life eat the same substance, yet it is converted into hair, wool or feathers depending upon the kind of animal or bird. Even the process of human procreation and birth has much about it to produce awe in the heart of one who meditates upon it.

Since we are all directly and constantly involved in and with phenomena which are mysterious it is reasoned that we have no right to separate or set apart certain events or incidents and label them "miracles." Those who seek a reply for this are often trapped by their own desire for distinction into the hasty conclusion that what we call natural is not wonderful. Nothing could be farther from the truth. The multiplication of fish by the spawning process so that two can produce enough to feed a multitude, or the increase of grain a hundredfold from the seed implanted in the soil, is as much a demonstration of divine power as the act of Jesus in feeding the throngs in his day. It is not that one is less a mighty work than the other; it is simply that one is different from the other.

In one case there is the constant manifestation of power to all men everywhere. In the other there is a specific breakthrough for a definite purpose. One has as its chief design the constant sustenance of life, the other has the added purpose of being a sign leading to faith in the one who intervenes.

This will be a good time to point out the fallacy involved in saying that a miracle is contrary to the laws of nature. In the first place the expression "laws of nature" may be without foundation in fact. If it means that God drew up or designed certain codes or well-defined rules by which to govern nature we know of nothing which indicates it. God, who made the universe, controls it by the constant application of the same power which formed it. He upholds all things by the word of his power. By him all things consist. He is a God of order and consistency and his power is applied with such regularity and continuity that it appears unto us as if it were being channeled by well-defined legal actions or axioms. We speak of "laws of nature" as another, and human way, of expressing the divine will. It is that will which we see operating.

Miracles are not contradictory to "the laws of nature" for this would make them contrary to the will of God. They are simply applications of divine power upon a higher level or plane. The power of God operates upon three such levels, and we designate them natural, providential and supernatural. When an aircraft which has been flying at ten thousand feet is ordered to fly at fifteen thousand feet, it does not contradict its flight at a lower level, for the levels are parallel and do not bisect each other. It does not alter its goal or destination.

When Jesus restored the withered hand of the man on the sabbath, he was not acting in violation of nature. This was exactly what the physicians would attempt to accomplish by use of natural skills and remedies. It was the crippling condition which was contrary to nature. God made man to employ all of his members and functions. This is the normal state. When one is unable to use an arm that is abnormal. Thus Jesus was acting in harmony with the natural and not in opposition to it.

The temporary suspension of a "law of nature" by exertion of a superior force or power is not a violation of the rules of nature for there is an obvious law to govern all laws— that when a greater power is brought to bear the lesser must always give place. In the old covenant scriptures we have the case of the man who borrowed an axe and while chopping near a stream the head of the axe flew off and into the water. The prophet stretched his rod over the water and the axe floated up and on the surface. The law of gravity was temporarily suspended or reversed, but this was not the violation of the law. The authority which provides or prescribes a law may make application of that law to accomplish good, which should be the purpose of all law.

The turning of the water into wine was simply increasing the tempo of nature. All wine results from water which has been drawn from the soil into the globules or containers called grapes. It is then extracted and allowed to condition itself by fermentation. Jesus accomplished in a moment what otherwise required several months but the natural process and the miracle produced the same result, so one did not act contrary to, or in opposition to the other.

Since this little volume is designed to be a testimony of personal faith, it is essential that we devote some attention to those who object to miracles as impossibilities or absurdities. One cannot ignore the attacks and be honest with himself. Faith is not strengthened by closing the eyes but by opening them. If the shield will not quench the fiery darts it is of no value. The user cannot employ a shield properly by hiding it from the arena of conflict. The shield of faith was not intended for a museum but for the battlefield.

Perhaps the most influential antagonist of miracles was the Scottish philosopher, David Hume, who was born in Edinburgh in 1711. His writings were accepted with tremendous joy and acclaim by the skeptical world. It is not too much to say that a great deal of the opposition to miracles in our own day is simply a repetition of his arguments. Perhaps one thing that has encouraged the popularity of his views is that, once adopted, all need for examination of the Bible and its record of miracles is rendered unnecessary. This approach will commend itself to those who wish to doubt without taking the trouble to personally investigate the evidence. All they need to do is to assume the postulate of Hume and all need for examination is rendered useless. The position of Hume is summarized in the statement, "No conceivable amount of testimony can prove a miracle."

A summary of his argument can be gleaned from the Encyclopedia Britannica, which records it in these words:

> Our belief of any fact from the testimony of eye-witnesses is derived from no other principle than our experience of the veracity of human testimony. If the fact attested be miraculous, there arises a contest of two opposite experiences, or proof against proof. Now, a miracle is a violation of the laws of nature; and, as firm > and unalterable experience has established these laws, the proof against a miracle, from the very nature of the fact, is as complete as any argument from experience can possibly be imagined; and if so, it is an undeniable consequence, that it cannot be surmounted by any proof whatever, derived from human testimony.

Mr. Hume has been acknowledged as one of the most ingenious writers who has ever entered the lists to contest against miracles. Dr. George Campbell, of Aberdeen, who was a contemporary of Hume, and who wrote "A Dissertation on Miracles," in reply to his thesis, said, "The Essay on Miracles deserves to be considered as one of the most dangerous attacks that have been made on our religion." The reader who is interested in historical aspects will find it interesting to read the letters exchanged by these philosophers. They are models of courtesy and restraint when one considers the explosive atmosphere in which they were written.

Our own approach will be rather simple. I am not a philosopher and do not possess the ability for deep philosophical penetration. It is obvious that if one admits the premises of Hume his conclusions will follow. But we believe there are some fallacious assumptions which, once recognized, will demonstrate the emptiness of his attack.

For instance, what is meant by the expression "Our belief of any fact from the testimony of eye-witnesses is derived from no other principle, than our experience of the veracity of human experience"? This is the foundation of the whole structure of attack on miracles. Miracles are regarded as contrary to experience and for that reason are opposed to the very grounds or bases of evidence, and thus are destructive of themselves by negation of the evidence.

Hume declared, "The very same principle of experience, which gives us a certain degree of assurance in the testimony of witnesses, gives us also, in this case, another degree of assurance, against the fact which they endeavor to establish; from which contradiction there necessarily arises a counterpoise, and mutual destruction of belief and authority."

To what experience are miracles contrary? It is not enough to say they are contrary to personal experience for the question under consideration is the testimony, not of our own senses, but of eye-witnesses. Moreover, the thesis of Hume is that they are contrary to our experience of the veracity of human testimony. This is the experience upon which all faiths must rest according to the philosopher, therefore, it is this experience to which miracles must be opposed if the credibility of miracles is to be destroyed.

But this is a little absurd. The very discussion about miracles arises because men have testified that they have observed or experienced such. If there had never been an allegation that miracles occurred there would have been no well-designed opposition to them by Hume and others. That miracles have been a historical fact has been made a part of human testimony. To deny that testimony without showing its invalidity due to the character of the witnesses, or the nature of the testimony, is not to destroy miracles, for they are untouched by such a procedure. Rather it is to destroy our experience of the veracity of human testimony, the very foundation claimed for the skeptical superstructure.

Is it a fact that our belief of testimony is founded upon our experience of its veracity? We think not, and if we are correct, the opposition falls because of a fallacy in its main support. All we need to do to show its utter weakness is to demonstrate that there are those whose experience is at a minimum and yet who act upon testimony given, in full belief. No better example can be given than that of a little child. Without experience of the veracity of testimony it proceeds upon faith. The child abstains from that which it is told is harmful or poisonous; it partakes of that which it is told is helpful. It accepts this testimony without previous experience. Indeed, as it grows older and has increasing experience, it comes more and more to doubt the veracity of human testimony, so when it has the least experience it has the greatest trust in human testimony, and when it has the greatest experience it tends to have a lesser degree of trust in it.

The predication of Hume fails also upon another count in his assumption that a miracle is a violation of the laws of nature and is, therefore, contrary to experience. We have already shown that a miracle is not a violation of the laws of nature. It may be a deviation from such laws as we know, but it is actually in harmony with the nature of the law which regulates the laws of nature, that is, in the application of a superior power or force that which is lesser must give place. So far from this being contrary to the laws of nature it is actually basic to the harmonious functioning of nature.

How can a miracle be contrary to our experience? That it may be outside the range or scope of our experience can readily be granted, but this is vastly different from saying it is opposed to our experience. A dweller in the tropics who has never experienced freezing temperatures or seen a snowfall cannot say that a land of ice is opposed to his experience. It is simply beyond it.

For the miracle of feeding the five thousand to be contrary to one's experience he would have had to be present and witnessed that the fish and loaves were not multiplied and no food was distributed to the hungry multitude. For the miracle of healing the withered hand to be contrary to one's experience he would have had to be present and observe that there was no change wrought in the cripple. One would need to experience the opposite of a miracle for that miracle to be opposite to his experience.

Our experience can never be made the criterion for measuring the validity of any claim which lies outside of, or beyond it. To be a universal measure our experience would need to be absolute and unlimited, otherwise that which lay beyond its limitations could be factual without our being able to determine it. In order to exclude the possibility of miracles performed by God one would need to make himself God.

Perhaps we should turn from the skeptical criticism to the more modern attack of "rationalists," although there is clearly a case of mistaken identity here, for no one could be more irrational in many areas. We live in an age when many have assumed that the record of miracles in the Bible has no relation to historical fact. Their thesis is that Jesus did not claim to perform miraculous acts and the apostolic writers did not write an account of anything deemed to be supernatural. Their idea is that men constructed an image of Christ in their minds and then interpreted what they read to give body to this image. In this fashion they could retain the moral qualities of Jesus and the integrity of the scriptural accounts and place the responsibility for misinterpretation upon those who sought for the wonderful and supernatural.

It is at once apparent that those who thus reason have surrendered the divinity of Jesus and yet want to maintain his right to respect because of his superior human qualities. Only the superstitious would invest him with supernatural power. There is a difference between this approach and that of the more recent "mythical" school of thought and we shall make brief reference to that a little later. The rationalists who sought to hold on to the accounts of Christ have had to face some serious problems. Something had happened and a record had been made of the event. That record indicated a demonstration above and beyond the naturalistic realm. Accordingly, in facing up to the record, a great deal of maneuvering was required to explain away that which was so apparent. Gradually there evolved a rather elaborate scheme of interpretation. In this the scriptures were bent and twisted in a ridiculous fashion.

A good example is the taking of the coin from the mouth of a fish, at the instruction of Jesus, in order to pay the tribute assessed. Peter encountered the tax collectors at Capernaum who enquired about the half-shekel tax. When Peter called this to the attention of Jesus he asserted that he ought to be exempt, but said, "However, not to give offense to them, go to the sea and cast a hook, and take the first fish that comes up, and when you open its mouth you will find a shekel; take that and give it to them for me and for yourself" (Matthew 17:27).

According to the rationalists Jesus was simply telling Peter to return to his old occupation long enough to catch enough fish to pay the tax for the two of them. The Lord was supposed to have smilingly implied that Peter knew that the mouths of fishes contained the answer to all problems related to tax payments and other expenses. He used the expression as we say "straight from the horse's mouth," to indicate the authenticity of our source of information. This is the way in which men of intellectual brilliance seek to evade the power of the Son of God.

In the case of the turning of water into wine we are told that Jesus merely supplied additional wine when he learned from his mother that the celebrants at the wedding had exhausted that provided by the host. But the one who records the event declares that this was the first of his signs, that in performing it he manifested his glory, and as a result his disciples believed on him (John 2:11). Of course this would be absurd if Jesus had just sent the servants out for additional wine. Nor must we forget that it made such an impression that it was used to identify the place later on (John 4:46).

One of the most ingenious artifices is that used to explain the feeding of the multitude. It required no multiplication of bread and fish. It is assumed that those present would not be so foolish as to make no provision at all for the journey and that many had food, but when they halted, instead of bringing forth what they had, those who had provided for themselves selfishly refrained from bringing it out lest they be forced to share with the others. Jesus and his disciples, beholding this attitude, immediately began to share their food with others and the multitude seeing this demonstration of generosity did the same, with the result that there was more than enough for all, and an excess was gathered up. It is said that the real transformation took place in the hearts of the men and women and not on the bread and fish. The subsequent references of Jesus to the event make such rationalization wholly untenable and a little bit ridiculous.

It hardly seems necessary to go through the whole list of miracles. The man at Bethesda was not really a cripple but a psychiatric case who had convinced himself that he could not walk, and gloried in the pity of the multitude. When Jesus confronted him with the question of whether or not he really wanted to be healed he was jerked back into a world of reality and arose and started homeward. Jesus did not walk on the water but on the shore and it just appeared to those in the boat that he was walking on the water. All of these are the concoctions of men who have long ago denied the power of God or his Son and must now devise some means of explaining away the accounts of that power. It is one thing to seek a way of explaining God's revelation, and a wholly different thing to explain God's revelation away.

To one who regards the revelation as a whole such piecemeal and derogatory attempts bring only contempt for the kind of scholarship which must resort to such tactics. It is in no sense of arrogance that we suggest that one who must operate by simple child-like faith will find it far easier to harmonize the scriptures than those who must expound them in such a manner as to disprove the very thing which they were written to prove. "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book, but these are written that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of the living God, and that believing you might have life through his name."

In more recent times we have been treated to the term "myth" as applied by some existential writers to the scriptural accounts. Foremost among these is Rudolf Bultmann whose "Kerygma and Myth" was translated into English in 1953. Unfortunately the use of the word "myth" creates a barrier to the proper understanding of what Bultmann and others were talking about and tends to preclude a careful analysis of their theory. Most of us have been conditioned, when we hear the word, to think of the stories of gods and goddesses and their misbehaving. But this is not the sense in which these theologians and philosophers employ the word.

Basically they refer to the distinction which they profess to see in the personal witness to the Christ and the language and cultural style in which that witness is couched. It is alleged that men in our day think of the world in a scientific and technical way and express themselves in a form of exactness produced by our culture. On the other hand, the apostles and their contemporaries lived in a day which preceded our scientific age and they wrote in the thought forms of their own age. It is not alleged that they invented their descriptions or that they were the results of vivid imagination. On the contrary they believed that there was an unseen realm peopled by invisible beings, angels or demons, and that these invaded the world, and they wrote out of belief of such as a reality.

It is argued that man can no longer accept the idea of what is called a three-story universe, with a spatial heaven above and an underworld beneath, and the earth containing man in the middle. For this reason he cannot longer concur in the idea of actual demons or angels. But since these were accepted in the day when the scriptures were written they must be regarded as the honest attempts of men writing to express themselves to the people of their time. These forms are called "mythical" and Bultmann proposed a divesting of the message— the kerygma— from these forms. This was translated into English by the rather cumbersome term "demythologizing."

It will at once be seen that most of the miracles would be purged in such a program. The casting out of demons, the feeding of the multitudes, the temptation in the wilderness, all of these would be eliminated. Of course the question is always posed, "What do these mean to mankind in our day? Suppose they were all given up, what would we lose?" Actually, this is not the real question at all. If we were to start giving up all that has happened in the past which seems to have no direct relevance to our lives we would strip history of a great deal of interest. But who is to determine what is significant in the past and what is not? Suppose that we should discard something as "myth" in one generation which would be found not to be myth by the next generation.

The real question is one of the authenticity and genuineness of the record and that is not to be determined by caprice or disposition. In the final analysis, nothing that has ever happened is without relevance. Everything has its antecedents and consequences and these in turn have theirs. For this reason we reject the thinking which sorts out events and scraps the accounts in the Bible on the basis of what prejudiced individuals want to dispense of or retain. We believe the miracles are vital as proof that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself. We accept them without reservation. We defend them without hesitancy. Our motto in such matters and all others is, "Yea, let God be true, but every man a liar."

The Blessing of Eternal Life

Contents

I believe that eternal life dwells in the children of God now and that it is our most precious possession in the world. Life is produced by and proceeds from life. All life originates with the author or source of life. The author of life is the Eternal, the uncreated one. "For with thee is the fountain of life; in thy light do we see light" (Psalm 36:9). "He himself gives to all men life and breath and everything" (Acts 17:26).

The Greek language was rich and full. Our own English language which has had to borrow from so many sources is rather poverty-stricken by comparison. Thus we have to use the one word "life" to express the thought contained in a number of Greek words, and because this is the case we frequently overlook or do not grasp important distinctions. It is difficult to distinguish between persons who all wear identical cloaks.

The problem is augmented by the fact that in classical Greek one of these words had princely status while the others were inferior in rank; whereas, in the scriptures, one of the inferior terms has been elevated and the others suffer somewhat by comparison. This is further complicated by the fact that death, which is the natural antithesis of the inferior in classical usage, becomes the antithesis of the other in scripture when a moral element is included. Surely this offers a fruitful field of research for the thoughtful and discerning student.

The word pneuma is rendered "life" only once in the King

James Version, in Revelation 13:15, but since in most versions and revisions it is translated "breath," it can be eliminated from further consideration in this study. The word psyche, which is generally translated soul, heart, or mind, is also rendered life forty times. It is translated by "soul" 58 times. It literally refers to the animal life as an examination of all the passages in which it is contained will readily demonstrate.

By projection it can also refer to personality as W. E. Vine points out in his Expository Dictionary of New Testament words. In Luke 9:24, the term "his life" occurs twice, but the next verse says, "For what does it profit a man if he gains the whole world and loses or forfeits himself?" The expression "his life" is thus equated with "himself." Since we will be talking about something transcendently greater than animal life, or even personality, we can now dismiss this word also.

This leaves the two principal words, bios and zoe. Concerning the first, even the casual reader can ascertain from such a source as Young's Analytical Concordance that it is used for either the manner, means or period of life. It has entered the English language in such forms as biography, the history of a person's life; and biometry, a calculation of the probable duration of human life. In the new covenant scriptures it is used in all these senses of meaning. An example is found in John 3:17, "If anyone has this world's goods (bios) and sees his brother in need, yet closes his heart against him, how does God's love abide in him?" Here it is used for the means of life, for James points out that the things called "goods" are needful for the body (2:16).

An example of bios when used in relation to the improper manner of life occurs in 1 John 2:17 when we read of "the pride of life," and an example when used with reference to a proper frame of life is found in 1 Timothy 2:2, where we have the expression "a quiet and peaceable life." One of the best illustrations of the usage in connection with the period or duration of life occurs in 1 Peter 4:3, "Let the time that is past suffice for doing what the Gentiles do." The King James version follows the manuscripts which use the term "the time past of our life."

The word with which we will be primarily concerned in this connection is zoe. It has also come into our vocabulary in combined forms such as zoology, zoometry, and in its transfer has come to mean, primarily, that which has to do with animals. This is unfortunate since it places a great limitation upon the term which is not characteristic of its Biblical usage.

In the word of God zoe is used of life as a principle, not merely as animal existence. Thus, the first time it is translated "life" in the new covenant scriptures is in the familiar words of Jesus, "For the gate is narrow and the way is hard, that leads to life, and those who find it are few" (Matthew 7:14). The last time it appears is in Revelation 22:19, "And if any one takes away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God will take away his share in the tree of life and in the holy city, which is described in this book."

When we speak of life as a principle, we are not referring to a mere principle of animation, or of power or mobility. When Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly," he was not speaking of mere physical existence. Actually, many of those who accepted him, shortened their lives on earth because they were killed for the faith. The life of the Christ is not the life of the calendar. It is a quality of existence, not quantity. It is not length of days, or days of length, but depth of love. I like to say that the abundant life is not mere duration, but dedication; not just time, but trust; not simply continuation, but consecration.

If you will bear with us we would like to share with you some of the results of the work done by Richard Chenevix Trench in his book, "Synonyms of the New Testament," which has gone through many editions since it was originally published in Cambridge in 1854. The author was Professor of Exegesis and New Testament at King's College, Oxford, when he wrote his memorable study. He points out that the true antithesis of zoe is thanatos (death), but that this is true only so long as life is physically contemplated. When a moral element is introduced and life is regarded as the opportunity of living nobly or otherwise, the antithesis is not between thanatos and zoe, but between thanatos and bios.

Trench shows that in the classics bios is the ethical word, but in the sacred scriptures this is reversed, "for no one will deny that zoe is there the nobler word expressing as it continually does all of the highest and best which the saints possess in God." He accounts for this by saying that only revealed religion connects death and sin in an inseparable manner, and thus automatically places life and holiness as their opposites. Where death exists, sin was there first, and life is proof that sin has never been present, or has been conquered and driven out. Where life (zoe) exists in an absolute sense holiness must exist in the same degree.

That will account for the fact that revelation points out that God has life in himself. He possesses life as a divine nature. It is not derived or acquired. No sin has touched or affected God. Thus his holiness is absolute, untouched or untinctured. He can say, "Be ye holy, for I am holy." To have life is not to multiply the number of heartbeats nor extend the period of breathing, but to become a partaker of the divine nature. When one becomes a partaker of this nature he becomes a partaker of eternal life, for eternal life is simply the life of God. It is our intention to state the case for the present possession of this life in systematic fashion so that all may see and understand, and also become aware of the grandeur and majesty of this promise of eternal life.

1. The Father has life in himself and has granted the Son also to have life in himself (John 5:26). An examination of this passage will show the importance of the two little words "as" and "so." They convey the idea of equality in degree. If one can determine the degree of the first, expressed by "as," he can at once know the degree of the second as expressed by "so." Thus the Son has life even as the Father. "In him was life and the life was the light of men."

2. This life which was with the Father from the beginning, was manifested in Jesus. It was embodied, and the apostolic witnesses had audible, visual and manual contact with it. "The life was made manifest, and we saw it, and testify to it, and proclaim to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us" (1 John 1:2). That this was not merely the physical life of Jesus is evident in the fact that it was the eternal life which was with the Father, and further that it was proclaimed as something in which men might become participants. Those who heard the proclamation already possessed physical life as did the witnesses to whom the eternal life was manifested.

3. Men became possessors of eternal life on the basis of faith in Jesus as the Son of God. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may have eternal life" (John 3:14, 15). There is a difference in believing a person, or even believing on a person, and believing in him. One may believe on another by merely accepting the testimony concerning his existence. He may exercise such faith from a distance or as a remote experience. But to believe in one involves commitment to and identification with that one. Such belief in Jesus guarantees that one enter into life. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son that whoever believes in him should not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16).

4. Because the exercise of faith in Jesus make one a believer in him, and since such belief is the key to eternal life, it is God's will that all who thus believe should have such life, the life of God himself. "For this is the will of my Father, that everyone who sees the Son and believes in him should have eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John 6:40). There are those who interpret this verse to mean that eternal life is future. They emphasize the word "should" and make it appear that this is merely the intention of God and that eternal life cannot be ours until after the resurrection. In a sense, this is true, for our complete enjoyment of eternal life cannot be ours during the time when we suffer in the flesh. But there is a difference between possessing a thing and being fully able to enjoy it. If a child is given a bicycle while in the hospital he has it but he cannot fully appreciate it because of present limitations.

5. In the same speech to which we have just referred Jesus plainly says, "Truly, truly, I say to you, he who believes has eternal life" (John 6:47). Again, he says, "He who believes in the Son has eternal life; he who does not obey the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God rests on him" (John 3:36). Eternal life is the present possession of the believer. The only ones who do not have eternal life are those who do not obey the Son and upon whom the wrath of God dwells.

6. If our previous reasoning is correct, it is obvious that believers have passed from death to life, for one cannot have eternal life and abide in death. That we are not mistaken is apparent from the words of Jesus. "Truly, truly, I say to you, he who hears my word and believes him who sent me, has eternal life; he does not come into judgment, but has passed from death to life" (John 5:24). The condition here stated for crossing the frontier from death to life is to hear the word of Jesus and believe God who sent him.

But there is a tangible way by which one may know he has made the passage. "We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren. He who does not love remains in death. Any one who hates his brother is a murderer, and you know that no murderer has eternal life abiding in him" (1 John 3:14, 15). We cannot wait until we are raised from the dead to love the brethren, but when we do love them we pass from death into life. We know this is life eternal because "no murderer has eternal life abiding in him," and if one who loved did not have eternal life, in this regard he would be no better than a murderer. It would be foolish for the apostle to declare that no murderer has eternal life abiding in him, if no one else has either.

We must not mistake what is here said for love of some of the brethren, or for those brethren who agree with us. Nor must we think of love as a patronizing, condescending attitude for those who differ with us. That is not love in sincerity but in hypocrisy. The real test of the love that takes us from death into life is not whether we will put up with our brethren in life but whether we would be willing to lay down our lives for the brethren. This is the criterion of the love that is under consideration. "By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren" (1 John 3:16).

Love is not something to be casually mouthed by those who would appear generous and benevolent because they are caught on the scriptural hook. It is a genuine willingness to die for another because, in the final analysis, brotherhood is of greater value than mere physical existence. Life without such love is not worth living because it is not eternal life at all.

7. Since eternal life is not mere duration or continuation of existence it becomes necessary that we determine just what it is, and there is no other place from which we can glean such information than from the scriptures. Before we go any farther we can affirm that eternal life is a relationship. It is a personal relationship, a human-divine relationship made possible by the fact that Jesus emptied himself and took upon him the form of a slave by coming to share our lot. When we enter that relationship we enter into eternal life, for the relationship is life in Christ.

Jesus defined eternal life as knowing the Father and himself. "And this is eternal life, that they know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent" (John 17:3). Because of our association of the word "know" with the mental perception that enables us to grasp certain facts, there is a danger that we will regard it in a limited sense and think of it merely as acquiring an intellectual concept of the Father and Son, that is, to know about them through the reading of the testimony that has been provided. It is true that the Greek term is thus used. It is employed with reference to "the servant who knew his master's will, but did not make ready or act according to his will" (Luke 12:47); for the universal awareness that Ephesus was the temple-keeper of the goddess Artemis (Acts 19:35); and for acquaintance with the law (Romans 7:1).

But it is also used in a much greater and deeper sense. It signifies the entering into a meaningful relationship with its object. It refers to such intimate unions as that of marriage. Indeed, the very first time the word appears in the new covenant scriptures it has this meaning. Joseph, who was engaged to Mary, was informed of the fact that she would bear a child begotten by the Holy Spirit. "When Joseph awoke from sleep, he did as the angel of the Lord commanded him; he took his wife, but knew her not until she had borne a son; and he called his name Jesus" (Matthew 1:24). When Mary was informed of this impending event she asked, "How can this be, seeing I know not a man?" (Luke 1:34). The word "know" implies a close and intimate relationship which is creative, producing new life.

Nothing is clearer in the scriptures than the fact that we must enter into a spiritual bond or union with Christ which is as close as the physical union which constitutes marriage. After speaking of sexual congress by which a man becomes one body with a woman, the apostle continues, "But he who is united with the Lord becomes one spirit with him" (1 Corinthians 6:17). It is this absolute and unrestrained surrender to God and His Son which constitutes eternal life. One who embraces Christ in glad and complete involvement dies to self and Christ becomes his life. "For you have died, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life shall appear, then you will also appear with him in glory" (Colossians 3:2, 4). Christ is our life, but Christ is eternal, so the life we share in Christ is eternal life.

8. Eternal life is abiding in the Father and in the Son. It must be noticed that it is abiding in both. One cannot deny the Son and have the Father, nor can he deny the Father and have the Son. "No one who denies the Son has the Father. He who confesses the Son has the Father also. Let what you heard from the beginning abide in you. If what you heard from the beginning abides in you, then you will abide in the Son and in the Father. And this is what he has promised us, eternal life" (1 John 2:23-25). Our abiding in the Son and Father is contingent upon that which we heard from the beginning abiding in us. That which we heard from the beginning was the eternal life which was manifested, seen, heard and proclaimed unto us. It was eternal life as exhibited in the Son. So long as the Good News remains in us as a vital part of our spiritual existence, we have eternal life for that life is the result of the acceptance of the glad tidings.

9. Eternal life is vested in the Son of God. One who has a living relationship with Jesus has eternal life. "And this is the testimony, that God gave us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life; he who has not the Son has not life. I write this to you who believe in the name of the Son of God, that you may know that you have eternal life" (1 John 5:11, 12). "And we know that the Son of God has come and has given us understanding, to know him who is true; and we are in him who is true, in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life" (1 John 5:20).

We believe that the things we have cited definitely support the view that eternal life is a relationship with God and Christ, and that we have eternal life now. John plainly declares that he wrote his epistle so we would know that we have eternal life. To explain the scriptures in such a manner as to deny this would be to array the word of God against itself.

In spite of these there are certain statements which make it appear that eternal life is yet future. One cannot be honest and objective and not face up to them. We shall list a few of them.

1. Eternal life is said to await dispensation in the day when God's righteous judgment will be revealed. Until that day some are said to be storing up wrath while others seek for something better. Of these last it is said, "For he will render to every man according to his works: to those who by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, he will give eternal life" (Romans 2:6, 7).

2. Eternal life is described as a harvest to be reaped from what is sown in this life. "For he who sows to his own flesh will from the flesh reap corruption; but he who sows to the Spirit will from the Spirit reap eternal life" (Galatians 6:8).

3. Eternal life is said to be something which we lay hold upon in the future. "Thus laying up for themselves a good foundation for the future; so that they may take hold of the life which is life indeed" (1 Timothy 6:19).

4. Eternal life is said to be our lot in the age to come and that age is contrasted with this time or now. "Truly, I say to you, there is no one who has left house or brothers or sisters or mother or father or children or lands, for my sake and for the gospel, who will not receive an hundredfold now in this time, houses and brothers and sisters and mothers and children and lands, with persecution, and in the age to come eternal life" (Mark 10:29, 30).

5. Eternal life is declared to be the hope of the elect. "In hope of eternal life which God, who never lies, promised ages ago" (Titus 1:2). "So that we might be justified by his grace and become heirs in hope of eternal life" (Jude 21).

It would appear from these passages that eternal life is yet future and has no reference to our present state except in hopefulness and expectancy. But the scriptures are not contradictory. There are too many passages which plainly state that we now possess eternal life and we cannot simply toss them aside. We must seek for that harmony which comes to light with better understanding.

Fortunately we have a parallel in the teaching concerning the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of heaven. John the Baptist, Jesus, and the apostles all taught prior to the death of Christ, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. Later, Paul wrote to the Colossians that God "has delivered us from the dominion of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved Son" (1:13). John declares that Jesus has "made us a kingdom, priests to his God and Father" (Revelation 1:6).

In spite of this, we are informed by Paul that inheritance of the kingdom is contingent upon our resurrection from the dead and the spiritual and imperishable bodies to be received in conjunction therewith. "I tell you this, brethren: flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable" (1 Corinthians 15:50). Peter tells us that our call and election must be confirmed with zeal, "so there will be richly provided for you an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

The perceptive reader will immediately recognize that there is a sense in which we are now in the kingdom and sharing in its blessings, but there is another sense in which we have not inherited the kingdom, being inhibited by the flesh. The same things hold true with reference to eternal life. We know that we have eternal life for at least one of the apostolic epistles was written to establish this very fact. Yet there is a fulness of this life which we can never experience so long as we are in the body, subject to limitation of time and space, and victims of suffering, pain and physical deterioration.

Death is separation. Life is union. Eternal life is union with the Eternal One. "If we receive the testimony of men, the testimony of God is greater; for this is the testimony of God that he has borne witness to his Son. . . . And this is the testimony, that God gave us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He who has the Son has life, he who has not the Son has not life" (1 John 5:9, 11, 12).

The Last Word

Once upon a time, more years back than I like to contemplate now, I was a simple country lad, intrigued with all of the manifestations of nature. Ours was a family steeped in poverty and although I did not realize it, I was what the social workers of today call an underprivileged child. Unable to have those toys and playthings which cost money, we devised and constructed our own crude ones, and since I was of a more serious disposition I found pleasure and thrill in observation of the commonplace.

There were days when I lay on my back in the orchard watching a hawk or an eagle floating effortlessly in the sky upon a thermal current, and other days when I lay on my stomach on the creek bank watching a snake writhe his sinuous way across the flat rock projecting over the clear stream. Both were marvels to me before I knew that they had challenged the thinking of wise men for generations, and I shall never forget when I first read in Proverbs 30:18, 19, "Three things are too wonderful for me, four I do not understand: the way of an eagle in the sky, the way of a serpent on a rock, the way of a ship on the high seas, and the way of a man with a maiden."

There were occasions when God seemed very near. This was especially true on cold winter nights when the crisp snow crunched under one's step, and the thousands of twinkling stars seemed to shimmer so much closer to earth. It was also true when spring came with its resurrection of buds and blooms, and its promise of rebirth. There was no question about the existence of God. It was blasphemy in our ears to hear one even profane the sacred name with oaths or cursing. Each time we sat down at the table we asked him to bless our meager fare. It never occurred to us that he might not hear.

Later, in that crucial period through which a boy passes as he wrestles with his own soul while he climbs the steeps toward manhood there were times of fleeting doubt. How do I know that God really exists? Do I believe as I do simply because I have been taught to do so by my parents, and how can I be sure they are right about God, seeing that my increasing knowledge proves that they have been wrong about so many other things?

Those were times of mental agony and intellectual suffering but I know now they had to come. They were essential to the development of a mature faith and personal conviction. After all, an infant learning to walk regards every wrinkle in the rug as a hill and every chair as a mountain. And the intellectual infant who stumblingly leaves the mental protection of his parents, like the physical one who fearfully leaves their arms, may exaggerate the obstacles in his path.

I am now at the place where I can assess realistically the values by which I would like to die as well as those by which I propose to live the days remaining on the earth. Strangely enough, I find myself thrown back upon the resources of the same kind of faith and trust which I knew as a child. The difference lies in the fact that then it was compulsory but now it is by choice. Then I was driven to it by sheer lack of knowledge, now I am dependent upon it because of the knowledge of how much I shall never know of myself.

I am not willing to conclude that all of the apologetic approach of the past must be discarded. To me some of it, at least, seems to be valid and worthy of consideration. And yet I realize that it may not speak as meaningfully to others as it does to me. For that reason I have not written to persuade or convince others, but rather to testify of my personal convictions and to explain why I hold them. I will not provoke discussion with those who disagree.

I have not concerned myself with being either theologically or scientifically profound because I am not qualified to be either. It was my hope, as I began to write, that I could explain the faith of a plain man so that common folk would read with understanding. If I have failed in this my real purpose and mission have been thwarted.

It may well be that the very simplicity exhibited will appear to be radical in a sophisticated age, but it seems to me that a disciple of the Son of man will always appear so to the sons of men in the generation of his sojourn among them. The word "radical" means "root," which explains why it appears in our word "radish." A radical may be one who insists on getting to the root of things and it is regrettable that the term is now applied almost exclusively to one who seeks to "uproot" existing conditions.

I must plead guilty to being a radical in the best sense of the word. I firmly believe the universe is rooted in the creative power of an intellectual Being to whom we are responsible. It is this which gives meaning, purpose and direction to life. The thought of His watchful care and concern brings inner serenity and tranquility in life and provides hope of existence beyond the portals at the end of the road.

Mine is a living faith. God lives, Christ lives, and the revealed word is a living word. Because of this I also live. Life is a reality and in this reality I am a partaker of the infinite grace and of ultimate being. The sting of death has been extracted by the forceps of faith. The bondage of fear has been lifted by the resurrection. Even while tied to earth by the umbilical cord of the flesh through which I am sustained, I know that the time will come when I shall be delivered into that fuller state of being for which we are destined. And the throes of death will really become the pangs of birth.

I find myself with a great deal of compassion for one who cannot believe. It is the same kind of feeling I always experience when I meet a blind person tapping along the sidewalk with his white cane, and never knowing what lies in his path ahead. I am sure there must always be an inner sense of fear and dread despite the studied attempt to appear normal and carefree.

We were made to believe and we could not long survive in an utterly faithless world. If we convince ourselves that we are merely combinations of minerals and chemicals and gases, produced by the earth and doomed to return to it, to be absorbed into nothingness, the earth will be nothing but a whirling prison, careening madly through space until all of its inhabitants are blindfolded and led into the death-chamber. Our very homes will cease to be islands of love and understanding and become cells of hopelessness on death row.

But if we believe that Jesus lived and died and rose again, the earth is placed in proper perspective. It is not a grim dragon breathing volcanic smoke and fumes, and opening up its waiting jaws to swallow us. Instead, it is the rest stop on a longer journey, sometimes dirty and uncomfortable as rest stops often are, but holding forth promise of the more glorious day ahead when the journey is completed.

And so I have come full circle, from childhood faith to childlike trust, and I am thrilled to have made the trip. I would not want to go back over the route again, bestrewn as it is with rusty mementoes of my failures, but I am happy that I have come the distance and can rest under the tree whose shade I welcomed and whose fruit I plucked when life was less hectic and responsibilities were fewer. And I know of no better words in conclusion than these which I have borrowed from a far nobler pilgrim than myself:

"For I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." To him be all praise!

On Being Myself

At various times in one's life he comes in contact, directly or otherwise, with those persons who make an impact upon his thinking, and thus place him in debt to them, as certainly as if they had loaned him money. Words are the currency in the realm of ideas as surely as coins are in the field of finance, and while one may not legitimately steal them, he should be able to borrow them with proper credit.

When I was in high school and just beginning to dream of things more precious than the mundane, I chanced upon a book which was published a couple of years before I was born. It was written in such simple and unadorned prose that it attracted me by its very humility. That book was Adventures in Contentment, by David Grayson.

It inspired in me two feelings— a love for good literature, wholesome and clean; and a desire to write with a homely touch. As to the first emotion, I want to quote a statement from the chapter entitled "An Evening at Home." The quotation to which I refer is preceded by these words: "Let the wind blow outside and the snow drift in piles around the doorway, and the blinds rattle— I have before me a long pleasant evening."

Grayson then writes: "What a convenient and delightful world is this world of books!— if you can bring to it not the obligation of a student, or look upon it as an opiate for idleness, but enter it rather with the enthusiasm of the adventurer! It has vast advantages over the ordinary world of daylight, of barter and trade, of work and worry." I would covet the power to make men and women feel thus by my writings, but my limitations are too many and great.

I can be blamed for the content of this book, but not for its creation. Some who heard me speak at various times and places were kind enough to say that they wished my words were in print so they could read them meditatively, and pass them on to others who could not be present to hear them originally. Feeling far too highly complimented, I am sure, I finally decided to present some of my public addresses in this fashion.

All of the speeches found herein were delivered within one calendar year. They were chosen from a great mass of material, and may not represent the best selection at all. They were given at various places and under divergent circumstances, and you will thus find a treatment of a good many themes, not all of them closely related.

The first one, which gives its name to the book, was presented at a family camp where several hundred people of all ages met to share together in a daily round of praise to God and wholesome recreation. The second, "My Only Creed," has been included by request, having been previously printed in Mission Messenger. It was prepared for delivery at the Annual Unity Conference, held in Atlanta, Georgia.

Originally, this conference was started to bring men from all segments of our restoration movement together for high level discussion of our problems. For this reason it has generally been held on the campuses of colleges— Bethany, Milligan, Southeastern Christian, Lubbock Christian, Atlanta Christian, etc. I consider it is one of the most useful of the many forums now being conducted.

Camp Wi-Ne-Ma is located in a rugged beauty spot on the Oregon coast. I was invited to be the Bible lecturer during the Week of Missions in 1971, and decided to offer a series of expository talks based only on the first chapter of 1 Thessalonians. These occur next in the book. They are followed by four other talks suggested at the same place by young men and women of high school and college age. The program for young people had been a little ragged and unorganized in previous years during the Week of Missions, and some of the kids whom I had met at colleges or universities decided to take advantage of my presence, so they could hear and question me. As always, this encounter was a thrilling one for me.

The remainder of the book is composed of messages presented at odd times. Some of them have been lifted out of a series, others were offered in "one night stands." I doubt that you will find any of them particularly outstanding, but they represent my approach to life and its problems. I have no ambition whatsoever to be thought of as a great preacher or editor, but I do want to be myself, and exemplify in word and deed my inner philosophy. The only way I know to be true to others is by first being true to myself.

You will not read far until you'll realize that I lack a great deal in polish and sophistication. Although it has been my good fortune to address some fairly erudite groups, I appreciate most of all the introduction of a rural mail carrier, who was acting as chairman of a meeting far down in the hills. He said, "Now just loosen your belts a notch or two, or let down your suspenders so they won't rub your shoulders, and lean back and be comfortable. Brother Ketcherside is one of us!"

I am never bothered when some faded and wrinkled saint comes up to me and says, "My brother, you may come from the city of Saint Louis, but I call that country preachin'." There's a homespun quality about country things that takes me back to my boyhood days with their breakfasts of fried ham and red-eye gravy, topped off with buttered biscuits and sorghum molasses. I hope I never outgrow my love for simple fare, whether dished up at the kitchen table, or verbally at the speaker's stand.

I guess I will never forget, however, that once when I finished a question forum on a state college campus, the long-haired young fellow who presided arose and said, "Until Mr. Ketcherside came along today, I never realized how much of the bread of life was composed of corn." I got a bang out of that because a lot of people talk about corn who never saw a shucking peg, or never bounced an ear of Reed's Yellow Dent off the bang-board of the wagon on a frosty morning. You see, where I came from, the more corn you had in your crib, the better off you were, and the man who was out of corn would be in serious trouble before the winter was over.

I trust that you will derive a little of the same thrill from reading what I said, as I did from preparing and saying it. I thank those who were patient enough to listen to me, and those of you who are kind enough to read this book. It is my fervent hope that we may meet here, but if we do not, then I shall look for you at the glad reunion of all the saints over there. With prayers for you and all who are dear unto you, I am thrilled to be both

Yours and HIS,

The Parable of Telstar

Contents

Most of us recognize that one of the greatest problems we face in our modern world lies in the realm of communication. It is difficult to break through the "sound barrier" and convey our thoughts to another. This is responsible for much of the misunderstanding and strife in our day. Broken homes result from it, community disorder is attributable to it, and no other single factor contributes as much to international tension and fear. If we just understood one another, a great deal of suspicion would fade away and peace would take its place.

In the spiritual realm no less than in the domestic, social and political, we must contend with the same problem. God did not choose to impose the divine will upon us arbitrarily, but to "teach us of his ways." To do this it was necessary for him to use the means of communication which rational beings employ to exchange thoughts among themselves. Since the highest form of such communication is by language, in which words are employed, the revelation of heaven has been given in "words which the Holy Spirit teacheth."

It is axiomatic that the unknown can only be understood in the light of the known. All acquisition of knowledge is progressive and each fact ascertained becomes a foundation for the grasp of additional knowledge. The mind is enlightened as the sun lights the earth. The sun does not attain its meridian in one great burst of light, so our progress from mental darkness and ignorance is also gradual as "the eyes of understanding" become adjusted to behold more clearly that which previously was in shadows but is revealed with increasing detail.

Jesus was a master teacher. When he became clothed in flesh he shared the lot of those who were his disciples. His sympathy and compassion were unbounded. He did not attempt to convey the will of heaven in its fulness until men were able to grasp it. He said, "I have many things to say unto you but you are not yet able to bear them." His mode of conveying information was adapted to the day in which he taught and to the needs of those who heard him. When he invited them to "Come, learn of me," he assured them that his yoke was easy and his burden was light.

The Hebrew has one word for teaching, charaz, which literally means "to string beads together." This seems to have been the method favored by Jesus. Drawing upon the daily life of his hearers for illustrative material, he pointed them to sublime truths by use of those things with which they were all familiar. A good example of one string of pearls is found in Matthew, chapter thirteen, which consists of a series of seven parables, one after another, all separate and yet all joined by a central string of thought. In each instance a simple event is made to bear testimony to a majestic spiritual principle. The Sunday school lad who defined a parable as "An earthly story with a heavenly meaning" stated a real truth.

Some of the parables of Jesus were drawn from established customs related to marriage and other events. Such was the story of the ten virgins who took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom, five of whom made no provision for any delay in the proceedings. Too, there was the account of the king who prepared a wedding feast for his son and issued invitations to a group who were so busy with routine affairs that all of them found an excuse to stay away.

Other parables were related to the occupations of ancient Palestine, such as husbandry, farming, fishing and gem collecting. Still others had to do with daily household tasks such as baking of bread for the family or grinding at the mill. Again there were stories conditioned upon the state of affairs in an occupied country where the presence of alien troops caused the populace to hide their treasure out in the fields. One who had but little knowledge of the life of the people could learn a great deal about it from reading and digesting the parables.

Have you ever thought of the kind of talk which Jesus might deliver today if invited to be the guest speaker at a weekly luncheon meeting of the Rotary Club? In all probability he would sprinkle his address with parables for the record says of his messages to those of his day, "Without a parable spake he not unto them." But what kind of parables would he now use to illustrate the kingdom of heaven? Certainly, if a parable is effective only when drawn from contemporary life, he would not talk about shepherds, flocks and folds. In this day of sliced and wrapped bread purchased from the nearest grocery, he would not discourse about a woman putting leaven in two measures of meal. Neither would he talk about virgins with oil lamps sallying forth to escort a bridegroom.

We live in what is called the "Space Age." Children who never saw a flock of sheep or a vineyard are thoroughly conversant with rockets and satellites. If Jesus were asked to speak at the local elementary school, and if the Supreme Court did not issue an injunction against his doing so, he would tie his message in with the life of our century of progress. It will not require too much imagination nor will it be cheapening the revelation of God to surmise that Jesus would, in all likelihood, draw upon some of the accomplishments in space exploration to drive home his points. The principles enunciated and the lessons set forth would be adapted to the status of a twentieth century audience. If Jesus were with us in the flesh he would no more dress his messages in the verbal garb of ancient Palestine than he would personally clothe himself in the dress of that time and place.

Perhaps there is a lesson here for us. We need to grasp the sublime truths about the kingdom revealed by the parables of long ago and clothe them with the daily life and current experiences of our own generation. Only thus can we communicate heaven's truth to those about us. The Christian concept is not that of Jesus pointing us to a book, but of the Book pointing us to Jesus, and if we worship the book instead of our Lord we will be guilty of Bibliolatry. We should not become enslaved by antiquated expressions until the thought is lost. This does not imply that we should be flippant or irreverent but we need to remember that one can be reverent in any language, and if he does not express himself reverently in English he might not do so in Greek. Reverence exists in the heart before it climbs to expression on the lips.

I have been thinking recently that Jesus might well employ the Telstar satellite in a modern parable. Certainly our world is familiar with the great scientific achievement involved in this outstanding communication medium. We do not know how it functions but we know that it does because we can sit in our own living rooms and see the result on the television screen. Here is a modern technological creation which seems to bring men closer to each other and gives us all a more universal perspective. Through its functioning we share in a closer kinship with those who are remote from us on our earthly globe. "The kingdom of heaven is like Telstar." In what ways is this true?

1. Telstar did not create itself. It is a mechanism so complex as to defy understanding upon the part of the scientific layman. No one would be so absurd as to harbor the thought that such a remarkable composition of synchronized parts, many of which are minute but essential, was the result of mere chance or represented but "a fortuitous concourse of atoms." Telstar is the result of creative purpose and intelligent design. It had to exist in thought before it became a reality. But even Telstar pales into insignificance when compared with the human body with its intricate networks of nerves, veins and arteries. Moreover, the human being is alive and possessed of creative ability, as witness Telstar itself. How ridiculous it is to postulate that Telstar could not create itself but to doubt that man existed on "the divine drawing board" of infinite intellect before he was brought into existence.

2. Telstar was not only created according to the purpose of its creators but in order to fulfill a specific purpose in itself. Regardless of what else it might accomplish, if it failed in that area for which it was designed it could never be considered a success. It was not the intention of the scientists who brought it into being to have it merely circle the earth in repetitious rounds but it was made for the good of humanity since its creators were human. By the same token man was made to fulfil a purpose. Anything else which might be accomplished would be considered as secondary to this purpose. No man has ever discharged his responsibility for being until he realizes and recognizes the purpose of his creation and measures up to it. Our true purpose on earth is to glorify the creator, and since he is divine we do this by putting on and exhibiting the divine nature.

Telstar on the launching pad was useless except as an exhibit for scientific study and research. It was only when the satellite was put into orbit and functioning to enhance communications that it could fulfill its mission. Too many of us are still on the launching pad. Under such circumstances the human being may be the subject of study physically, mentally and emotionally, and he may serve to gratify the desires of scientists to probe into personality and other factors, but man was not created to be merely a museum piece. It is only as we get into orbit and achieve the destiny for which we were created that we derive real happiness from life.

3. Telstar did not launch itself into orbit. There had to be a power from without and this power had to apply sufficient force to remove the satellite from its earthbound state into the atmosphere. The thrust of rocketry had to be great enough to transfer the satellite from its imprisoned state to one of freedom from the pull of earth and transform it into an individual unit in its own right. The same thing holds true in our personal lives. We cannot pull ourselves up by our own boot straps.

The apostle to the Gentiles declared, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first and also to the Gentile." The word "power" is from the Greek dunamis, from which we derive such words as dynamo, dynamite and dynamic. Certainly the power to move an object is contained in these words. The gospel is God's dynamic to put one in orbit in the state of salvation. The gospel is the "good news" that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures, that he was buried, and that he was raised again the third day according to the scriptures. The apostle declares that we are saved by these facts if we keep them in memory. The power in the gospel is derived from the fact that the death of Christ removes from us the guilt and penalty of sin, while the resurrection provides for us a hope which transcends the fear of death. Although the liberating power is available in the gospel rocket capsule it does not become activated for our personal use until lighted by the spark of faith. When faith kindles the propulsive power in our hearts we are set free to fulfil our divine purpose and mission.

Occasionally there are those who question the ability of the gospel to lift us from the mundane and place us in orbit where we can function as the creator intended. Generally those who do this regard the gospel as mere words. They overlook the fact that the Good News is a vehicle of the Holy Spirit and it is the Spirit which operates on the heart through the medium of the word of God. The apostle addressed "those of God's scattered people" who lived in Asia Minor as "chosen of old in the purpose of God the Father, hallowed to his service by the Spirit, and consecrated with the sprinkled blood of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter 1:1, 2). Any theory of our salvation which slights the eternal purpose, the Spirit, or the blood of Jesus, is inadequate as an explanation of what transpires in our personal encounter and relationship with God.

The same writer in the salutation of his second epistle says, "His divine power has bestowed on us everything that makes for life and true religion, enabling us to know the One who called us by his own splendor and might. Through this might and splendor he has given us his promises, great beyond all price, and through them you may escape the corruption with which lust has infected the world, and come to share in the very being of God" (2 Peter 1:3, 4). The purpose of true religion is to enable us to know God who called us. If it does not achieve this it is empty and vain. Nothing is more vacuous than the mere performance of ritual for ritual's sake. It is true that our worship must be prescribed by God; it is just as true that it must lead to God. If it does not we are like little children "playing church."

What is said about the promises which are "great beyond all price" is very vital to our life which must be in orbit to be effective. These promises are God's "escape hatch" from a sinking world. They provide for us a ladder lowered into the pit which is filled with sin and degradation infected by lust. God not only calls us but provides the way of escape from our predicament and the power to use the way. The goal of escape is to be lifted or elevated to the place where we can share in the very being of God. The contrast between a life groveling in the mire of corruption and one which shares in the very being of God is so great as to stagger human imagination. Indeed it is so far above our feeble powers of comprehension that its attainment cannot be predicated upon knowledge but upon faith.

4. It was not enough for Telstar to be launched but it has to have sufficient power to maintain it in orbit and to keep it going on its unwearying course. A great many lives are given the impetus to start them on their way but they "bum themselves out" before they have continued very long. We must recognize that when we waver and doubt we get back in that atmosphere where the gravitational pull to accept our former way of life becomes almost irresistible. We lose spiritual altitude and with it we lose the power of overcoming the insistent tug at our hearts. Of such characters the word of God says, "They had once escaped the world's defilements through the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ; yet if they have entangled themselves in these all over again, and are mastered by them, their plight in the end is worse than before. How much better never to have known the right way, than, having known it, to turn back and abandon the sacred commandments delivered to them" (2 Peter 2:20, 21).

Again, we must remember that we are all subject to external pressure and just as increased momentum through the atmosphere brings increased resistance, so our lives become subjected to mounting tensions as we more zealously serve God and move against the slipstream of popular worldliness. We must be pressurized within to withstand the pressures from without. If a chink appears in our armor it may be sufficient to allow entrance of destructive forces which will blow us to bits. The explosive action of sin in a human life is well known by those who have experienced it personally or observed its results in the wreckage of other lives around them.

It is well for us to enquire what is the source of the power of resistance within which enables us to face the routines of life without coming apart at the seams or flying to bits. God is just as concerned to keep us going as to get us going, and it is to Him we must look for the creative energy required to stay aloft and to perform our spiritual functions. Fortunately, the divine revelation does not leave us ignorant concerning these matters. We are empowered within by the Holy Spirit who dwells in us so that we are actually "space capsules" filled with divine energy. It was for this reason the apostle prayed for the saints in Ephesus that the Father "may grant you strength and power through his Spirit in your inner being" (Eph. 3:16).

All of us know that it is much easier to start a project than to carry it through to completion. The spiritual life is an adventure, and like every other such experience we enter upon it with verve and vigor. For awhile we are carried along on a transport of joy because of the freshness and newness of our encounter with the divine. But when life becomes routine and we must grapple in hand-to-hand conflict with the forces of temptation and evil, when resistance is worn down and zeal flags, we conclude that it would be easier to succumb and surrender than to keep on. It is for just such a reason the Spirit dwells in the sons of God.

Few of us have ever really appreciated the reality of the sentiment expressed in 2 Corinthians 4:7-9, "We are no better than pots of earthenware to contain this treasure, and this proves that such transcendent power does not come from us, but it is God's alone. Hard-pressed on every side we are never hemmed in; bewildered, we are never at our wit's end; hunted, we are never abandoned to our fate; struck down, we are not left to die."

The indication is that we must expect pressures from every side. We will suffer from bewilderment as to the course we should pursue, we will be hunted and even struck down by the forces of fate. Under such conditions the normal thing for a pot of earthenware would be to crack up or fragment. But there is within us a power which presses outward which is greater than the force from without which presses in. The strength of resistance does not lie in the vessel of earth but resides solely in the power which abides inside of the container. "Such transcendent power does not come from us, but is God's alone."

Notice what results accrue from this indwelling power which assure our preservation. It is affirmed that while "hard—pressed from every side we are never hemmed in." It would seem that with pressures coming from every side we would undoubtedly be hemmed in. Under such conditions everywhere we look we see a stone wall and the walls appear to be closing in upon us. The answer is found in the use of the expression "transcendent power." "Transcendent" means to "go or be above or beyond." It is from the Latin word which means "to climb over or beyond." That is why we can never be hemmed in by pressures from every side. We do not gain freedom by fighting them, but by climbing over them, by being lifted above them. The way of escape is not forward but upward.

Again it is affirmed that we will be "bewildered, but never at our wits' end." Life is very complex and often appears as a maze through which we must pick our path and choose our course. The race is run over an obstacle course. A great many think that the road of life is a straight one drawn like a line from here to the gates of glory. This is because they mistake the word "straight" for 'strait" in a statement of Jesus. Even then our Lord applied it to the gate and not to the road, when he said, "Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life." A modern translation is correct in rendering it. "The gate that leads to life is small and the road is narrow, and those who find it are few." A narrow road is sometimes very crooked and filled with curves and turns.

Only the one in whom the Spirit of God abides can be certain that he will not come to a dead-end street where the gate will slam shut behind him and make retreat or escape impossible. All of us, saint and sinner alike, are baffled and beset by problems. Those who are not have withdrawn from reality and live in a dream world of their own fancy. The difference between "the children of light" and "the children of this world" is that the latter live solely by their wits and when they reach the end of their knowledge or perception, only death awaits. He who has the mind of God need never be at his wits' end although his problems may be many and difficult.

We will be hunted. The probing fingers of temptation will seek us out as the searchlights of the enemy scan the skies to detect a plane and direct the full force of the anti-aircraft fire against it. The baying hounds of sin and slavery will track us continually to pull us down and return us to bondage. When the apostle wrote to Corinth, God's people were often literally hunted by the forces of paganism. They were driven from place to place and their lives were constantly in danger. In spite of all this they never felt alone because of his abiding presence. It is true that our lives are no longer endangered because of our faith, but our souls are in perpetual danger because of the pursuing forces of evil. It is as true now, as in the days of primitive Christianity, that we are not alone in Our struggles to remain free. He has promised, "I will never leave you nor forsake you."

The forces around us sometimes strike us down but never without God's knowledge. You do not know the sparrow population of the town you live in and what a task it would be to take the sparrow census of the United States. Yet our heavenly Father knows every sparrow and not one of them shall fall to the ground without his notice. A sparrow is a very insignificant creature. We do not even look twice if we see a dead one lying in the road. Jesus points out that we are of more value than many sparrows and urges upon us the conclusion that God will certainly care for us if he notes the fall of a sparrow. We are not left to die when struck down.

Now the gist of all this is that we are not placed in orbit without sustaining power. The daily friction of life need not wear us out. It is not necessary for us to give in, give up or give out. Just as modern satellites replenish their power from the rays of the sun, so our spiritual vitality can be maintained by the way of the Son.

5. In the last place we need to be like Telstar in bringing the world of mankind closer together. After all, this is a communications satellite. Its prime purpose is to receive a message and transmit it to others who might never receive it otherwise. It portrays what has happened or what is happening, so that it is a bearer of tidings, a news carrier to the world of mankind.

Now I submit to you that every child of God has this same obligation. We have taken our places among the galaxy of the saints of all ages and occupy our position in the spiritual firmament for this very reason. The good news which has been projected to us must be reflected from us. When Jesus was ready to leave the earth he met his disciples on a certain mountain. He told them that full authority had been committed unto him in heaven and on earth. He then commanded them, "Go forth to every part of the world, and proclaim the Good News to the whole creation. Those who believe it and receive baptism will find salvation; those who do not believe will be condemned." These humble men were to be the envoys of the King. They were the communications satellites of their day reflecting the greatest message the world has ever heard.

The task which was theirs in that age is ours in this generation. One of the apostles wrote to a young preacher, "The things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also." The religious world has been torn to shreds over what has been designated the doctrine of "apostolic succession" but in one respect we are all successors to the apostles. The responsibility for taking the Good News to the world has fallen upon our shoulders. And we are under the same obligation as Timothy, who was told, "Keep safe that which has been entrusted to you. Turn a deaf ear to empty and worldly chatter, and the contradictions of so-called 'knowledge,' for many who lay claim to it have shot far wide of the faith."

It is obvious that Telstar has accomplished a great deal by promoting better understanding among peoples of all nations. It is universal in its impact. It makes it possible for all to share in the blessings and privileges which have been bestowed upon us by a kind and gracious providence. There comes a new conviction that truly we are all of one blood and offspring of the same creator. Our mutual kinship becomes ever more apparent. The telecast of a message which is of world-wide concern naturally welds us into a more closely-knit union.

The Good News which has been entrusted unto us is designed to batter down walls which men have erected. It is affirmed of Jesus that, in uniting Gentiles and Jews, he "has broken down the enmity which stood like a dividing wall between them." Jesus came to make the wall against sin a stronger bulwark, but to remove every artificial barrier which men had erected to keep God's family apart. His method of accomplishing this was plainly stated. "So he came and proclaimed the good news: peace to you who were far off and peace to those who were nearby; for through him we both alike have access to the Father in one Spirit."

It is our conviction that the message which eradicated the hostility between Gentile and Jew, bitter as the hatred was, has proven that it contains the power to remove all barriers between men. But the message has to be proclaimed. It must be circulated. The sound must again go into all the world and the words unto the ends of the earth. It must reach those who are far off as well as those who are near by. The whole realm of humanity must be made to realize that we are children of the same Father and that God so loved the world as to give his Son for all. This is the message beamed to us which we must relay to all. This is our true mission, our real vocation.

"For the kingdom of heaven is likened unto Telstar which men launched into orbit that good news might be shared with an alien world so that all men might come to recognize that kinship which will lead at last to true brotherhood.”

Perhaps nothing is more repugnant to civilized man than the thought of cannibalism. The dictionary defines a cannibal as "a human who eats human flesh," and cannibalism as "the eating of one's own kind."

In the month of May, 1845, when Great Britain was all agog with interest for exploring the Arctic Region and discovering the Northwest Passage, Sir John Franklin sailed away in command of two vessels, the Erebus and the Terror. They disappeared, and sparked a search which lasted into the twentieth century.

In 1848, Dr. John Rae, of the Hudson's Bay Company, relayed information which he had gained from Eskimos, that a band of white men had died from starvation on King Edward's Island. They had sold him what appeared to be relics of the Franklin expedition. Dr. Rae conscientiously reported that the Eskimos had informed him that members of the party had been reduced to cannibalism.

This aroused a furor in London. Distinguished writers such as Charles Dickens and Willkie Collins blasted the report as a slur upon the honor of the Royal Navy. Lady Franklin opposed payment of the ten thousand pounds which had been offered by the government for information as to the fate of the explorers. She launched a privately financed expedition to probe the Arctic wastes to prove that the slander was not true.

Scores of brilliant men and women backed her endeavor. It was unthinkable to them that men, reared in the graces of civility and polished by the sheen of society could ever stoop to the consumption of human flesh. It was as late as 1922 that Knud Rasmussen "conclusively proved the truth of Rae's revelation of cannibalism, by discovering at Starvation Cove the skeletons of Europeans with the bones cut by saws and the skulls broken to extract the brains."

Now if physical cannibalism is repulsive, consider what a terrifying thing it is for brethren to engage in such a practice spiritually. It is this which prompts Paul to condemn the use of liberty as an occasion for the flesh, and to add, "But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another." The New Testament in Plain English translates the passage, "But if you bite and eat up one another, take care that you are not destroyed by one another." It is unthinkable that those whose banner is inscribed with the words, "Brotherly Love," should engage in destroying one another. Yet the sin of cannibalism lies at the door of many who profess to be children of God.

What is even worse is that we are treated to the sight of a body of believers insanely attacking its own members and tearing with bloody talons at its own tissue. One cannot help but recall the Greek fable of Erisichthon, the profane person and hater of the gods. As the poets related the story, Erisichthon defied the gods by attacking with his axe a venerable oak in a grove sacred to Ceres. When a bystander remonstrated, Erisichthon hacked him to pieces and cut off his head.

When news of this impiety reached Ceres, she decided upon a punishment so dire as to make all shudder who heard it. She dispatched an Oread into the farthest reaches of ice-clad Scythia to summon the dread Famine to take possession of the bowels of Erisichthon. Finding him asleep, she enfolded him with her wings and breathed herself into him, infusing her poison into his veins. He awoke with a raging hunger, and loudly cried for food which he consumed as soon as it was brought. All that he owned he sold to purchase food, but his dreadful appetite was not abated.

At length, with nothing left to barter, he sold his daughter, but this did not provide enough food, and finally hunger forced him to devour his own limbs, and he strove to sustain his body by devouring it, until death relieved him from the sentence pronounced by the vengeful Ceres. This myth is older than our gospel records, but it serves to depict the state of the body of believers which I have known since childhood. That body has sought to protect, perpetuate and propagate itself through self-destruction. It has severed its own members, gouged out its own eyes, cut out its own tongue and fragmented itself in many communities. And it has done this under the guise of upholding the truth.

What has happened is very clear to the astute student. We were "a search and rescue mission" intended to locate the Christians in all of the sects and to guide them back to the base of unity and peace. But we became entangled in the jungle, and motivated by fear of our own shadows and unable to distinguish between friend and foe. Now we need to be rescued from our plight. We are more schismatic, more divided, and less at peace than those whom we set out to unite.

What is the remedy for our state? Unless we have abandoned the ideal of restoration it is very simple. When our nineteenth century predecessors saw the frightful divisions existing in the Protestant establishment, they knew that "the correction and improvement of no creed, or partisan establishment in Christendom could ever become the basis of such a union, communion and cooperation, as would restore peace to a church militant against itself, or triumph to the common salvation." Accordingly, they recommended that men cease to emphasize their creeds, ignore their partisan establishments and return to the original order.

If this advice was the answer for the sectarianism of others, why is it not the solution for our own? I contend that it is not only the answer but it is the only answer. We must go back, back, back— beyond every unwritten creed, every test of union and communion which we have devised— back to a creed of such transcendent importance that the very issue of eternal life is suspended upon its acceptance, a creed of such universal dynamic as to arouse again the gleam of hope in the jaded eyes of despairing men floundering in the garbage-polluted waters of a sectarian sea.

So long as we continue to toy with the forlorn daydream that we can elevate our puny parties to the status of the kingdom of heaven, or smuggle into the throne room an illegitimate child of our own begetting, which we have cleverly christened "the Lord's church," we are merely constructing a fool's paradise and building castles in the air. If we are unwilling to divest ourselves of our own sectarian creeds and formulae, we should never again raise a voice of criticism against our religious neighbors who tenaciously cling to their human dogmas.

Those who are willing to begin at a certain point in our divided state and freeze all division which occurred before, and go on from there, are simply deceiving themselves. They are not opposed to division in the body of our Lord. They only deplore separation from themselves. No one who accepts a certain amount of schism as normal can ever truly labor for the union of all believers in Christ Jesus.

Those who want to start in at the point of division falsely attributed to instrumental music, and strive to unite all of the warring factions in the non-instrument ranks, are not seeking for the unity of the body of Christ, but for the pacific continuance of a non-instrument party or sect. And if every warring tribe which went forth to battle under a standard bearing the caption, "Vocal Music," agreed to bury the hatchet and smoke the calumet, this would not mean that the ekklesia of God was united. Indeed, if peace were restored to all of the heirs of the restoration movement it would not mean that the one body was now united, for the body of Christ is greater than any movement within it, and greater even than the restoration movement.

What is the foundation upon which we can unite our scattered forces, and then offer it to the religious world as the basis upon which we can build to answer the prayer of our precious Lord? What was proposed at the very outset of the Way, antedating all forms and ceremonies, and preceding all speculative and partisan debates? What can we present to the ecumenical world in our day which will contribute anything valuable to the search for oneness in the Lord of glory?

Many men who have grown weary with the attempt to unravel the tangled skeins of our own sectarian involvements have given up. They have argued and debated, fought and struggled, only to find conditions growing steadily worse. They despair of ever bringing order out of the complicated snarl, and have resigned themselves to continuing to stolidly slog along in the partisan path. They are bone-tired of the effort to argue out every angle of every wrangle, and adjust every action of every faction. What they forget is that this is not now, and never was the way to attain oneness.

In an ancient city of Phrygia, an oracle decreed to the populace that their next king would arrive in a wagon. At this very time, a poor country man, Gordius, with his wife and son, was driving his wagon toward the marketplace. He was wildly acclaimed and made king. Gordius sacrificed his oxen, dedicated his wagon to the deity of the oracle, and tied it in place with a large fast knot. A tradition developed that whoever untied the knot would be lord of all Asia. Many tried agonizingly to undo it, working their fingers to the bone. When Alexander the Great came to Phrygia he also tried, but becoming impatient, he drew his sword and cut the knot with one swift stroke.

We must take the sword of the Spirit and cut through the intricate involvements of our own sectarianism. This I have done in my own heart and for my own life. I have no time left for nit-picking and playing tiddly-winks inside of our partisan pillboxes. There is nothing noble about storming molehills which warped vision and defective eyesight have elevated to mountainous status.

Our Lord did not agonize on Calvary to purchase with his precious blood a mere party to defend to the death a position on cups or classes. The prophets of old did not endure stoning and torture, looking forward to a Golden Age when men, quoting their words for authority, would spill fratricidal blood upon forensic battle-fronts, striving over an opinion as to the meaning of the millennium, or the place of music in the presentation of praise to the Prince of peace.

There is only one creed endorsed by heaven as the basis of union and communion for the saints of God. There has never been another, and there never will be another! It is not related to human opinion, doctrinal deduction, or mental apprehension of an apostolic epistle. That creed is not a precept, but a person. Reduced to a proposition as a statement of faith, it is simply that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God."

When one believes this proposition with all of his heart, he believes all that God has ever required of any man, insofar as personal faith is related to salvation from sin. This is the divinely enunciated creed, and when one presents himself to me, professing his confidence in this as a fact, I am obligated to immerse him into that glorious new relationship signified by the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

I dare not create myself a one-man papal inquisitor, and probe his thinking as related to any theological speculation or philosophical opinion. Whether he deduces that Jesus will return before the millennium, or following it, or whether he has ever heard of the millennium, is none of my concern. He may know nothing about the thousand-year reign.

Whatever opinion he may hold with regard to the means for propagandizing the world with the gospel is none of my business. There is a world of difference between receiving and accepting the Good News as saving truth, and speculating as to the best method for disseminating it to a world lying in wickedness.

God has not authorized me to set up an immigration bureau and a customs office at the border of the kingdom of heaven, and demand that all of the weary pilgrims open up their mental baggage and expose their thoughts and concepts for my haughty and arrogant inspection. No one will be debarred from divine acceptance simply because of my obstinate refusal to stamp the approval of a self-important faction upon some article of rationalization. Everyone who has the passport of faith will be admitted exactly as I was allowed to enter, bringing along a motley assortment of mental notions and fancies, with which all of us must toy as we strive toward maturity. God does not demand that we divest ourselves of all our souvenirs and playthings in order to be his children, even though others of his children may see no significance in them.

Many of our brethren have rejected the compassion of Jesus for the conformity of Procrustes. This legendary tyrant, whose name means "The Stretcher," set up his iron bedstead near Eleusis, in Attica. Every person who passed by was forced to become a victim for his torture. They were made to lie down upon the bed and, if they were too short for it, they were hammered or stretched to fit. If they were too long they were cut down to proper length. But Procrustes was captured and slain by Theseus, who inflicted upon him the same torture that Procrustes has imposed upon his victims, cutting him down to fit the bed. The most frightening utterance of Jesus for many of our brethren, should be, "For as you judge others, so you will yourselves be judged, and whatever measure you deal out to others will be dealt back to you."

I want to make my own position clear. I want to do so now! I want my generation to know exactly where I stand. My creed is Jesus Christ! My basis of union is Jesus Christ! My test of fellowship is Jesus Christ! My criterion for communion is Jesus Christ! I have no other creed, and I want no other. I reject here and now, once and for all, any plea for unity based upon conformity to any metaphysical or philosophic deductions, or predicated upon the universal acceptance of any speculation or opinion elevated to doctrinal dogma. I care not one whit more for the unwritten creeds which have produced our particular parties than I do for the more formal ones which have spawned the sects.

I would as soon try to enter heaven with the Nicene Creed clutched in my hand as a possible passport to glory, as to try to pry open the gates of pearl with one of the unwritten "Church of Christ" creeds as a tool. But every man should have a justifiable reason for adoption of the creed upon which he bases his hope of relationship with the Father and the Son, and I am no exception.

My reason is very simple. I respect the Bible as God's word. I receive it without quirk or quibble. It is my only rule of faith and practice. I simply accept it as of divine origin, and seek to implement its disclosures in my own life and conduct. And I hold that the very core of revealed saving truth is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that this fact, substantiated by the best testimony available unto man, is the foundation upon which the community of the reconciled ones is built, and that there is no other foundation which man can lay!

1. This was the countersign of the rule of heaven among men, announced personally by the Father of mercies. It was the only pronouncement which came as a specific communication from God to mankind in direct conjunction with the mission of Jesus, and the voice came from heaven when Jesus was baptized in the waters of the Jordan. If God did not at this time reveal the foundation of our restored relationship unto Him, then He never did so, and the law of Moses which was inaugurated by his voice from heaven was more auspicious in its origin than the regime of His Son.

2. This was the abiding principle upon which Jesus declared he would constitute the community of "the called-out," and it stands in contrast to whatever other associations and identifications may be attached unto him by men. He is not to be confused with harbinger or prophet, for though their missions may be divine, they are not. The kingdom of heaven is erected upon the divinity of Jesus. This is the most sublime truth of all ages. When one stands upon it he is grounded in that against which the very gates of Hades are helpless and impotent.

3. This is the one foundation which has been laid for the unity of the saints. When Paul wrote to the fragmented and splintered believers in Corinth, his first great question was "Is Christ divided?" The second was a corollary to it. "Was Paul crucified for you?" Jesus is undivided and indivisible. No other man, not even a father in the gospel, can supplant Jesus as the basis of hope. When the apostle wrote, "There can be no other foundation beyond that which is already laid; I mean Jesus Christ himself," he was still talking about the cure for disunity among the brethren.

The foundation of the temple of God is a person, the Son of God. He is not only the Alpha, but he is the Omega. There is no one before him. There is no one after him. There is no other foundation beyond. "What think you of Christ? whose Son is he?" This is the universal question for mankind. It is the criterion of spiritual involvement with the Eternal One. If one is right about Jesus, he can be wrong about many other things and still be saved. If he is wrong about Jesus, he can be right about everything else and still be lost.

4. This was the burden of the Good News proclaimed by the chosen envoys of the King, when they were sent forth into an alien world. One of them wrote, "As for me, brothers, when I came to you, I declared the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom. I resolved that while I was with you I would think of nothing but Jesus Christ— Christ nailed to the cross." *Nothing but Jesus Christ! He wrote again, "Christ did not send me to baptize, but to proclaim the Gospel; and to do it without relying on the language of worldly wisdom, so that the fact of Christ on his cross might have its full weight."

What does this mean? It means that God has proposed to unite all who believe in Jesus, upon the basis of one great universal fact, a fact demonstrated and proven in the context of human history, a fact substantiated by credible human witnesses and by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven. It means that the one foundation of union and communion for the saints is Jesus, the Son of God, the personal embodiment of truth, and not some truths, or certain truths, not even those uttered by Jesus.

The kingdom of light is a kingdom of faith, and faith has to do with facts, not with abstract truths. All facts are true, but not all truths are facts. One who accepts him who is *the truth, thereby commits himself to the acceptance of all truths as they become known to him, but such truths can never become the basis of union, else our faith must stand in the developing wisdom of men and not in the eternal power of God.

The basis of our unity in Christ Jesus is not a compilation of propositions deduced from the scriptures by speculative theologians. It is not a formal code of morals or ethics drawn up in a conclave or convention. It is not even the sacred scriptures of the new covenant themselves. The saints were united before one apostolic epistle was ever written, and even now one may be relatively ignorant of the content of these letters and still be in Christ Jesus.

No personal experience of one in Christ, whether such experience is real or fancied, can ever become the criterion of fellowship in the Lord of glory. No one can impose such a personal experience upon another as a test of faith or worthiness, and no one can be deposed for testifying to such a personal experience. Those who seek to bind in all such cases show that they have another creed than Christ, and all who build their hopes alone upon personal experiences and phenomena are doomed to eventual disillusionment. It is only when an experience draws us closer to the heart of Jesus that it possesses any validity. It is Jesus who makes our relationship to any concept, happening, or experience valid, and not an experience which makes the relationship to Jesus a valid one.

Our relationship to Jesus stems from faith and not from knowledge or personal experience. Faith has to do with testimony, and testimony has to do with fact. The beloved apostle wrote that Jesus did a multitude of signs in the presence of his disciples. They saw them and knew that they were real. Out of this treasure of signs, the Spirit selected a number, and the very type, which would produce faith in any honest heart. These have been recorded, and they were written down that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and by believing this, we might have life in him. This is the life-giving fact. It is the only one. Other truths may strengthen us and stimulate us, but they cannot produce life. It is unfortunate that many of our brethren cannot distinguish between life and a stimulant.

Our problem in this age is that we have lost Christ in the Bible, we have lost the Bible in the church, and we have lost the church in the world. We must now rescue Jesus from the Bible or become like the scribes and Pharisees to whom Jesus said,

"You search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life, but their purpose is to testify of me. And you will not come unto me that you might have life."

Life does not come from searching the scriptures. The scriptures do not produce eternal life. The scriptures are a gift from God just as life is a gift from God. We have confused the love letters with the Lover; the Captain of our salvation with his orders; the fodder with the Shepherd; and the prescription with the Physician. We have eclipsed the Son of God with the wisdom of the sons of men. And by worshiping the scriptures instead of the Savior we often end up with a head full of quotations and a heart empty of Jesus. Christianity is not Jesus pointing us to a book, but a book pointing us to Jesus. The prodigal could have been preoccupied with a road map and remained in the pig pen!

We must recover the Bible from the church. The people of God have carried the word of God captive. Once more the book of God has been lost in the temple of God. It has been buried beneath a pile of partisan practices, cultural customs, institutional inventions, doctrinal deductions and sectarian sham. And we must reclaim the church from the world, not by taking it out of the world, but by taking the world out of it. These last two objectives will never be achieved until we accomplish the first. Jesus must again be crowned in our hearts as he has been coronated in heaven. Jesus the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth, Son of God, and Lord of life. This is my creed, and upon it I propose to meet every other soul upon this earth who is willing to commit himself to it. In closing I ask you to hear this from the pen of Alexander Campbell:

"When the Messiah appeared as the founder of a new religion, systems of religion consisting of opinions and speculation upon matter and mind, upon God and nature, upon virtue and vice, had been adopted, improved, reformed, and exploded, time after time. That there was always something superfluous, something defective; something wrong, something that could be improved, in every system of religion and morality, was generally felt, and at last was universally acknowledged. But the grandeur, sublimity, and beauty of the foundation of hope, and of ecclesiastical or social union, established by the author and founder of Christianity, consisted in this,— that the belief of one fact, and that upon the best evidence in the world, is all that is requisite, as far as faith goes, to salvation. The belief of this one fact, and submission to one institution expressive of it, is all that is required of Heaven to admission into the church . . . The one fact is expressed in a single proposition— that Jesus the Nazarene is the Messiah . . . The one institution is baptism into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit."

I have decided that, with the help of God, I will share with you, in these four lessons, some of the things which have impressed me as I read the first chapter of the first letter written to the Thessalonians. There will be nothing profound about what I have to say. Rather, I hope to present my thoughts in the simplest fashion.

Not long ago I visited the Saint Louis Zoo. It was animal feeding time and one of the keepers climbed a ladder and placed the provender for the giraffes in a wire basket high in a tree. A great many preachers act as if Jesus told Peter, "Feed my giraffes," but he did not. He did say, "Feed my sheep," and in order to do that one must put the fodder down where the sheep can reach it. I expect to keep my feet on the ground and stay close to earth.

The greatest temptation which I must resist, is that of delving into the historical background which makes the city of Thessalonica so fascinating and the words of the writers so interesting. None of the letters of the new covenant scriptures simply fell down from heaven, written and wrapped up in advance, and ready for instant delivery. Each one of them grew out of the human predicament and was written to meet a need or to supply a deficiency. To read them without taking into account the circumstances out of which they grew is like trying to diagnose a case while ignoring both symptoms and medical history.

However, in this case I must forego the pleasure of painting the scenery, in order to get on with the drama, and the naked stage must be dressed and colored by your own imagination. It is important that I remind you, however, that we are looking over the shoulder of an apostle and reading a personal letter written to a congregation of saints for whom he felt a deep and abiding affection. The new covenant scriptures are not a written code of legalistic requirements. Jesus did not nail one law to the cross and hand another one down.

The new covenant scriptures are a collection of love letters addressed to individuals and congregations. After all, Christianity did not begin with a book, but with a baby. It is not Jesus pointing us to a volume, but a volume pointing us to Jesus. The purpose of God's new revelation is not to develop great lawyers but loyal lovers. And what I say here will be dedicated to this purpose.

When Nell and I started dating, our courtship was carried on under rather trying conditions. I was traveling constantly conducting religious meetings throughout the United States, and my time was scheduled so fully I could not get free to journey to the southern part of Missouri to see her. But we wrote to one another every day for a year, until we finally decided to get married to avoid writer's cramp. After having wasted the best years of my life as a single man I married at the ripe age of twenty.

By this time I knew a love letter when I saw one. And I also knew how eagerly a person reads and thrills to every word written by one who is dear unto him. That is the feeling I now sustain to the letters tied with the ribbon of faith and preserved in that wonderful treasure chest called the Bible. This is truly my hope chest. It is not filled with souvenirs of a forgotten past, but with the glowing promises of a glorious future.

A few days ago I received a written request to visit a congregation and conduct a study in depth for five days and nights. It was personally signed by the three elders as an indication that they were mutually interested in the work. It cheered me up to know that all of them were united in the effort. The letter to the Thessalonians was also a joint project. It was signed by Paul, Timothy and Silas. One was an apostle, one an evangelist, and the other a prophet, yet they combined their efforts, without jealousy, to write to the brethren who had been converted to Christ through their mutual endeavors.

You will note that the letter is addressed to "the church of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ." This is interesting. It is not to the church of God, or the church of Christ. It is to the church of the Thessalonians. The word "church" is never used in the sacred scriptures to refer to a building, a structure, or even an organization. The church is people. We are in error when we talk about "going to church." It is the church that does the going. If we are not the church before we leave home, we'll not be when we get to where we are going!

I trust it will not offend you if I tell you that the word "church" should not even be in the Bible. It is not a translation of the original word ekklesia at all. It is really a sort of modified conglomeration of a wholly different word, not even related to the one it purports to translate. It comes to us from a combined form of kurios and oikos. The first is the word for "lord," and the second is the word for "house." It was borrowed from the days of feudalism, when the lord lived in a manor house atop the hill, and his serfs dwelled in rude huts below. There is not one thing in the word church or kirk, which defines, describes or designates a called-out people.

Alexander Campbell knew this when he offered a new translation to American readers, which he called "The Living Oracles." He did not once employ the word "church" in the text. He used "congregation" consistently. Perhaps the very best word in our day would be "community," and this is the one used in The Authentic Version, the only new testament translation by a Jew. He has Jesus saying, "Upon that rock, I will found my Community, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

I do not for a moment think that this will gain the approval of the brethren with whom I am associated more directly. They have appropriated the term "Church of Christ," and used it to denominate a party, which is a polite word for sect. And Romans 16:16 is a handy textual tool with which to hammer other sects into subjection. It would ruin too many signboards and pulpit hangings, if instead of reading: "The Churches of Christ Salute You— Romans 16:16," we read it, "All the Christian communities send their regards." Most of us are seeking safety by squatting behind the right sign, rather than seeking salvation by submitting to the righteous Savior. If God judges us by the inscriptions on our signs or tombstones, we've got it made. We are generally "asleep in Jesus," under one or the other.

A community is a concourse of persons drawn together by a common tie. And the common tie which drew the early saints together was the firm conviction that Jesus is the Messiah, and God's Son. They were not united because of a theological philosophy, a formal creed, or a written confession. One does not need to read too much between the lines to know that some of the brethren in Thessalonica had previously been a swashbuckling, swaggering, hard-as-nails type. And no wonder, for the city was chiefly populated with soldiers mustered out of the imperial army by Augustus.

When Paul and Silas and Timothy first arrived in town, you will remember that a bunch of rabble-rousing infidels had enflamed the loungers who belonged to the "Spit, Whittle and Argue Club," and started an inner city riot. This yelling, rock-throwing mob, violating all civil rights, kicked the door in at the house of Jason, who was a relative of Paul, and looted the premises searching for the preachers. Paul and Silas had to be spirited from the city at night under the cover of darkness.

In spite of all this furor, the faith got a toehold on the hearts of some of the Jewish leaders, and, in addition, a goodly number of Greek proselytes and a few influential women accepted Jesus. So the local commune of Jesus People actually constituted an underground movement which cut across racial and ethnic barriers, sexual differences and social lines. We must not forget this as we read the letters of Paul which were probably sometimes smuggled in, even at the risk of life.

It is not easy for us to remember that these brethren of ours had no church buildings, structures or edifices. They possessed no printing presses, mimeograph machines or duplicating devices. They had no offices, nurseries, libraries or educational wings. They produced no flyers, bulletins or mailing pieces. They had no Bibles, tracts or Sunday-School quarterlies. They were without television and radio. They could not tune into Herald of Truth, The Hour of Decision, or Revival Fires. They had no bumper stickers advising the pagans to "Read the Bible — It Will Scare Hell Out of You!"

They met in caves, catacombs, and third-floor lofts in the ghetto. They stealthily slipped down alleys to convene in private dwellings. There were no signs along the Via Egnatia, reading: "Church of Christ— Four Blocks South at 1200 Berean Road." It was hard enough to keep from getting your head cut off without telling the soldiers where to locate you, and advertising, "Everybody Welcome!"

When some people came in at the front door you always had to be ready to go out through the rear one. In those days the saints watched the door as intently as they now watch the clock.

So this was the way it was when the letter was written to the members of the commune in Thessalonica. And they could read it without distraction. No one was angry because the housing committee had installed a blue pulpit rug instead of a red one. There was no grumbling because the hole in the asphalt of the parking lot had not been repaired, or because the air-conditioning unit was not functioning properly. There was no meeting of the board to discuss the startling news that the nervy Baptists had purchased the failing shopping center in the next block, and were going to put up an edifice which would make the one owned by "the loyal brethren" look like a root beer stand. Aside from the fact that a few elders were burned at the stake and a few deacons were fed to hungry lions, there was not too much excitement.

"To the Community of the Thessalonians which is in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." I like that! Every community of saints had both a physical and spiritual location. We belong on the map as well as in the Man. Our feet are always in the clay although our hearts are always in the skies. Geographically, these saints were in Thessalonica, on the great paved road leading from Rome. But transcendentally, they were in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ. They were on the way which came from Rome and in the Way who came from heaven.

The writers employ some interesting expressions to illustrate our dual relationship. For instance, in 1 Thessalonians 2:14, they mention "the communities of God in Judea which are in Christ Jesus." In Judea and in Christ Jesus. We are in the world as well as in Christ. And in the world we cannot escape tribulation. We are partakers of both the agony and the ecstasy.

It would be a good assignment for you, when you can find the time, to read the two letters to the Thessalonians, and underline the expression Lord Jesus Christ every time it occurs. I think you will be surprised at the number of times you will find it. And it is very important because of its implications. It includes the three-fold relationship of the Son of God to the saints, the world and God. As Lord he is the ruler of our lives, as Jesus he is the Savior of the world, as Christ he is the anointed of the Father. Or, to put it another way, these signify the roles of authority, atonement and apostleship.

To be in Christ is to be identified with him, and to be a sharer in every facet of his life. As Lord we share in his direction, as Jesus we share in his death, and as the Christ we share in his destiny. We are governed and guided, saved and sanctified, grasped and glorified by the great Apostle and High Priest of our profession.

"Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." There it is again. That is twice in the very first verse. But now I want to focus in on this salutation. One reason I want to do so is because most of my brethren read, "Grace be unto you, and peace," as if they had stepped on a spiritual banana peel, or hit an icy stretch on God's sidewalk.

They race through it like we used to say our childish prayers, as if the gates of glory would bang shut promptly at the stroke of 9:00 o'clock, P.M., and we had to get our order in or take our chances. "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep; if I should die before I wake, I pray the Lord my soul to take— Mama, can I have a glass of water?"

But there is a great deal involved in the greeting— grace and peace. In the first place, all mankind was divided into two groups, the Jews and the Greeks. When one Greek met another, he always said, "Charis," that is, "Grace to you." But a Jew always said, "Shalom," that is "Peace." And the Good News of Jesus is God's dynamic to save both Jew and Greek. Both were represented in the community at Thessalonica, and so this greeting was catholic, or universal. It embraced all. No one could feel inferior, left out or slighted.

With but two exceptions, Paul began all of his letters in this fashion. Indeed, every letter written to a congregation, or group of congregations, began this way. Only in his letters to the younger preachers of the Good News, Timothy and Titus, did he add the third ingredient of mercy. These men were in dangerous spots and forced to endure hardships as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. And mercy represents God's attitude to those who are in distress. As W. E. Vine points out, "It assumes need on the part of him who receives it, and resources adequate to meet the need on the part of him that shows it."

There is one interesting feature about grace that I do not want to neglect mentioning. It seems to be a cherished word of Paul. Not only does he begin every letter that he writes with this word, but he also closes every one of them in the same way. He begins with grace and ends with grace. And Paul knew both the meaning and the power of grace.

He had been allowed some magnificent revelations and visions. God had lifted him up to the third heaven, and to keep him from becoming uplifted with elation and pride, he said, "There was given me a spike in the flesh, an emissary of Satan to prod me." He anxiously besought God three different times to rid him of this trial, but he said that God told him, "My grace is enough for you, for my power will be exhibited in full strength in your weakness." Yes, Paul knew what grace was. Do you know what it is?

In The New Preaching, Joseph Fort Newton writes, "A British Tommy gave me a synopsis of the sermon, and I can still see his big blue eyes and hear his soft voice as he told me point by point, what the preacher had said. The subject was The Grace of God, and the Tommy closed his account with exquisite courtesy in these words: 'The Minister told us that the grace of God is plentiful, sufficient for all need, and near at hand, but he did not tell us what grace is; perhaps you, sir, will be good enough to do that.'" Like that British soldier I think it is important to know what grace is.

And, at the very outset of any consideration of grace, as the term is used by the Holy Spirit, there are two things that are essentially a part of it. They are inseparably connected with it. They belong to the very essence of grace. One of these is beauty or charm. Grace is a beautiful word, a charming term. When the Greeks first began to use it, it no doubt designated physical beauty, for they were great admirers of this quality, as we can easily determine from their poetry and drama, as well as from their sculpture.

But words do not remain static. They grow and change as do the persons who use them. And charis came to be applied to inner qualities, to what we now call personality. When this happened, a gracious person was one who exhibited charming traits, such as kindness, politeness, hospitality and gentility. So the word graceful, which literally means to be full of grace, came to imply more than posture or carriage of body, and signified an inner nobility of character.

The second thing that belongs to grace in the scriptural context is that it is always a gift, and that it is bestowed freely, and without being earned or merited in any way. We can easily see how this came to be. The Greeks believed that physical beauty, as well as attributes of the soul, were gifts of the gods. Since aptitudes and abilities were manifested quite early in life, it was concluded that such charismata were wholly unearned, and were simply the free gifts of some deity.

Christianity captured the thoughts of men, as well as the words in which those thoughts were expressed and led them into captivity to Christ, making them his willing subjects. And never was a more prominent or important prisoner taken than the word charis, Under the influence of the creative Spirit it was transformed into a magnificent term which embraced the stooping down of God to share our earthly state, and bestow his very presence and self as a transforming gift, so that we could share his glory.

Grace is more than the love of God bestowed upon us as an attribute or characteristic. It is the God who is love, giving up glory and moving into the human sphere, being tested, tempted, tried, agonizing and sorrowing, and then triumphing over the human predicament and offering me not a handout, or even a hand up, but taking me up in his own arms, whispering to me that in him I am safe evermore.

It is both reasonable and scriptural that if God freely gave his Son for me, he will freely give me all things with his Son. Henry Nelson Wieman said, "The grace of God is the good which God puts into each concrete situation over and above all that man can do or plan or even imagine."

In a particularly beautiful statement, William Barclay wrote, "Grace is that power of God which clothes a man with day-to-day fortitude and strength. Grace is that power of God which adorns a man's life with lovely things. Grace is a man's day-to-day defence and inspiration. Grace is not only the strength of the mountain top; it is the source of strength for the ordinary road of the everyday." Indeed the word grace is a beautiful and charming word!

Now we come to the consideration of another beautiful word in the greeting to the Thessalonians— *peace. And we must be very careful or we will be influenced in our understanding by the warped views of this decadent age. Because of the fierce wars which have raged and disgraced the history of sinful man, we tend to think of peace as that state which exists between the periods when the guns are firing and men are being mowed down like ripened grain, or blown to bits. No wonder we think of peace as a fragile thing, a dove flying in the midst of vultures. No wonder we talk of uneasy truces.

But all of this has little to do with the peace of which Paul wrote. Paul was a Jewish rabbinical student, and he knew that shalom primarily signified wholeness. When a wall was being built and the last stone was put in place, and the proud workmen stepped back to admire their handiwork, "the peace of the wall" was realized. The wall was whole. When one was filling a large jar or cistern with water and the last container was emptied into it, and the water rose to the brim, the "peace of the water' was obtained. The jar was full.

God is rebuilding our lives and when he brings us to our full potential and fills up the broken places and gaps in our character, we have peace. God is filling our hearts which so long were empty and dry, and when we are brimming over with his love, we have peace. Hearts are like jars, they do not all have the same depth. But God can fill them all, and you can say as did the sweet psalmist of yesteryear, "My cup runneth over."

There was another sense in which peace was used. When long practice sessions had brought harmony to an orchestra, and every hand moved in unison across the strings, peace was attained. And when the broken strings of our hearts are repaired, and discord no longer jars the ear, and we vibrate in tune with the infinite, that is peace. Peace is harmony with God, the music plucked from the harp by the fingers of faith. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God."

The world cannot provide this peace. It can only come through union of the human and the divine. There is a very significant statement made by Jesus which I want to mention. He said, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you." The word leave is used in the sense of a bequest. Peace has been willed to us. You will recall that on the night Jesus was born in the stable, the celestial choir sang, "Peace on earth to men of good will." Jesus brought peace when he came to earth, but he did not take it with him when he left. He willed it to the saints.

But his peace is not the peace of the world, and he does not give it as the world gives. He was the bridge across the chasm between God and man. He spans the awful gulf eroded by sin. He took our broken lives, fragmented by sin, and put them all together again. He gathered up the shattered sherds and fitted them back in place and glued them with such love that God can once again use the earthen vessels to his glory. That is peace, the peace of God!

Ragnar Bring says, "The word 'peace' represents the Hebrew shalom, a creative peace involving spiritual and physical growth, strength, and power in contrast to anxiety, conflict, and everything that retards, divides and injures life. This includes both physical life and life in Christ."

William Hendriksen writes that peace is "the conviction of reconciliation through the blood of the cross, true spiritual wholeness and prosperity." Someone else has described it as "the composure of a holy affection, the sunshine of a settled purpose, and the sunlight of unclouded communion with God."

In 1887, a man by the name of Peter P. Bilhorn, found himself humming over and over the words, "Oh, wonderful, wonderful peace." He sat down at the table to write a poem into which these words would be incorporated, and ended up with a song which is in many of our hymnals. When he came to the fourth stanza, these words seemed to flow from his pen:

"In Jesus for peace I abide,

And as I keep close to his side,/p>

There's nothing but peace doth betide,

Sweet peace, the gift of God's love."

Our only hope for peace is in Jesus. True peace is from above. It is the gift of God. The world cannot give it, for the world does not have it. Either we must seek that peace and ensue it, as the Bible says, or we will perish. So long as we trust in planes and tanks, the modern horses and chariots of Egypt, so long will we know only agony and bitterness of spirit. No one ever caught this idea better than General Douglas MacArthur, who presided over the surrender of the Japanese, and said at the time:

"We have had our last chance. If we do not now devise some greater and more equitable system, Armageddon will be at our door. The problem basically is theological and involves a spiritual recrudescence and improvement of human character. It must be of the spirit, if we are to save the flesh."

May I in closing borrow again the words of the brethren of old, and say to all of the saints here present, "Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ."

Three Things to Remember

Contents

I deeply regret the need of disappointing you, but I must confess that I am unable to do what the world generally refers to as "preaching a sermon." Did it ever occur to you that no apostle, prophet or evangelist mentioned in the new covenant scriptures, ever "preached a sermon"? They preached the gospel, the kingdom of God, the word, the faith, the resurrection of the dead, and the baptism of repentance. They preached Jesus, and they preached peace. But not one of them ever "preached a sermon."

It was Origen who was credited with being "the father of the sermon," and he lived about two hundred years after Jesus was born. He was president of the first theological school, which was planted in Alexandria, Egypt, and it was this institution which the historian Mosheim said became the grave of primitive Christianity. After the days of Origen the church was preached to death instead of taught how to live.

As you probably realize the word "sermon" is not once found in the Authorized Version of the scriptures. This should cause some concern to those who profess to "speak where the Bible speaks and remain silent where the Bible is silent." In our day there is a growing revolt against the kind of preaching that we have been doing, since it neither comforts the afflicted, nor afflicts the comfortable. It should probably be put out in a long-play album with the label, "Preaching to Sleep By."

For the benefit of those of you who are tired from last night and who find it a little difficult to think at this hour of the morning, let me say that it never bothers me when people in my audience take a nap. I consider it a compliment of the highest order. I suspect that they feel safe and relaxed. They say to themselves, "You don't have to stay awake and watch Brother Ketcherside. He knows what he is doing and will not swamp the boat. Just take it easy, and relax, and he will get us through safely to the invitation song and never lose a passenger."

Sometimes those who do like Cain, and visit the land of Nod, actually give emphasis to what I am saying. Recently I was conducting a morning question forum and one dear old sister began to snore lustily in the key of C and in four-four time. Someone asked the question, "What do you feel is the real problem of the church in our day?" My explanation and her punctuation went about like this. "The gravest problem of the brethren, as I view it, is their apathy and unconcern. (Snore). They are asleep at the switch. (Snore). They are drifting and dreaming. (Snore). They have no idea what is going on around them. (Snore)."

But I must get on with my examination and analysis of the letter to the Thessalonians. I certainly do not want to be in the position of the long-winded preacher who was holding what was intended to be a revival in a rural congregation. Every night he dragged on and on, missing all of the good places to stop. The crowds grew smaller and smaller. Finally, he asked an old farmer what the trouble might be. The old brother replied, "I don't want to tell you how to preach, but my advice is that when you're through pumpin' you should let go the handle."

I want to ask you a rather pointed question. What do you think that brethren who once were associated with your congregation will remember about you? Will they recall envy, jealousy, strife, and squabbling? Will they remember gossiping, backbiting and character assassination? Will they call to mind the stubbornness and dogmatism of some who were determined to rule or ruin, boss or bust, drive or destroy? Will they remember only strife and division, and the heartaches accompanying these? Let me read for you a statement addressed to a community of saints by three brethren who knew them and loved them.

"We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers, remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father" (1 Thess. 1:2, 3).

There are three actions referred to upon the part of the writers— giving thanks, making mention, and remembering. It was the last which motivated the first two. What they remembered prompted them to give thanks and also to make mention of the saints in their prayers. This is interesting because I know a lot of preachers who wish they could forget what they know about some of the places where they have been. I also know some places that wish they had never heard of some preachers who have been there.

There were three things about the brethren which were retained in the memory of Paul, Silas, and Timothy, but before we discuss them, let us say a little about their prayer life. A great many brethren never think to give thanks for those from whom they are separated. Their motto seems to be, "Out of sight, out of mind." An old Indian chief was asked what lesson he had learned from civilization. His reply was "Ingratitude." And Shakespeare wrote that, "The sting of ingratitude is sharper than a serpent's tooth."

Another thing which impresses me is that the writers made mention of the congregation in their prayers. A lot of brethren take aim and then fire a blank at God. We need to mention names in our prayers. Blanket prayers may be the result of mental woolgathering.

You'll notice that the term "without ceasing" occurs here and elsewhere in conjunction with prayer. For a long time translators were hazy on the meaning of the Greek word. When I was much younger I thought it meant without stopping, and I wondered when one would get his breath. But a few years ago discovery was made in Egypt of an old letter written on papyrus and dating back to apostolic days. In it the writer used the term translated "without ceasing" when describing an "incessant cough." So the word means "constantly recurring." If one prays regularly every day he prays without ceasing. Not long ago a brother in the Lord told me that he and his wife had read the Bible without ceasing for ten years, a chapter each day.

1. WORK OF FAITH

The first thing the writers commend is the work of faith. W. E. Vine says this refers to the initial act of turning to God, the response of the heart of integrity to the Good News about the Risen Lord. In verse 9 of this chapter, we learn that the Thessalonians turned to God from idols. The word for "turn" is the word translated "converted." And conversion is always the voluntary act of the individual in response to the presentation of truth. In spite of the radio preaching constantly assaulting the air waves in this day, it is demonstrably true that not once does the Bible say that God, Christ, or the Holy Spirit ever turned or converted any person. Turning to God is an act of will, a deliberate choice.

The proclamation of the Good News has been committed to men. It is not now the work of Jesus, the angels, or the Holy Spirit. We have this treasure in earthen vessels. It is not the privilege or prerogative of celestial beings. It was earthly disciples, men in the flesh, who were commissioned to go into all the world. They were to proclaim the Good News to every creature, every created being. It is God's purpose that the message be taken to men by men.

Faith is the belief of testimony, and testimony has to do with facts. All testimony to be believed must be rendered credible. It must be validated for one cannot believe that which is incredible. But once rendered credible, the honest heart responds to it spontaneously and gladly. So faith becomes the motivating force which causes us to turn our backs upon a life of sin and turn our faces toward him who is our hope and our salvation.

One of our failings is to give a glib answer without thinking through what we are saying. If you ask the average person to define faith, he will quote, "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." But that is not a definition. It is a description, and there is a great deal of difference between defining a thing and describing it.

Hebrews 11:1 informs us of the substance of faith, but if I say that the substance of a table is wood, I do not define a table. Actually, the writer is pointing out to us the ingredients of faith. As respects those things for which we hope, faith is a firm conviction; as respects the realm of the unseen it is a firm confidence. But I can list the ingredients of a cake without defining cake.

One day I was meditating about the faith which justifies, that is, which places a man in that position where God can regard him as guiltless, not reckoning sin unto him. As Paul puts it, "Happy is the man against whom the Lord does not count sin." Really that is my only ground for hope and I know it, and I like to think about it and ponder over it.

I became deeply involved in what Paul said about Abraham who is called the very father of the faithful. He was the first person of whom it is said that he believed God, and his belief was counted unto him for justification. He was exonerated of guilt and his faith was reckoned as rectitude. And the beauty of the whole thing is that the promise of God is to all of Abraham's seed, even to those who are his children by faith, and I am one of them.

Abraham had no physical basis upon which to ground his hope that he could become the father of many nations. Everything was against his right to expect God's promise to be fulfilled. But he ignored all of the obstacles and triumphed over all of the doubts. "His faith never weakened with consciousness of the impotence of his own body— he was nearly a hundred years old at the time— and of Sarah's incapacity for motherhood. He did not challenge the promise of God incredulously, but strengthened by faith, he gave credit to God."

And now we come to the capsheaf. Here is what faith is all about. It is absolute trust in God regardless of circumstances. The book says that Abraham was fully persuaded that what God had promised, he was able to perform. The very next verse adds, "And therefore it was counted to him for justification." Faith is complete reliance upon God's word. It is the undaunted conviction that the performance of God will match the promises of God.

When this conviction is kindled in the heart of a man, it results in commitment to the one who is the object of faith. It is interesting to remember that the word translated "commit" in the King James Version is the word for faith. The writers of the Thessalonian letter remembered the joyous acceptance of Jesus by those who heard the Message.

There is a wonderful statement made later in this letter, in chapter 2:13. "For this cause also we thank God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but as it is in truth, the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe."

The word of God here is the gospel, the Message of hope, and when the Thessalonians heard it, they recognized that it was not simply a dissertation from men.

They saw beyond the messengers, and received the Message for what it truly was, the word of God, the disclosure of heaven's will. And the gospel became operative in the lives of those who believed it. They made a complete change, not only of direction but also of dimension. It was so profound that it was like being born again. They turned from idols to serve the living and true God. They became a new creation. Old things had passed away, all things had became new.

2. LABOR OF LOVE

The second thing which impressed the writers about the Thessalonian brethren was their labor of love. Just as the motivation for their action in turning to God was faith, so the dynamic for their service to one another was love. Faith brings us together in the Lord and love holds us together in him.

A famous newspaper once sponsored a contest in which a prize was to be awarded for the best definition of love. Here is the winner. "Love is the doorway, through which the human soul passes from selfishness to service and from solitude to kinship with all mankind." It is evident from the letter we are studying that the Thessalonians had passed through the doorway from selfishness to service.

And this reminds me of a beautiful thought which occurs in the translation of a statement in 1 John 3:14, as given by J. B. Phillips. "We know that we have crossed the frontier from death unto life, because we love the brethren." John adds that the one who does not love his brother remains in the No-Man's Land of death. Have you crossed the border which separates death and life? Is there a way by which you can know if you may stand up and breathe more easily? John says the test is love for the brethren. If we hate them we are still wallowing in the swamps of death.

The word for love is the Greek agape. It is a special word in the new covenant scriptures. The Holy Spirit captured it for the use of God, and invested it with new value, and gave it a depth of meaning which it did not have before. It literally took on a new dimension of height and depth, so it can be said that God is love. I want to mention some of the attributes of this love. This will enable you to determine if you possess it and if it is the motivating factor in your every act of life.

1. This love is not a mere emotion or passion. You cannot command an emotion. But you can command this love because Jesus said, "A new commandment I give unto you, that you love one another as I have loved you." Commands are given to be obeyed, and obedience is an act of the will. If Jesus tells us to love our brethren we must do it. Because this is an act of will, and not merely of our feelings, we can even love our enemies. Someone sent me a plaque for my wall which reads: "Love Your Enemies— It Drives Them Nuts!" The command is correct, the motivation is questionable.

2. This love does not manifest itself because the object is worthy or deserving. If it did God could never have loved us at all, and we would all have been damned. Agape is creative. It conveys its own value to the object or person and invests that object or person with its sense of worth so that love is possible.

3. This love is never hampered, restricted, or deterred by external circumstances. It is steadfast and not intermittent, constant and not occasional. Jesus never got anyone out of what he was in to love him. He loved him to get him out of what he was in. He did not say, "Straighten up your life and I will love you." He loved people and they straightened up their lives.

4. This love is not merely the giving of things to supply needs, but rather the sharing of self. Since God is love, when he sent the Son to share our lot it amounted to love becoming embodied, so that, in beholding Jesus, we could see divine love activated in our behalf. One can give things as a blind to keep from giving self, or as an escape from becoming truly involved. Love is involvement of one's life in the life situation of others.

5. This love is always active and not passive. It is ever seeking avenues of service. It is outgoing and outreaching in constantly expanding circles of influence. It is more a demonstration than it is an affirmation. One who truly loves another must do something to show it. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." The word to be emphasized in that statement is the word "so." God loved the world in such a manner that he had to do something about it.

Love validates every gift that we receive and use. If we had the power to employ the languages of men and the dialect of heaven, without love we would become like a sounding brass or a clashing cymbal. Love also validates every gift we bestow. If we gave all of our earthly possessions to feed the world's poor, and offered our bodies to be burned at the stake, it would profit nothing without love.

Love labors to help others who are caught up in the human predicament. It shares the burdens, carries loads, and relieves distress. It is the introduction of the God-dimension into human problems, the creativity of heaven meeting the tragedy of earthly existence.

God is its author, Jesus is its exemplar, the Holy Spirit its conveyor. It is the criterion by which the world judges our discipleship and the rod by which we measure our own spirituality. It is the light of the world and the life of the spirit. It is the oasis in the desert, the guiding star in the sky, and the mountain peak of glory and grace.

3. PATIENCE OF HOPE

Faith, hope and love— these are the three abiding principles when all else has fulfilled its destiny and vanished. When tongues are no more, when prophecies cease, and when knowledge granted as a gift, has had its day, these three continue unabated. And the community of saints in Thessalonica had them all. They had the faith that worked, the love that labored, and the hope that endured. No wonder they were always fresh in the memory of those who knew them best.

Their patience was engendered by their hope. Patience is the steadfast endurance which causes one to keep on, especially under difficulty, or when facing trial or persecution. It is putting up with things which go against the grain. It is making allowance for those who do not work the way you would like to see it done. It is resisting the impulse to fly off the handle. And it is staying with the thing that needs doing even though you are tempted to throw up your hands and walk away from it all.

In Mexico there is a famous statue by Jesus Garcia. It is called "In Spite Of." During the time the sculptor was working on the piece he lost his right hand in an accident. He resolved that he would finish the statue so he learned to carve with his left hand and painstakingly continued, doing even more meticulous work than before. When the statue was completed it was called "In Spite Of."

A Chinese student told how he was experiencing difficulty with his scholastic assignments in college. He wrote one thesis three times and still it did not suit him. In a fit of anger he rolled his manuscript up and tossed it into a clump of bushes, and started back to town to resign from the college. On his way he saw an aged and wrinkled peasant laboriously rubbing a small crowbar against a rock. "What are you doing?" he asked. "I'm making a needle," came the reply. Ashamed at his own lack of persistence, the student went back, retrieved his manuscript and eventually won his degree.

It was Ralph Waldo Emerson who wrote, "The hero is no braver than an ordinary man, but he is brave five minutes longer." And it was James J. Corbett, once the heavyweight boxing champion of the world, who said that the secret of the successful fighter was to fight one more round than his opponents. He should have known because his first fight, with Peter Jackson, resulted in a draw after sixty-one rounds.

There are few men who have struggled with such patience as did Thomas A. Edison while trying to discover an effective filament for the electric light bulb. One after another of the substances he tested in his laboratory proved unsuitable but he redoubled his effort, sending men to China, Japan, Asia, South America, Ceylon and Burma to seek for fibers and grasses. But our own nights are turned into day because of his never-say-die spirit.

I have always thrilled to the story of Glenn Cunningham, who once broke the record for running a mile. When he was still a young boy he became badly crippled in a schoolhouse fire. When he left the hospital the doctors told his parents that if he ever walked again it would be a miracle. But slowly and painfully he forced his legs to act, and then began following a walking plow, so he could lean upon the handles while maneuvering his feet over the uneven ground in the furrows. Hour after hour, day after day, he exercised his legs until he broke all track records for the mile run. This is truly running with patience the course that is set before one.

Not alone in the Bible is patience linked with hope. The philosophers of the past have had a maxim that "patience is the art of hoping." Hope has to do with the unseen and is always related to the future. Paul writes, "For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it" (Romans 8:24, 25).

Hope is a combination of desire and expectation, in equal proportions. There are some things that you expect but do not desire. You cannot be said to hope for them. When I was a youngster the old folk went on the basis that the worse a thing tasted, the better medicine it would be. Of all the vile tasting concoctions which man has devised none is worse than castor oil. When I became ill and developed a fever I expected that they would hold my nose and drench me with castor oil. But anyone who thinks that I desired it has another and a lot better "think" coming! So I did not hope for castor oil!

There are other things that you desire but do not expect. We were desperately poor and yet when I saw my first Packard I think I desired it. However, I did not expect it, so I would gladly have settled for a Model T Ford. Desire is not transmuted into hope until it is accompanied with the same degree of expectation as wishfulness.

It is a grand thing to know that the saints in Thessalonica had a hope that reached beyond the misty flats of the Jordan of death. And that hope gave strength to endure. It developed patience in spite of hardships. In the very next chapter the writers remind them that they became "followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus, for ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews."

All of this ought to make us bow our heads and blush in shame when we think of the trivialities which cause us to lose faith. It is absurd and ridiculous to fall out with one another over some of the little opinions which have caused us to fragment and split the body of God's blessed Son in the past. Surely we will be held accountable in the last day for our lack of patience and forbearance, for our intolerance and dogmatism. We need to recapture again the work of faith, labor of love, and patience of hope, which were so commendable in the days when the apostles were still upon earth.

Faith is the key which unlocks for us the door to the treasures of God's wonderful grace; love is the glowing spirit which causes us to share the bounty freely with others; and hope is that attitude of heart which confidently expects that there are other rooms beyond and greater treasures yet to come. Faith is the cord which binds us to the cross of yesterday, love is the dynamic which bonds us to the Christ of today, and hope is that joyous expectation which beckons us to the crown tomorrow.

Faith is the unfurling of the sail to catch the winds of God. Love is the vessel in which we are transported across the stormy waves of life. And hope is the anchor to the soul, reaching down into unseen depths and fastening upon the Rock of Ages. I cannot see the anchor but I can feel the tension upon the line and I know that tomorrow will be better than today! And now abideth faith, hope and love— these three— but the greatest of these is love!

The Dynamite of God

Contents

It was in June, 1957, that American television viewers first saw Tariri. He had been a Peruvian headhunter, a jungle dweller living in a world of fear and superstition, driven by centuries of tradition to stalk other tribesmen and kill them, and to cut off their heads as grisly trophies of the successful hunt. But a great change had taken place, and now he was appearing on the Ralph Edwards show in Hollywood called "This Is Your Life."

Here is what happened as told in the unadorned speech of this primitive chief of the remote Shapra tribe. "I had been angry and thought, I want to kill all the upriver people. But God said, No. God won. I was never like this in the old days. I was powerful, and I was always angry. I thought a lot about killing. Because I used to kill that kind of people, word got around about me, news gets around about me now. 'It is because Tariri loves God that he does not come to kill us,' they say. 'It is as if there were no Tariri. Even though Tariri was a killer, God changed him.'"

How did God do it? The answer is simple. He did it through the dedication of a woman, Rachel Saint. It was her brother, Nate Saint, who was pilot of the missionary plane which carried four other men and himself into Auca country and to their death from the spears of those whom they had sought to reach with the message of Jesus. When news came of the death of the men, the missionary wives and sisters resolved to stay on, and they did so, to witness the triumph of Christ over the very ones who had killed the proclaimers of the Good News.

Rachel Saint had taught Tariri, chief of the powerful tribe, and had watched the change which God wrought in his heart and that of his family. To this very day his son, Tsirimpo, is ministering to a group of tribal believers, whose thirst for human bloodletting already seems like a bad dream from the misty past.

Several years ago, a magazine which is one of the most popular in the world, printed the astounding story of an island in the South Pacific, which had been inhabited by people who were cannibalistic, crude and barbarous. During the war with Japan the island was taken as an observer base, and several years after the surrender of Japan an investigating team visited it to see what had happened to the natives who had disappeared into the bush where they remained during military occupancy.

The members of the team were astounded to find a clean village inhabited by hard-working and polite natives, whose moral conduct was exemplary. Hardly able to believe their own eyes they enquired what had happened. The American air observers had adopted a young boy whom they found skulking not far from camp, and for pastime had taught him to read and speak English. When they evacuated the island, one of the men gave him a New Testament, and told him to read it and do what it said, and he would live forever.

That boy read and translated every word over and over again, and the whole tribe accepted what was read as a message from the skies, since it had been brought by men in a plane dropping out of the clouds. In their simplicity they were trying to follow the directions as nearly as possible, and their lives had been completely changed. They had ceased to drink or even to make fermented liquors, and they no longer fought with one another. They had developed an advanced ideal of sexual purity, and had banished selfishness and greed from their lives.

Leslie D. Weatherhead relates an intriguing story in his book, In Quest of a Kingdom. It is the tale about a man who was making a speech at a missionary convention of which he was the chairman. He declared that he had helped to found a flourishing community of Christians in a remote part of India, even though he had never been out of England. When he was five years old he had a penny which he wanted to donate to mission work, but he would not put it in the brown missions box with the slot in the top. He was not sure that the pennies which went into the box would ever be used to purchase Bibles.

Fortunately, the aged minister, willing to gratify his stubborn whim, agreed to sell him a copy of the New Testament for his penny. The minister wrote the child's name and address in the front of the book and gave it to a missionary to pass along to someone in India. One day a native who had walked several days and many miles to reach the mission station and ask for a copy of the testament was given the book the boy had purchased.

Twenty years went by and nothing was heard of the incident. Then a missionary went to a distant community where he was certain the gospel had never been heard. He was surprised when he began to expound the scriptures to see the excitement and delight that his words were causing. He stopped speaking and began to enquire about the enthusiasm. No preacher had ever visited the area before. But the little Christian community had been born, instructed and edified by the man who had walked so many miles, and by the book he had brought back, a book purchased for a penny given by a little boy of five in a distant part of the world.

I have not cited these incidents because of the romance of their nature. I want you to realize that God's word can still effect powerful changes in our day. Its potency has not ebbed out. It has had no leakage. The little girl, when arguing with her sister who said Timothy was the last book of the Bible, was right when she insisted, "I tell you the Bible does not end in Timothy, it ends in Revolutions." Toyohiko Kagawa wrote, "The New Testament is a wonderful instrument for purity and for holiness. When you start a Bible movement, it means revolution, a quiet revolution against darkness and crime."

It is extremely important that we remember this, because we live in an age of skepticism and in a world of doubt. Men who do not deny that the power of the gospel toppled the corrupt Caesars from their thrones, and swept across the ancient pagan world like a prairie fire, are a little reticent about crediting such force to it in our day. We are victims of the corroding influence of the world about us.

We are accustomed to reservoirs of power which drain away and go flat. Flashlight batteries which produce a shining beam at first soon grow dim from usage and cease to be effective. Automobile batteries generally last only until the guarantee expires, and when one runs out the other runs down. In a world of manufacturers accused of planned obsolescence it is hard for us to believe that something which was generated nineteen centuries ago can maintain its potential.

Coupled with this is a fallacious notion that anything old can no longer be valid. For awhile we were subjected to the raucous cry that we should not listen to one who is over thirty. Fortunately, those who raised the cry are now over thirty and the din has subsided. A thing is not necessarily good because it has recently arrived, nor is it necessarily bad because it has been around awhile. Not everything perishes with the using.

Any rationalization which suggests that God's word has lost its effectiveness overlooks several factors. One is that the revelation is vitalized by the Holy Spirit. It is thus alive and energetic and sharper than a sword with two edges. W. A. Visser 't Hooft, of the World Council of Churches said, "In Holland the people thought that the Bible must contain dynamite, because the Nazis were so anxious to destroy it, so they reopened its pages to find the dynamite— and they found it."

Another thing is that God has promised that his word will outlast the material universe. A black brother told his audience, "When the end of the world comes I'm going to lay my Bible down and stand on it, because God said that heaven and earth will pass away, but my word will not pass away. I had rather be standing on the Bible than standing on the earth, and I am just going to stand on it until I am caught up." A voice from the audience shouted out, "Amen, brother, I'm not waiting for the undertaker, I'm waiting for the uppertaker."

Of course this naturally raises the question of why the gospel had such an amazing effect in the days when the apostles proclaimed it, and why it has such little impact in our day. Certainly there is no simple answer, but we need to investigate the manner in which Paul presented it, for we are well aware that even dynamite in the hands of an unskilled user can be both ineffective and dangerous.

Perhaps there is no place where we can better study the technique of Paul than at Thessalonica. The second chapter of his first letter is a veritable arsenal of facts related to how we should regard the gospel and those who are hearers. In the first verse the apostle says, "For yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain." He then reminds them of his attitude and effort in a remarkable way.

But I am especially interested for the moment in verse 5, of the first chapter. Here in one sentence we have the four items about the way in which the gospel came, and which kept the entrance from being in vain. Listen! "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and with the Holy Spirit, and in much assurance."

We must not conclude that because it came not in word only, that it did not come in word at all. It is a grand truth that when God proposed to communicate his will to man, he chose the highest form of communication which men use in communicating with each other, that of speech. And human speech makes use of sounds, which properly combined, transmit thoughts and concepts from one mind to another.

Words are tools, and it is obvious that one may exhibit greater skill if he has more and better tools with which to work. But we must not be trapped into believing that we can do nothing until we develop a sophisticated vocabulary. David Lipscomb used to say that any person who could give another directions by which he could find the postoffice, could tell him how to get to heaven.

It is possible that we may actually obscure the divine message by resorting to what Paul calls "the words which man's wisdom teaches." He asserted that when he went to Corinth he declared "the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom." And he said, "The word I spoke, the gospel I proclaimed did not sway you with subtle arguments."

In Romans 16:18 the saints are warned against those who "seduce the minds of innocent people with smooth and specious words," and in 2 Timothy 2:14 the brethren are cautioned not to strive about words to no profit. Repeatedly the scriptures speak of vain words, empty words, and idle words. It is not the proficiency in words which makes one a faithful proclaimer. The wise king of old said, "A fool's voice is known by a multitude of words."

The gospel is news, good news, and news is best conveyed in words. The one who would share the news with others, must reveal the word of God in the words of men. But it takes more than mere words. We may confuse the salvation with the vehicles in which it is delivered, and if so, we may admire the vehicles to such a degree that we never embrace the salvation. It would then be a little like a man who adores his automobile and neglects his wife.

Paul and his helpers are explicit in reminding the Thessalonians how the message of heaven was brought, and received. If we can get this picture in our minds we can understand our responsibility. Chapter two, as we have previously mentioned, is a gold mine for the eager student, and every preacher should analyze it to ascertain what should be our correct attitudes and motives.

1. The gospel was boldly proclaimed. 'We declared the gospel of God to you frankly and fearlessly, by the help of our God" (verse 2).

2. The motives of the proclaimers were above reproach. "The appeal we make never springs from error or base motive: there is no attempt to deceive" (verse 3).

3. God's terms regulated the proclamation. "God has approved us as fit to be entrusted with the Gospel, and on those terms we speak" (verse 4).

4. There was no appeal to popularity. "We do not curry favor with men; we need only the favor of God, who is continually testing our heart" (verse 4).

5. There was no indulgence in flattery for personal gain. "Our words have never been flattering words, as you have cause to know, nor, as God is our witness, have they ever been a cloak for greed" (verse 5) .

6. There was gentleness in approach. "We were as gentle with you as a nurse caring fondly for her children" (verse 7).

7. There was deep love manifested. "With such yearning love we chose to impart to you not only the gospel of God but our very selves, so dear had you become to us" (verse 8).

8. The lives of the proclaimers matched their message. "We call you to witness, yes and God himself, how devout and just and blameless was our behavior to you who are believers" (verse 10).

9. There was individual fatherly concern and discipline. "As you well know, we dealt with you one by one, as a father deals with his children, appealing to you by encouragement, as well as by solemn injunction, to live lives worthy of the God who calls you into his kingdom and glory" (verses 11, 12).

10. It was received as a divine and not as a human disclosure. "We thank God continuously, because when we handed on God's message, you received it, not as the word of men, but as what it truly is, the very word of God at work in you who hold the faith" (verse 13).

11. The faithful obedience of the consecrated hearers made them the joy of the proclaimers. "For after all, what hope or joy or crown of pride is there for us, what indeed but you, when we stand before our Lord Jesus at his coming. It is you indeed who are our glory and our pride" (verse 19).

The gospel did not simply come in word, but also in power. It is an interesting thing that when we read this term we generally think of miracles. Perhaps this stems from the fact that there is no unique word for miracle in the new covenant scriptures. The word so translated is the word for power. Transliterated, it becomes our English *dynamic.

But it is a mistake to equate the word invariably with signs and wonders. There is no mention of such demonstrations at Thessalonica, and to always link power with special manifestations is to ignore the fact that there is an inherent force in the gospel which is of its very essence, as is the case with dynamite. To postulate that there is no power except when it explodes in a special manner is to do an injustice to the nature of the gospel.

It is argued by those who disagree with what I am saying that I am substituting the enthusiasm of the messenger for the power of the gospel. That may not be a serious crime seeing that enthusiasm literally means "indwelt by God." And certainly it is true that the effect of a message will be governed to some extent by whether a speaker is listless and apathetic or energetic and forceful.

All of us have heard of the preacher who was holding forth to small audiences in a hall on one side of a street, while an actor was playing to capacity crowds twice daily in a theater directly across from him. When they met at a luncheon the preacher asked, "Why is it that you attract so many more listeners, who even pay to get in to see and hear you, when I am proclaiming the truth, and you are presenting fiction?" The actor replied, "Perhaps it is because I present my fiction as if it were truth, while you present your truth as if it were fiction."

But there is a power in the Message which is not conditioned upon the personality of the messenger. The Message is essentially news, and it is news of such a nature that the person who believes it will be moved, changed and transformed. If this were not the case there would be no accounting for the well-attested circumstances in which people have had nothing but the written word and yet have been completely re-oriented in their life styles. They never heard or saw a gospel preacher and certainly never saw a miracle worker.

If the Word of God is embodied in the words the Spirit has selected, then that Word is the animating, vitalizing principle of those words. The letters and symbols become the members of the body of truth, but truth itself is the spirit without which that body and those members would be dead. Just as Christ invaded the earth in a human body, so now the Eternal Thought permeates the world in a body of human language. And just as one was crucified in a gray yesterday so the other is often nailed to the cross in the shining present.

The gospel came also in the Holy Spirit. Of course the Holy Spirit came also in the gospel. But there is a difference. The Holy Spirit cannot be confined, enclosed or encompassed in a message, not even in a divine message. The Holy Spirit can and does use a message, but to argue that the Spirit cannot, therefore, freely move is to abuse the Spirit. What the Spirit does, and what he can do are two different things. The Spirit is not the source or fountain of authority or power, but a divine agent of it.

No one here today even questions that the Spirit operated through signs, wonders and miracles in the ministry of the apostles, the special envoys of Jesus to an alien world. In the first place, he provided credentials as a validation of their claim to represent a ruler whose throne was in a different realm and invisible to his earthbound subjects. Earthly ambassadors required human credentials, but heavenly ambassadors required divine credentials.

Accordingly, signs, wonders and miracles, are called "the signs of an apostle." They are just such things as human reason would demand of one who came announcing that he had a word of reconciliation from a heavenly monarch with whom we had been at enmity. All credentials are subject to forgery, and there can be lying signs and wonders. For this reason the message which is alleged to be confirmed must be consistent with the divine purpose, and the credentials must be consistent with divine power. If the credentials appear to be genuine but the communication is out of harmony with the divine will, the ambassadors must be rejected. Certainly if men appeared before a foreign ruler and showed credentials indicating that they represented our nation, and then, submitted proposals wholly unworthy of such a government as the United States, their message would be rejected even though their credentials appeared to be in order.

Again, the Holy Spirit confirmed the message with signs, wonders and demonstrations of power. This simply means that it was rendered credible to the human mind. Since belief is the result of the application of the mind to testimony related to fact, and since one cannot believe that which appears to him as incredible, it is essential that any testimony must be confirmed, validated and rendered reasonable to be accepted. Again, testimony related to the material requires only material proof, while that related to the spiritual requires spiritual proof.

I have examined carefully the credentials of the envoys and the communication of their message. I am fully persuaded that the men were called, qualified and commissioned by the Son of God during his earthly sojourn, and that they exercise authority under him through the terms of the treaty which they executed in his name. I have also become convicted that their message is true and that my hope of eternal glory depends upon my embracing it and enthroning it as the very basis of my life.

Jesus did many more mighty works on earth than are recorded. The reason for this is quite simple. In his journeys he met those in various areas who were afflicted by the same infirmities, and a repetition of miracles was required. But when the time came to write them down the Spirit exercised selectivity, choosing only those essential to make believers of men possessed of honest hearts. So John writes, "Many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples which are not written in this book, but these are written that you might believe." I am happy and thrilled to say that I do believe these records, fully, completely, and without equivocation.

Finally, the gospel came in much assurance. The same original is used in Colossians 2:2, where Paul expresses the desire that the saints may "come to the full conviction which understanding brings." It is used in Hebrews 6:11, where the writer longs "for every one of you to show the same eager concern until your hope is finally realized." It is used in Hebrews 10:22, "So let us make our approach in sincerity of heart, and full assurance of faith."

Putting these together, we see that assurance is a full conviction which stems from proper understanding; it is an eager concern which is prompted by the promise of God; and it is a firm conviction which derives from faith.

The opposite state is one of uncertainty and doubt. It is this which characterizes so much of the preaching in our day, and it leaves men frustrated, frightened and fearful. Thomas Carlyle said, "Tell me only of your certainties, I have doubts enough of my own." Peter Forsythe wrote, "Unless there is within us that which is *above us, we shall soon yield to that which is *about us."

A man without the assurance of faith is described by James as a restless wave, driven by the sea and tossed. And he is said to be unstable in all of his ways. Marcus Aurelius, who was born just about twenty-five years after John wrote the Revelation letter, said, "Man must be arched and buttressed from within, else the temple wavers to the dust."

I have always been intrigued by the story of George Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, as we generally think of them. Because he opposed the religious establishment, he was repeatedly imprisoned on various trumped-up charges. Eventually, the soldiers of King Charles were sent to arrest him, and see if they could shake his faith and get him to recant. Nothing they could do caused him to flinch the least bit or to even weaken. In their report the soldiers said, "He is as stiff as a tree, and as pure as a bell." That is a good recommendation coming from the opposition.

In closing, let us summarize the ways in which the gospel must come to be effective. It must come in words, selected and chosen and adapted to the capacity of those whom we seek to reach. It must come in power, demonstrated by our own changed and transformed lives. It must come in the Holy Spirit, the agent of God to transmit divine thought to the hearts of men. And it must come in full assurance or conviction of its origin, veracity or ultimate triumph.

The message must be presented plainly, it must be presented powerfully, it must be presented profoundly, and it must be presented positively. Jim Elliott, who was one of the five missionaries to die under the impact of Auca spears in the jungle, spent one summer before he left for Ecuador, preaching to Indians on a reservation. In a journal which he kept were found these words: "Glad to get the opportunity to preach the Gospel of the grace of our God to stoical, pagan Indians. I only hope that He will let me preach to those who have never heard the name of Jesus. What else is worth while in this life? I have heard of nothing better. 'Lord, send me.'"

Later that summer, he wrote: "He makes his ministers a flame of fire. Am I ignitable? God deliver me from the dread asbestos of 'other things.' Saturate me with the oil of the Spirit that I may be a flame. But flame is transient, often short-lived. Canst thou bear this, my soul— short life? In me there dwells the Spirit of the Great Short-Lived, whose zeal for God's house consumed Him. 'Make me Thy Fuel, Flame of God.'"

I should like to hope that this day each of us will make his prayer this simple and humble request. "Make me Thy Fuel, Flame of God."

When Dwight L. Moody was at the height of his power, a reporter was sent to discover the secret of his success in winning men. He wrote: "I saw at once. Moody was simply bubbling over with the glory of his message. He reveled in it. His joy was contagious. Men leaped out of darkness into light and lived the Christian life from that hour."

I have often thought that I should like to speak sometime on "The Contagion of Joy." It was this which gave the Way its impetus when it was introduced into the sick and jaded world of the Roman Empire. Men were tired of the old religions with their imaginary and artificial gods. They were glutted even to the point of satiety with their own vice, and they were filled with despair and a sense of futility. When the Gospel came, it was introduced into a world where men were preoccupied with death, and suicide was glorified as hope.

No wonder men and women praised God when men came bearing the tidings of great joy. This was the very atmosphere which members of the Way breathed. The prophets of old, standing in the midst of stark desolation and destruction, had turned the telescope of God until they could look into the future, and had dared to predict that "with joy, the servants of God shall draw water from the wells of salvation." And anyone who lets his bucket down into the cool depths of the word spoken by Isaiah, for example, will haul it back up to find it brimming with joy, and lapping over the edges on others.

He speaks of the day when the deaf will be able to hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind would see out of darkness and obscurity, and he says, "The meek also shall increase their joy in the Lord, and the poor among men shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel" (29:18, 19).

In a beautiful passage in which he describes the day when men would see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God, and which was written to strengthen the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees, he almost exhausts the vocabulary of praise. "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (35:1, 2, 10).

Comfort and redemption from God provide the motivation for rejoicing. "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem, for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem" (52:9). In talking about the power and effectiveness of the word of God, which waters thirsty souls like the rain and the snow, the prophet declares, "For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands" (55:12).

The new creation of God was to be one in which the former troubles were forgotten, and even the new wine in the cluster would be a blessing. Listen! "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy. And I will rejoice in Jerusalem and joy in my people: and the voice of weeping shall be heard no more in her, nor the voice of crying" (65:17-19).

But I must not spend all of my time with Isaiah, much as I like to visit with him. Any time I need an uplift in spirit, all I need to do is to put a sign on the door reading "Closed for today," and head for Isaiah's house. And when I have had a chat with him, I come away walking on air, and ready to take on the devil barehanded, and wrestle him all over the landscape. What I have read is just a little bit of what Isaiah said about joy, and he is just one of the prophets.

Jeremiah has always been called "the weeping prophet," but did you ever see anyone laughing and crying at the same time? When Jeremiah considers the sins of his people and their fate, he talks about rivers of tears. But when he thinks of God and his grace it is different. It was Jeremiah who said, "Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart: for I am called by thy name, O Lord God of hosts" (15:16). He even talks about skipping for joy, and that means acting like a child who has just learned you are going to take her to a picnic.

Were the prophets correct? Did the coming of Jesus usher in a time of joy? It was distinctly said that he would substitute beauty for ashes, and the oil of joy for mourning? Did it happen that way? The night he was born the angel of the Lord appeared "to certain poor shepherds asleep in the field." And the angel almost scared the daylights out of them, even though it was night. But hear this. "And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Great joy! The reconciling grace of God was launched on earth on a tidal wave of joy!

That joy remained unabated in the disciples of Jesus when he returned to heaven. "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." In the very next breath he adds, "This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you." Jesus speaks about his joy and his commandment. And he talks about our joy. His joy becomes our joy when we keep his commandment, and his commandment is that we love one another as he has loved us.

There are some chapters in the Bible which stress a certain theme until they seem to be a veritable exposition of one idea. We call Hebrews 11 "the faith chapter." We call 1 Corinthians 13 "the love chapter." We call Romans 5 "the much more chapter." Then there are some letters which are noteworthy for their key words. Hebrews is the "better" book. The word "better" occurs thirteen times in the thirteen chapters. James is outstanding for the usage of the word "perfect" and Ephesians for "together."

If I were asked to suggest the keyword for 1 Thessalonians it would be "joy." This is not the main emphasis. That is the coming of Christ. Every chapter closes with that theme. But the arteries of the letter throb and pulsate with joy. This is the pulse beat of the letter. Into this provincial city the coming of the gospel had brought joy which completely re-oriented the lives of all who had found Jesus. They received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Spirit (1:6). They became the hope and crown and joy of the gospel proclaimers (2:19). The next verse makes the simple affirmation, "For ye are our glory and joy."

In an almost effusive and emotional statement, Paul says, "For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?" (3:9). The core of the letter seems to be found in the two words, "Rejoice evermore." In the face of this we have a right to ask what has happened to the followers of the Way in our generation. What happened to the vitality, the effervescence, the bubbling joy of yesteryear?

Last year I attended a great convention in Texas. It was magnificently arranged by a large college, and there were thousands present on the campus. The program was excellent and a printed copy in booklet form was presented to each registrant. On the cover of the booklet was a photographic shot of part of the audience the previous year. I've seen a lot of melancholy, gloomy and dejected faces in my lifetime. But I never saw a more somber or grumpier looking lot of folks in all of my life than were in that picture.

Down home where I was reared, about the worst catastrophe that could happen to a man was to have his favorite coon dog to get killed in an accident. They used to tell of a stranger who came through and ran over a dog lying in the road. The man who promoted him to "canine heaven" went to the nearby cabin, and asked the woman who came to the door wiping her hands on her apron, if her husband was at home. She replied, "No he's not. He is plowing on the back forty. Why?" 'Well," the stranger said, "there has been a rather distressing event occur. I just ran over his dog and killed it." The woman screamed and then started crying. When she composed herself until she could talk she said, "O my goodness, what will we do? My husband has been puny and ailing lately, and his heart is cutting up on him. Don't just tell him flat out his dog is dead, or it will kill him. Break it to him as gently as you can. Tell him first it was one of the children and work up to it gradually."

So when we saw anyone who had a long face, or was "down in the dumps," we always said, "He looks like someone just ran over his best dog." And that's the way these brethren looked at this convention, or lectureship, of Christians. They all looked as stern as one of our preachers on the first seat at a Baptist revival. There wasn't a smile in a carload. Joy and happiness had fled the scene. Sorrow and sadness had moved in to take over. I do not know how we will be able to attract many people if we always look like we are on the way to the death house, or have come down with a bad case of "intermittent uglies."

Epictetus was a Stoic philosopher who lived at the same time as the apostles of our Lord. He was actually banished by the same emperor who also banished John to the island of Patmos. I want you to listen to a quote from his pen. "I cannot give credence to a philosopher who professes to have found the secret of high living, and the power to conquer evil, if he speaks without animation, in a hangdog fashion, with the face of a condemned man on the way to execution, and a moustache drooping in such a melancholy fashion that it seems to reach down to his knees. He does not look like a conqueror to me."

The attitude in which you accept the gospel will have a great deal to do with how you express it. Paul says to the Thessalonians, "The welcome you gave the message meant grave suffering for you, yet you rejoiced in the Holy Spirit." Perhaps this is one of our problems. No sacrifice is required, no suffering incurred, in accepting the message. Men who no longer must give their lives for Christ, are not too eager to give their lives to Christ.

This is an age in which we have "instantized" everything. We have instant coffee, instant tea, instant potatoes, and instant milk shakes. The chief selling point is "It's easy." We want instant salvation with no sacrifice or struggle. And sometimes we cannot appreciate its worth because we do not recognize its cost. The early Christians knew. Paul said, "I die daily!"

If, in spite of the sin, sickness, sadness and suffering, in this world, we move through it like sojourners and pilgrims, filled with joyful anticipation of reaching our home beyond, we will influence perceptibly those about us. Tertullian, who was a pagan philosopher, and who came to Christ, declared that he and most of the converts who came out of paganism, were not won by reading books or hearing sermons, but by seeing how Christians lived and died.

When Lord Chesterfield returned from a visit with Fenelon, the archbishop of Cambrai, he said, "If I had stayed another day in his presence, I am afraid I would have become a Christian, his spirit was so pure, so attractive and beautiful." The power of a Christian life which exudes joy is illustrated in a statement by Peter who urges wives to respect the authority of their husbands, and says, "If there are any of them who disbelieve the Gospel they may be won over, without a word being said, by observing the chaste and reverent behavior of their wives."

When William Dean Howells visited Tolstoy, he wrote to a friend, "I can never again see life the way I saw it before I knew him." Joseph Twitchell spent an afternoon in the home of Horace Bushnell, who was rapidly nearing death. When Twitchell arrived home he wrote in his diary, "A I left the house, I felt a lively sense of things eternal, and a desire to live in them."

The story is told of a student, deeply troubled, who decided that he would take his question to the office of Phillips Brooks. When the interview was ending, it suddenly occurred to the caller that he had not even proposed his question, and had completely forgot his disturbing problem. But he said, "Never mind. What I needed was not the solution to a special problem but the contagion of a triumphant spirit."

I am glad to know that the Thessalonians received the Good News with joy. I am also thrilled that they followed the example of Paul, Silas, Timothy, and the Lord. We always do better when we have someone go ahead of us so we can follow his lead. The Greek word here used is one which appears in our trade name mimeograph. Graph is to write, and mimeo is to copy, or duplicate. That is what we are to do, reproduce in our lives a copy of the original.

Not long ago I heard a psychologist speaking, and he pointed out how essential it is for parents to set a proper example before their children even from the time of birth. It was his theory that most children developed their habits by being "mimics" of their parents. Chimpanzees and other anthropoids try to mimic those who stop in front of their cages, so we speak of "aping" someone when we talk of mimicry.

The original term means to be imitators, and Paul points out to the Thessalonian saints that they well knew what kind of men the preachers were. He says, "That was the kind of men we were at Thessalonica, and it was for your sake." Just as parents need to be careful of their conduct before their children, so those who are fathers in the faith must be cautious about their behavior. Congregations of saints often reflect the traits and characteristics of those who helped to plant them, and sometimes example speaks much louder than words. Oliver Goldsmith wrote, "People seldom improve when they have no one but themselves to copy."

But there is another interesting thing about the Thessalonians. They not only became imitators of the proclaimers and Jesus, but they also became models for other believers. Paul says, "You were examples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia." The letter was written from Corinth, the chief city in Achaia, to Thessalonica, the chief city in Macedonia.

The word here rendered "examples" is the Greek tupos, our word type, and it literally meant a mould, a pattern or a model. When Greek sculptors, who were the most skilled of any in the world, were commissioned to create a piece of statuary, they first made a miniature replica in clay, so they could follow this model in scale. The word they employed is the word the writers use here.

And it reminds me of the man who listened in when his wife and another woman were talking about the merits of their husbands. The visiting woman was very critical of her husband, citing all of his faults and failings. But when it came time for the hostess to speak, she simply said, "Well, I suppose that I married a model husband." As soon as the voluble visitor had departed the proud husband came in and said, "Honey, I want to thank you for complimenting me so highly." His wife asked, "What do you mean?" He said, "Well, you told that woman I was a model husband." His wife said, "Before you swell up and burst the buttons off your shirt, I'd suggest that you check the word 'model' in the dictionary." He did, and this is what he read: "Model. A small imitation of the real thing."

When we talk of type today we speak of that which leaves an impression of itself upon paper or some other substance. You can tell exactly how the type appears by looking at the impression. We speak, in the printing industry, of typeface, and what happens is that the face of the type is brought into direct contact with the paper and it leaves its distinct mark upon it. Thus it should be with us as Christians. In our face-to-face encounters with others in the world, we should leave upon them an unerasable impression. The world, by seeing them will see a reflection of our own faith.

That is exactly what happened in the case of the brethren in Thessalonica. Their influence radiated abroad and touched the lives of people whom they had never seen. This is a little bit amazing when contrasted with some of the explanations in our day, used as excuses to justify the insipid lives which we lead. Here were people under the influence of a profligate government, completely surrounded by a materialistic and militaristic influence, living in a cesspool of vice and violence, and subjected to all the pressures of a pagan culture with its constant demands for conformity to a skeptical philosophy.

Into this maelstrom of emotional hangups came an itinerant Jewish tentmaker to tell the story of one who spent thirty-three years of his life in a remote and despised province, and who was finally crucified under the accusation of his own people, at the hands of a company of Roman storm-troopers. But the story got through to the hearts of callous heathen, and those hearts were strangely warmed. Looking beyond the unprepossessing appearance of the missionaries they saw the truth of the message.

Harassed and ridiculed by their friends, threatened by the law, deprived of their civil rights, and cut off of the national welfare program, they heard the call and they answered it. They surrendered themselves to the demands of a new Lord and resolved to walk in his steps regardless of the cost. They threw themselves into the service of Christ with utter abandon, not even counting their lives dear unto themselves.

An now comes a statement which thrills my very being every time I read it. The King James Version reads, "From you sounded out the word of the Lord." But I want to read from the New English Bible translation. "From Thessalonica the word of the Lord rang out; not in Macedonia and Achaia alone, but everywhere your faith in God has reached men's ears. No words of ours are needed, for they themselves spread the news of our visit to you and its effect."

We need to read this over and over and allow it to trickle down through the crevices of our hearts and water every fiber of our beings. Few of us in these days have any realistic conception of how the Message advanced and cut its way through the Roman world. We are conditioned to think of huge campaigns, vast crusades, tremendous promotion projects, and great advertising budgets. But the spread of the faith had no relation to any of these.

Nor was it circulated by well-trained preachers following a smoothly-flowing program with flawless timing and preceded by media publicity. The opposition had all of this. When the Way made its thrust into the Greek world it was face-to-face with pagan orators, scholastics and rhetoricians, who have never been equalled in any other generation. God had chosen the foolish things to shame the wise. To shame what was strong he chose what the world counted weakness.

One of the first great opposers of the Way was Celsus. He hurled every conceivable kind of charge at the followers of Jesus, but he reached the depth of contempt when he affirmed that this execrable faith was not propagated or promulgated by thinking people and recognized men of wisdom. He charged that it was spread by sailors, leather-dressers, wool-combers and shoe-cobblers. His complaint was that salvation purporting to be from the skies was promoted by the scum of the earth. The Way had no professional pulpiteers such as the philosophical schools produced.

History bears out the validity of his criticisms and the truthfulness of his objections. A slave girl whispered the story of Jesus into the ears of a haughty mistress as she combed perfumed unguent into her tresses. A worker in a stinking tannery shared the message with a fellow-laborer as they scraped a dripping hide taken from the vat. A shopkeeper, squatting among his wares, told the prospective customer that God had visited the earth in the form of a Son. The tentmaker informed those who wove and stitched that the Word had been made flesh and brought his own tent with him.

Everywhere men traveled, the question was asked, "Have you heard the Good News?" It was the subject as travelers met in the inn, or traders met in the marketplace. The husband returned from work to tell his family as they dined. The visitors to the public bath discussed it while they reclined after their ablutions. Sailors discussed it on their ships, soldiers talked about it as they sat around the evening campfire.

Today we "sound in" the word instead of sounding it out. We pay men to rehearse in our ears what we should be speaking in the ears of others. We refuse to free those who have the ability to take the Word of life to the dying. We want them to spend their time talking about life to the living, Jesus refused to spend his time with those who thought there was nothing wrong with them. He said, "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." He went to publicans and sinners, instead of to Pharisees and the sanctimonious.

But we have reversed the order. We've created a nice country club in which the doctors prescribe only for the other doctors. And we know the prescription by heart. Even when one of the doctors changes the name of it, we can see through the ruse in three sentences, and we can recognize it as the same old tranquilizer, and go back to sleep. If we pay for preaching we want to hear it, and frequently we decide it is not worth what it is costing. We change doctors and start over, and often the new doctor is sicker than the patients.

What is the answer? It is simple. And it does not mean to fire the preacher, or drop out of the congregation— the only two alternatives recognized by the shallow-brained and empty-hearted. Don't fire the preacher, but free him! Free him to go where God intended for him to go in the first place— to the world. The gospel is for the world, not for the church. You cannot evangelize saved persons. We train a man to proclaim salvation and then make a congregational flunky out of him.

Preachers are expected to run around frantically refereeing little dog fights, soothing ruined feelings of half-converted hangers-on and camp-followers, and generally being organizational front-men for the projection of a community image, which we worship instead of God. They are saddled with more red-tape than a congressional committee, and are not allowed to be decent husbands and fathers because they are on call around the clock to listen to griping and pettifogging by those who are resolved to complain all the way to the gates of heaven— or wherever they are going. You've heard about the good old brother who had a stock answer for his friends who said, "After all, we are all going to the same place." "Yes," he said, "and if we are not careful we will all get there."

But what will we do if we set the captives free— the captive preachers, that is? Start sounding out the word! Tell the Good News! Tell it to your children and grandchildren. Tell it to your neighbors and friends. Tell it to your clients and patients. Tell it to your chance acquaintances as well as your long-time associates. Create a pulpit out of your desk at the office, or out of your bench in the shop, or out of the wheel of your tractor.

Sound it out! Sound it out at home. Sound it out in the car pool on the way to work. Sound it out at the cafeteria table at noon. Sound it out in your neighbor's livingroom. There are no holy places since Jesus came, there are only holy people. There are no sanctuaries built by men. The only sanctuaries are created by God. He is not worshiped in temples made with hands, call them cathedrals, synagogues, churches, or what you will. He is worshiped in the inner vaults of hearts which praise him in everything, including mowing the lawn, washing the car, trimming the hedge, and eating pizza or hamburgers. If you cannot take Jesus into a pizza parlor or hamburger hut you had better stay outside with him.

The early saints did not send out missionaries— they were missionaries! Every Christian was a priest of God, every disciple was a minister. Until we recapture the ideal of the priesthood of all believers, and the ministry of all the saints, we are just nibbling around the edges of restoration. We will only be the new testament church when we start acting like the church of the new testament. In God's program there are no big "I's" and little "You's." Every person is important. We are not mere cogs in a wheel, we are all children in a family. We are not parts in a machine. We are members of a body.

The man who shows up in coveralls to fix the lights in the meetinghouse is ministering unto God. The young people who sing in a home for shut-ins are ministering unto God. The woman who sits down and reads Bible stories to her children before she tucks them into bed is ministering unto God. The other day a man said to me, "Our minister took a bunch of brethren over and painted the house of a widowed sister." I said, "That's great, but your statement is backwards. You mean that our brother took a bunch of ministers over and painted the house of a widowed sister." Our speech betrays us!

In the last great day this is the ministry that will really count. Only once did Jesus paint a picture of the final judgment scene, with the Son of man in his glory and all of the nations before him, with the sheep on his right hand and the goats on the left. Jesus did not say to those on his right hand, "Welcome, you blessed of my Father, because you never missed a meeting in twenty years— or, you memorized the whole book of James— or, you argued Mormon missionaries to a standstill— or, you gave ten dollars every time they passed the plate."

The thing that will count is the way you related to the needs of others. "For when I was hungry, you gave me food; when thirsty, you gave me drink; when I was a stranger you took me into your home, when naked you clothed me; when I was ill you came to my help, when in prison you visited me." We've got God's program in reverse. Jesus said, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." We come, not to minister, but to be ministered unto. We've got the cart before the horse, and we are backsliding while we think we are going forward.

Let's get with it! Let's sound out the word, in speech and in service. If we start serving we'll stop slipping. There is a difference between a brick of gold and a gold-brick. Paul did not tell us to walk worthy of our vacation but of our vocation. Let us restore happiness and joy to our lives. Once George V was asked to inscribe a message on the flyleaf of a Bible, and he wrote, "The secret of happiness is not to do what you like to do, but to learn to like what you have to do."

One of my wife's favorite columnists is Erma Bombeck, and now she has me reading after this clever and witty writer. I want to share with you, in closing, what she wrote under the heading, "Where is Joy?" It says what I would like to say far better than I could ever say it.

In church the other Sunday I was intent on a small child who was turning around and smiling at everyone. He wasn't gurgling, spitting, humming, kicking, tearing the hymnals or rummaging through his mother's handbag. He was just smiling.

Finally, his mother jerked him about and in a stage whisper that could be heard in a little theatre off Broadway said, "Stop that grinning! You're in church!" With that, she gave him a belt on his hindside and as the tears rolled down his cheeks added, "That's better," and returned to her prayers.

What must they think, these children of the 70's? We sing, "Make a joyful noise unto the Lord" while our faces reflect the sadness of one who has just buried a rich aunt who left everything to her pregnant hamster. We chant, "If I have not charity, I am become a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." Translated in the parking lot it comes out, "And the same to you, fella!"

Suddenly I was angry. It occurred to me the entire world is in tears and if you're not, then you'd better get with it. I wanted to grab this child with the tear-stained face close to me and tell him about my God. The happy God. The smiling God. The God who had to have a sense of humor to have created the likes of us.

I wanted to tell him he is an understanding God. One who understands little children who pick their noses in church because they are bored. He understands the man in the parking lot who reads the comics while his wife is attending church. He even understands my shallow prayers that implore, "If you can't make me thin, then make my friends look fat."

I wanted to tell him I've taken a few lumps in my time for daring to smile at religion. By tradition, one wears faith with the solemnity of a mourner, the gravity of a mask of tragedy and the dedication of a Rotary badge. What a fool, I thought. Here was a woman sitting next to the only light left in our civilization . . . the only hope, our only miracle . . . our only promise of infinity. If he couldn't smile in church, where is there left to go?

The Real Revolutionary

Contents

On June 21, 1971, Jesus appeared— on the cover of Time. It was an attractive cover, making use of psychedelic colors, a design in mixed media by Stanislaw Zagorski. And above the head of Jesus was a halo, a rainbow bearing the words, "The Jesus Revolution." Inside the magazine twelve full pages were given over to the story. Six of them were devoted to pictures done in sharp focus and in living color.

It isn't that Jesus is in the news like Richard Nixon, Spiro Agnew, Moshe Dayan or Jimmie Hoffa. Jesus is the news. The gospel of Jesus Christ is the Good News that Jesus came, lived, died, and lives again. Even death, the great leveler, could not wipe him out. Men took him down from the cross, wrapped his immobile body in a winding-sheet, swathed his agonized countenance in a napkin, and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed him. But she could not digest him, or mix his elements with her cosmic atoms. Jesus arose. He came forth from the dead!

Now the editors of Time are "sharp cookies." They are not likely to be led down a false trail. You are not about to con Headley Donovan into turning over exactly one-seventh of his slick-paper magazine to one who is not news. And Richard Ostling, the New York-based religion reporter can scent where the action is like a blooded pointer can find birds huddled in a thicket. So it was that Jesus arrived on Time. He made the scene — in Time.

But this is only one of a number of publications which have publicized the greatest thing that is happening in our world. Actually Time was a little late! There was the special write-up in Look which stole a march on many others. You got your Look ahead of Time. Now Look was one of those would-be, blase, sophisticated, modernistic journals, whose editors flattered themselves that they could interpret life for the swingers in this pagan culture. But this time something happened.

They dispatched their team to southern California where several thousand young people had been immersed in the blue breakers of that ocean whose name means "peaceful." In their article there was none of the smart-aleck, tongue-in-cheek, double-entendre kind of writing which has characterized the columns in the past. The photographer turned his lens on young people who had fought the clawing drug monkey on their backs, who had sold their virtue and pawned their own flesh for the devil's juice to plunge into the screaming veins. Now, dripping wet, but cleansed and purged within, they were shouting and leaping, and praising God, like the poor cripple who confronted Peter and John at the temple gate called Beautiful, more than nineteen centuries ago.

The interviewer tried to trap some of them into admitting that it might be another fad or simply a new diversion, a plaything for the erratic and unstable. But it didn't work. The newly cleansed insisted that they had been born again from above and it was either Jesus or nothing. Their words were reminiscent of the long ago. "Where else can we go?" they asked, "He has the words of eternal life." And you know the outcome. The reporter and photographer, amazed at what they saw and heard, publicly confessed their faith that Jesus was the Messiah and the Son of God, and were baptized into his name.

One of the most astounding things that has happened is that Jesus captured a two-column spread on the front page of the organ of finance, The Wall Street Journal. The frantic bidders on the Exchange who regard this daily sheet as their Bible, must have done a double-take when they read the lengthy report of how Jesus of Nazareth is once more moving into the hearts and minds of thousands in this age which has a difficult time deciding if it belongs to Aquarius, or to that modern Moloch, which devours statistics, the Computer.

Men who left their expensive apartments and rode the commuter trains into the noisy heart of a great city, read as they rode, but what some of them did not realize was that their own sons and daughters, who had fled from affluence, as if they were escaping from the plague, were even then reading the Bible in a distant commune, drinking the water of life in great gulps, eating the bread of life in huge chunks, to quench a burning thirst and stifle a gnawing hunger.

I know because it has been my privilege to be with them in several "Jesus People" communes. I can testify that they are searching the word of God with a fervor that should shame many of us who are older. In one place it was the practice to fast until 9:00 o'clock each morning, and to devote at least two hours to the study of the Book before feeding the physical man. And some of those who were doing this were from wealthy homes where they had everything at their command which money could buy.

I want to note with you some facts about the current "Jesus Revolution," as elicited by the reporters for Time in their research. They call it an extraordinary religious revolution, and here are a few descriptive terms which they apply to it. They refer to it as a startling development, and speak of uncommon morning freshness, a fire with a Pentecostal passion, a buoyant atmosphere of hope and love, and an extraordinary sense of joy. When New York religion reporters write this way, something is happening.

Since I am identified with the "straight world," I am always being asked certain questions. There are generally two prominent ones. The first one is always, "Is it real?" The second one is, "Is it a fad, and will it soon pass away?" The reporters for Time answer the first question by saying, "There are signs that the movement is something quite a lot larger than a theological Hula-Hoop, something more lasting than a religious Woodstock." It is pointed out that it cuts across all social dividing lines, it already shows staying power, its appeal is ecumenical, and its own adherents believe that we are on the threshold of the greatest spiritual revival that the United States has ever experienced.

If I divide my own life into three eras of equal length, the last third is by far the most exciting. It isn't supposed to be that way, but it is! In the decade which began with 1950, it appeared that nothing could turn the young people on. They were apathetic, indifferent and unconcerned. When I went to a school to speak I would consult the administration to see what I might emphasize in order to help. Invariably I was informed, "Our greatest problem is the apathy of the students. They simply accept life as it is. They never question anything. They are not seeking any changes. They will not march for any cause. If you could kindle a little fire under them it would help us a great deal."

I never hear that anymore. I am now asked to fight the flames, not fan them. No high school principal calls an assembly these days and suggests that the kids build a little fire under the school. He is fortunate if they have not already burned his office, and especially the records containing their grades. New terms have arisen to describe students, words like militants and activists. The sluggish fifties were replaced by the slugging sixties.

Unfortunately, a lot of young people were like the man who ran out, jumped on his horse and rode off in all directions at once. Daniel Boone was asked upon one occasion if he had ever been lost in the woods. He replied that he had never been lost but he was mighty bewildered for three days one time. I am not saying that all of the young people were lost, but a lot of them were mixed up. And a lot of them are honest enough to admit it because they are smart enough to know it.

They tried a lot of things seeking for some meaning to life. They introduced a drug culture, sniffing, drinking, injecting and ingesting chemicals. They deliberately sought to blow their minds to avoid minding the blows which the world deals out. And most people of my age condemned them as a crazy lot, a hell-bent, harum-scarum, no-good bunch, who couldn't be trusted as far as you could shoot a paper wad with a weak rubber band.

I confess that I never felt that way. Even when the psychedelic craze was at its peak, and minds were going into orbit with a riot of scintillating colors accompanied by soul-jarring, spine-tingling, muscle-twinging musical noises, I believed that an honest, but misplaced effort was being made to transcend the world with its pretense and its emptiness. And although I deplore escapism, even in the church, I clung to my personal view that the drive which prompted it all might be legitimate and could sometime channel into a worthier purpose. God can use man's mistakes to guide him toward a nobler path.

In the same way I regretted to see the confusion of sex with love, and of faith with mysticism and cultic philosophy. Yet I know that men must sometimes follow false gurus until they learn from bitter disillusionment that there is only One who never leads astray. And now we are in another decade and there is a great change. In the midst of a neo-pagan culture Jesus has moved into a lot of hearts and lives, and we've come full circle. Jesus of Nazareth is again being proclaimed as lord of life and hope of a new world. That is what it was all about then, and that is what it is all about now!

Why is it thus? The answer is simple. Jesus is the greatest revolutionary who ever set foot on earth, and he simply will not [step] down. Napoleon Bonaparte said to General Bertrand: "I know men; and I tell you that Jesus Christ is no mere man. Between him and every other person in the world there is no possible term of comparison. Alexander, Caesar, Charlemagne, and I founded empires. But on what did we rest the creations of our genius? Upon force. Jesus Christ founded his empire upon love; and at this hour millions of men would die for him."

William Lyon Phelps, of Yale University wrote: "Jesus knew more about political economy than all the professors in all the colleges in the world, and he knew more about the human heart than Shakespeare. While I am not sure of many things, I am just as sure as that I stand here that Jesus is the greatest leader, the most absolutely right person the world has ever known."

Ernest Renan, the eminent French historian and philologist, who always seemed to have trouble with the divine Sonship of Jesus, was forced to admit: "Jesus was the greatest religious genius that ever lived. His beauty is eternal, and his reign will never end. Jesus is in every respect unique, and nothing can be compared with him."

What the world seems always to forget is that Jesus is the same yesterday, today and forever. What happened when he was here among men, happens repeatedly. Men listen to him, wonder about him, laugh at him, make wisecracks about him, and reject him with disdain. The Pharisees and Sadducees seek to trap him with their theological questions because he will not line up with any sectarian establishment.

The Herodians set political snares to trip him up and make it appear that he is aligned with one party or another. Legalists curry his favor only to learn that man was not made for laws, but laws were made for men. The greedy try to use him to act as administrators for earthly estates, and the schemers follow him for the loaves and fishes. When they cannot use him, they abuse him. When they cannot bend his will, they blindfold his eyes. And then they kill him!

We make a mistake if we conclude that men cannot crucify the Son of God afresh and put him to an open shame. But it always happens that Jesus bursts out of the tombs in which men place him. One day the announcement is sent out over radio and television that God is dead. Men look at the verbal stones that close the mouth of the sepulcher and wonder who will roll them away. Then, like a bolt out of the blue, Jesus has come back again, and the God is dead voices seem like faint whispers receding with the winds of time.

And now Jesus is once again moving into lives, capturing them, cleansing them, and channeling them into the Way. Pop-ups, drop-outs, teeny-boppers, bobby-soxers, long-hairs, short-hairs, bright-eyed, sad-eyed, screwballs, oddballs, agonistic and angelic— when Jesus zeroes in on them and zaps them, he disarms them and they flack out on the funeral procession and join the victory march! The harder they are the harder they fall. The tougher they come the softer their melted hearts become.

Pot-smokers, skin-poppers, vein-pushers, once high on everything from ''hash'' to ''horse,'' give it up. Like the madman who dwelt in the tombs, and ran around in the nude, violent, dangerous, and frightening, they are found sitting at the feet of Jesus clothed and in their right minds. Those who were strung out on dope now sing out for the Lord. When Jesus moves in on the promises, the demons vacate the premises. Only the one who hung upon the cross can effectively get rid of the hangups in your life. He knows you like your parents do not. He knows you better than you know yourself. He is the right way up for an uptight generation.

Jesus is the same— yesterday! Not was the same. There is no past tense to Jesus. He is the eternal I Am. Yesterdays are for human beings like ourselves. The earth has yesterdays, but heaven does not. What kind of revolutionary was Jesus in the world's yesterday? A revolutionary is one who changes the existing order. If he is an idealist he does not seek change merely for the sake of change. In such cases the changed state may be worse than the original.

Jesus knew that the only change worthy of sacrifice is the change that makes for the betterment of humanity. And that kind of change alters the world by transforming those who are in it. So Jesus came with no grandiose political scheme for social betterment, no research document with charts and graphs to present to the Roman Senate. He knew that the heart of all our problems was the heart itself.

Jesus said, "What comes out of the mouth has its origins in the heart; and that is what defiles the man. Wicked thoughts, murder, adultery, fornication, theft, perjury, slander— these all proceed from the heart." Unless men are changed from within they will never be changed at all. Sins of thought, word and deed, all of these are from the heart and in the heart. Painting the pump will not help if the water in the well is polluted and germ-laden.

Not long ago a prison reform official decided that the men under his custody might be given a sense of pride and dignity if they were issued a change of clothing as a substitute for the drab prison garb which stereotyped them. A few days later they stabbed and killed the very trusty who delivered the clothing. We seem never to learn that cleaning up the body does not necessarily purify the man. Mowing the lawn does not mean that those who dwell in the house are better people.

Sometimes I am asked if Jesus was a radical. One needs to be careful when he answers a question like that, because the motive of his querist might not be justifiable. But in the basic meaning of the word Jesus was a radical, and he may have been the only genuine radical in the history of humanity. The word "radical" is from the Latin radix, a root. So a radical is one who gets to the root of things.

It is unfortunate that we have forgotten the true meaning and think of a radical only as one who uproots things. Often we equate the term with one who is flighty and filled with hare-brained schemes which have no real substance. In a radio address on October 26, 1939, Franklin D. Roosevelt defined a radical as a man with both feet firmly planted— in the air. Some of his detractors immediately declared that he ought to know.

Jesus was not that kind of radical. He knew that the root of all our trouble was sin, and until the heart is scrubbed out we will continue to make a pig-pen out of the world in which we live. Sin defiles man. It affects his thoughts, colors his language and blackens his deeds. It alienates him from God, separates him from his loved ones, and fragments his own personality. It warps his conscience, creates a feeling of guilt in his soul, and leaves him destitute and disturbed.

What was revolutionary about the approach of Jesus which makes him different from any other reformer in the long history of the world? He proposed to do what no other person could do, to rid man of sin with its corrupting influences, and to reconcile him unto God, whose name is holy. And this required not the proposal of a scheme, but the sacrifice of self. He must die that men might live.

Other revolutionaries had come riding out of the night at the head of dashing armies. Palaces were stormed and corpses left for the vultures to consume. Some of these, like wandering stars, flashed across the sky, and burned themselves out as a meteor divorced from its orbit. But always there were the ashes of yesterday and the despair of tomorrow. But Jesus did not come to show his power by tacking the bodies of his enemies on gibbets and crosses. He submitted to those who hated him and allowed himself to be crucified.

The cross was about as far from an appearance of success as anything could be. No human being would dare arrange this kind of termination to a revolutionary movement. It looked as if the leader really got nowhere during his lifetime. He summoned a few fishermen, an outcast tax collector, a fanatical zealot, and a confirmed thief to be his followers. This little group of petulant social misfits spent much of their time quarreling over who would be the most prominent in the coming regime. And their master was able to live only because of the contributions of a small band of women. He had no certain resting place, no home of his own, no financial angel to underwrite the cost of victory.

He made no political impact. His nearest relatives thought that he was a little balmy, and the neighbors among whom he grew up tried to throw him from a precipice. At the time of his death, he was only thirty-three years of age, and despite the fact that he had never committed an evil deed, he had aroused such hostility that the people were willing to have a murderer and seditionist turned loose if only Jesus would be brutally killed.

Stumbling along under the weight of his cross, he had to he assisted by a stranger who had come to the city on an errand. Lifted up between two outcasts and professional thieves, he was made to die, unwept, unhonored, and unsung, except by his little band of discouraged followers. What a way for one to go out of the world which he had come to save. There is every reason to believe that his handful of poverty-stricken friends thought that it was all over, and another dream of glory was rudely smashed by the might of Rome.

The cross was a symbol of ignominy and a badge of shame. One who hung upon a tree was deemed to be under the curse of God. No greater disgrace could come to one than to have his naked body nailed to a cross, exposed in all the weakness of the flesh, twisting, writhing, sweating, bleeding, and expiring in full view of the skeptical populace. And yet, there was something different this time.

The drama did not end with the cross. The final curtain did not descend at Calvary. On the third day, the one who died came forth from the grave, and thus proved that he was the Son of God, triumphant over death. And so the cross was not the end of hope but its beginning, not a sign of failure but of triumph. That is why the very symbolism of the cross has been changed in our day.

It is now a symbol of bravery and courage beyond the call of duty. When a soldier in almost any army of the world distinguishes himself for heroism, his reward is a cross pinned upon his tunic. The great agency which dispenses mercy in time of crisis and disaster is proudly known as the Red Cross. Insurance companies providing hospital facilities for their membership advertise the White Cross Plan.

Thus, in his death, Jesus was a revolutionary, turning loss into gain, and bringing life out of death. And all was accomplished by one powerful dynamic, the greatest in the universe, the dynamic of love. There are two great forces in our world, striving for mastery. One is based upon the philosophy that "might makes right." It is enforced by all the armaments of carnal warfare, by "reeking tube and iron shard," as the poet, Rudyard Kipling, describes it.

The other is based upon the principle that "right makes might." It is founded upon the nature and essence of God, for God is love. It is positive, not negative; it is creative, not destructive; it seeks only good and never evil. It loses itself that it might live. And it is the only revolutionary force in the whole world which can survive the clash of the centuries and the crash of cultures.

The world will never be transformed by a spirit of retaliation. "An eye for an eye" discipline, when carried to its ultimate, can only result in a world of half-blinded men and women. It is the "I for a You" attitude which Jesus demonstrated that will make the difference. Daniel A. Poling said, "Hate cannot destroy hate, but love can and does. Not the soft and negative thing that has carried the name and misrepresented the emotion, but love that suffers all things and is kind, love that suffers, love that bleeds and dies for a great cause— but to rise again."

One of Jimmy Doolittle's flyers, who was confined for many long and weary months in a Japanese prison camp, wrote about his captors: "They were ignorant and mean, but we thought there was some good in them. The only way to develop that goodness would be by understanding and education— not by brutally mistreating them as they were doing us. You can smile if you want to, but it made sense to me in that prison camp, and it still does. So I'm going to a missionary school for training, and then I'm going to return to Japan and spend the rest of my life there, teaching the importance of love among men."

In the July, 1971, issue of The Reader's Digest, there appears an article under the title of "The Awesome Power of Human Love." It is the second appearance of the article in that magazine, as it was printed once before, in February 1963. The author is a scientist, Ashley Montagu. The article begins thus: "The study of love is something from which scientists long shied away. But with the increased interest in the origins of mental illness, more and more attention is being paid to the infancy and childhood of human beings. What investigation has revealed is that love is, beyond all cavil or question, the most important experience in the life of a human being."

But I am more interested in the final paragraph, which says: "Scientists are today discovering that to live as if live and love were one is an indispensable condition because this is the way of life which the innate nature of man demands. The idea is not new. What is new is that contemporary men should be rediscovering, by scientific means, the ancient truths of the Sermon on the Mount and the golden rule. For human beings— and for humanity— nothing could be more important."

That is why Jesus is the greatest revolutionary of all! His life on earth was predicted and justified by the ancient prophets, holy men of God who spoke as they were motivated to do so by the Holy Spirit. Now that life is validated by the discoveries of modern science in the days of nuclear fission. In the days of Isaiah men looked forward to his coming; in the days of Einstein men recognize him for what he was— the abiding Word made flesh.

The passing of the centuries do not dim or tarnish his figure, nor erode away the force of his personality. Truly, he is the same yesterday, today and forever. When the world's tomorrow becomes our today, and he sits upon his throne with every knee bowing in his presence, and every tongue confessing his glory, I will rejoice that I have heard the call of the trumpet and followed in his steps. He is my Lord and my God! Praise His name!

The Parable of Telstar

Moving Into the Twentieth Century

Contents

Recently, while reading the rather bulky volume, The Waning of the Middle Ages, by J. Huizinga, I came upon a statement in the preface which I want to share with you. "In history, as in nature, birth and death are equally balanced. The decay of overripe forms of civilization is as suggestive as the growth of new ones. And it occasionally happens that a period in which one had, hitherto, been looking for the coming to birth of new things, suddenly reveals itself as an epoch of fading and decay."

Whatever else this means, one things is evident. It is difficult for any man, caught up in the present, to assess how the age in which he lives relates to the past, or to predict what historians in the centuries to come will have to say about it. In our own lives, which we think we are living, we are actually dying, and each day that we live means that we have one day less to exist on the earth. If this seems a rather morbid vein in which to address a group of young people, I mention that I am striking this somber note, not to frighten you, but to remind myself of how fragile are our opinions as to the place we occupy in the history of humanity.

We live in the twentieth century, but this is of significance only to ourselves. It means nothing to the angels who had no calendars and carry no watches upon their celestial wrists. And it means something to us only because our feet are still planted upon the earth. When we exchange this realm of the unreal for that which alone is ultimately real, it will mean nothing that we lived in this century, or in the Space Age. My father passed through the veil, and the curtains drew shut behind him, about thirty years ago, yet if I die tomorrow it will be to him as if we had hardly been separated. It is only to me that thirty years seem a long time since I looked upon the tent, out of which he had moved, lying peacefully in the box we had selected in which to store it away to await the time of its glorification.

So we never know whether we are truly fortunate to exist in one age more than in another. Man's genius for discovery makes it more pleasurable physically for him to live in each succeeding year, yet this may be a curse in disguise, for we may grow weaker and flabbier in both body and morals, as we become subjected to what the poet calls "luxury's vile contagion." The machines we invent may cease to become our slaves and become our masters. They may regulate our lives and control our actions, even our service for the Lord.

A good example of this was called to my attention recently. A preacher received a letter from a rural congregation asking if he would come and conduct a gospel meeting as it seemed the time was propitious for an in-gathering of souls. He wrote in his reply that he would like to postpone a decision until he could determine if the church building was air-conditioned. Fortunately, it was, so he could heed the call to go work in a cool vineyard, and gather in the sheaves in an air-conditioned field that was white to the harvest. But I would be a little reluctant to write like that for fear I would eventually end up in a place where air conditioning will never be introduced, and would only circulate hot air if it was installed.

It is constantly being called to our attention that we are living in a new era, that we are meeting new challenges, and that we must adjust our approach to the age in which we exist. Of course, this is true. Each succeeding generation has the benefit of the discoveries and inventions of all those which have preceded it. We stand upon the shoulders of our ancestors, which is not the same as saying that we should trample them underfoot. Obviously we see things they did not see but this does not argue our superiority. A dwarf who stands upon the shoulders of a giant can see farther than the giant, but if it were not for the giant he would not be able to see over the garden wall. And it would be a very ignorant and ungrateful dwarf who would prod and criticize the giant who was supporting him.

In one sense we have a great many new things, but in another sense, nothing is new. The wisest monarch who ever sat upon an earthly throne said: "There is nothing new under the sun. Is there anything of which it is said, 'See, this is new'? It has been already, in the ages before us" (Ecclesiastes 1:9, 10). I know that a lot of people think this was the pessimistic grumbling of a king who tried everything and ended up as a disillusioned royal sourpuss.

I'll admit that Solomon had some grounds for losing his temper and his zest for life. Don't forget that he had a thousand wives, and anyone who knows how tired you can get shopping for shoes with one, can appreciate how you'd feel if you had to go to town with a thousand. You'd create your own private traffic jam. Imagine standing in line at a Jerusalem cafeteria waiting for them to clear the tables to seat you and your women-folk, much less the children who had cried to come along and visit the toy departments.

But not being a liberal theologian, and being under no scholastic obligation to explain away anything I do not fully grasp, I concur with Solomon. Much of what we call invention is mere adaptation of what has gone before. We simply arrange matter. We do not create it, and we cannot annihilate it. There is not a single new atom that has been created in the twentieth century, but some of them are now in new combinations they have never previously achieved.

A very erudite modern Jewish writer, Philip J. Kipust, says: "Although written almost three thousand years ago by King Solomon, the broad, sweeping statement, 'and there is nothing new under the sun' has more scientific attestation nowadays than it had then. Continued scientific investigation, inventions and discoveries, unwittingly seem to support and substantiate this hypothesis. In fact it may very well become an accepted scientific principle of the future."

To explain what I mean when I say that Solomon was right, let us take the camera and television for example. Actually these operate on the very same principle as the human eye. When you take home movies and project them, you are actually taking a rapid series of still shots and these are blended together in your viewing of them, so that you see "moving pictures." That is exactly the way the eye functions. You will see "magic eye" cameras advertised, but there is really no magic about them. Your own eyes are so constructed that the iris expands or contracts to make a proper adjustment for the available light, and you always view things in living color.

You have your own "zoom lens" which automatically adjusts to varying distances, and when both eyes are used simultaneously you achieve a three dimensional perspective. Actually, you have been a walking cinerama theater and did not realize it. Your eyes, acting as cameras, take the pictures which are transmitted to the brain, the control tower or operations center, through the optic nerves. There they are decoded and converted back to images.

And speaking about the eye, remember that the lens is convex, that is, it is the magnifying type, the very kind of lens necessary for the telescopes, microscopes and binoculars, which enhance our vision. You probably have windshield wipers and an automatic washer on your car. These are not really new. The eyelids and tear ducts have been carrying out the same function for years, and they do it noiselessly and constantly. Did you ever have a squeaky eyelid? Did you ever have to replace one to get a clean swipe?

A jet plane is built like a whale and it cleaves the ocean of the upper air as the whale swims through water. The whale is really more flexible than the plane. No one ever saw a plane double its tail and rear flukes over its back, and if one ever does I don't want to be on it. Much as I fly I still like the ground under my feet. Brethren meet me and ask, "Did you have a good flight?" My answer is, "Any flight that I walk away from was a good one." I'm like the man who staggered off the little plane in which the pilot had been cutting a few capers, and said, "Thank God for terra firma, and the more firma, the less terra."

Now in the head of the plane there is a radar set which operates continuously in flight. It enables the plane to avoid collisions and also to go around areas of turbulence. But the same thing is true of the whale. The whale sends out a variety of sounds, some of which are ultrasonic. These "ping" against objects and resound, so the whale can avoid crashing into another whale. These ultrasonic "clicks" also make it possible to keep proper formation in the school, and to follow the teacher, as well as providing for navigation and location of food supply. It may sound a little "fishy" to you, but a lot of our modern inventions have been borrowed from whales, porpoises, and other denizens of the great deep.

And then, there is the bat. Scientists have known for years that bats have a sonar system which makes it possible for them to fly in darkness even better than some other birds do in the daylight. When a bat is in flight it keeps its mouth wide open and utters a continuous rhythm of sounds. These are pitched in a key so high that the human ear cannot pick them up. When these sounds strike an object the waves reverberate to the bat. His sensitive reception apparatus makes it possible for him to steer in the night.

In recent years biological researchists have learned that moths and butterflies send out radio waves, which can be intercepted by members of the same species, even at a great distance. The receiving mechanism on their heads are called antennae, and that is the very name given to the receiving rods upon the roof of your house. Some of these, like those of the moth, can be turned to any position. They are true directional finders.

We could multiply these examples a hundredfold, but this is enough to prove our point, that, in one sense, Solomon was correct. It also demonstrates the design and unity in all nature and argues for creation as opposed to chance. And the perceptive thinker will see how utterly dependent we are upon one another and how senseless it is for one generation to exhibit arrogance and pride. The young person who arrives at the mature age of sixteen and suddenly feels that he can be independent of his parents and regard them as a couple of "has-beens" is not showing true sophistication but his ignorance is hanging out.

But what we have said does not exhaust our subject by any means. In the spiritual realm there are some things which are abiding, steadfast and unchangeable. There are others which vary with time, place and circumstances. Unless we realize this we may destroy the very faith we seek to promote. There is a great difference between walking in the old paths and wallowing in the old ruts.

Some brethren think they are steadfastly holding up the faith of our fathers, when they are only stubbornly holding on to the traditions of their grandfathers. I think I owe Watchman Nee, the Chinese prisoner for his faith, my thanks for helping me to see that we do not bring life to the body of Christ but we only share in the life of the body. Life in the body of Christ comes from the same source as the life in my body. "As the body without the spirit is dead," is as truly spoken of the spiritual body of the Son of God as of the physical bodies of the sons of men. My body lives because my spirit abides in it. The body of Christ lives because the Spirit of God dwells in it.

When the Spirit is not in the body the members cannot function. It is useless to castigate the members for inaction when the Spirit is not there. Giving a corpse a tongue-lashing will not change its state. You can berate the arms and legs of a dead man all day and they will not function, because they cannot. Many a preacher who thinks he is edifying the body is only mutilating a corpse. There is only one thing which will get such members to act and function, and that is for the Spirit to return.

And when the Spirit operates in and through the body, that body will find itself in varied circumstances and altered conditions. Each generation will have different problems to meet, and each must meet its problems in a way that is effective and meaningful. God has always adapted his requirements to the needs of men at a given time, and to their ability to meet them. In the same way we must be open and flexible in facing up to conditions surrounding us. We must not alter God's word to suit the mood of the times, but we must amend our methods to suit the needs of the times. If we do not, we will be storming forts that have long since been abandoned, and firing away at positions that have no defenders. We must be able to read the signs of the times.

The body of Christ is one, but it will not always manifest itself in the same way in different cultures. It is composed of members and these members are joined to a head. The members are individual men and women, and in any locality they must be drawn from those who reside in that region, unless you move a pre-fabricated, ready-cut church in from Texas, or somewhere. This is called an "exodus movement," probably, because those who go think they are escaping from bondage. But the body in Africa will not exhibit its relationship to God as it does in the United States of America.

It will not sing the same way, and its members may get up and clap their hands, and dance unto the Lord. Of course, one of the brethren from "the land of the free and the home of the brave," will soon stop them from doing that, and make it clear that this is not the way it is done in Oklahoma. Before long, with the proper training we will have all of the foot-stomping quelled and the brethren can sleep during the meeting like they do over here. I doubt that the African segment of the body will always pray like we do over here, and that could be a good thing. Some of our "prayer-cliches" are worn a little threadbare.

In the primitive communities of the saints the congregations varied from place to place. The disciples in Jerusalem were not like those in Greek cities. There were cultural differences, social differences, and national differences. In the kingdom of heaven we are redeemed saints and not rubber stamps. God is not rearing a family of "Tweedle-dums" and "Tweedle-dees." We are individuals and we are unique. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike.

This means that the church in the twentieth century will not be like the one in the fifth century. We will not sing Gregorian chants, and we will not meet before dawn on the first day of the week. There was no Saturday night television in the fifth century. I do not want to frighten you, but we will not be like the saints in the first century either. I cannot remember being in a congregation where the brethren were all strung out over circumcision. Nor have I been in one where eating meats offered to idols was the number one topic in the young adult class. We haven't got time for little matters like that anyway. We are engaged in fighting over important and world-shaking issues like instrumental music, television programs and long hair.

We will be the same body that existed in the first century, or the fifth, or the tenth century, but the reason we will be is because the same Spirit dwells in us. There is only one Spirit, and he will not dwell in another body than that of our Lord. I have been alive ever since I was born, much to the dismay and against the express wishes of a lot of my brethren, and the reason I have been is because my spirit stuck with me. But I do not look like I did when I was a baby. Really, I do not, for I am better looking now. My mother said that when the neighbors first called to look me over and size me up, they told her: "Cheer up! He is bound to get better. Anything that happens to him will be an improvement." They did not realize that they were prophets.

I do not talk, or act, or think like I once did. I have done a lot of kooky things in my life, and I have goofed off a lot. I'm ashamed of that now, but I am glad that God didn't call my spirit home, because if he had I would never have met you and been able to share with you. Not long ago some folks were visiting us and I got a picture taken of me when I was holding my first tent meeting. I think you call it a revival. I was twelve years old, thin as a rail, and wearing my best pair of knickers, or knee-length pants. The Bible under my arm must have weighed almost half as much as I did. I was advertised as "The Boy Preacher."

One of the visitors said, 'Who is that?" I said, "It's me!" "It can't be!" "Well it had better be, because it is, and if it isn't I am not who I think I am now!" I am the same individual I have always been, because I have had the same spirit all of the time. You don't need to worry about a spirit transplant. Yet there are evident changes in me. I think it is the same way with the body of Christ. It does not bother me that the church is not exactly like it was when I was a boy. It would bother me if it was.

The church was imperfect then in its human aspect, and it is imperfect now, although its imperfections may not be the same. As Will Rogers said: "We are all ignorant, but only about different things." The church has always been imperfect on the human side. It was in the days of the apostles. It is like the man who heaved a sigh, and said to his wife, "I'm not the man that I used to be." "No," she replied, "and you never were."

The church is referred to as a temple constructed of living stones, but stone houses must be constructed of the rocks at hand. There is a vast difference between a house in Indiana built of Bedford limestone and one in the Missouri Ozarks constructed of native cobble-stone, yet both are stone houses. So the temple of God will vary from one area to another, but if the Spirit of the living God dwells in it, it will be holy unto the Lord.

This means that men who have been suited to God's purpose in one generation may be wholly unqualified and inadequate in a subsequent one. Certainly Martin Luther did a tremendous service in his day, but if he were here now and tacked his ninety-five theses on a church door, he would not be summoned before the Imperial Diet but would merely be arrested for vandalism and defacing of property. After the stirring debates held in Vatican II other challenges would probably only be laughed at.

If John Wesley were living today he would write hymns wholly unlike those he produced in his lifetime. It is possible that he would not even consider conducting lengthy frontier-type revivals in which sinners were whipped into a froth of frenzied emotionalism. Alexander Campbell would not write today as he did in editing The Christian Baptist and *Millennial Harbinger. Perhaps he would not consider debating men from other backgrounds in an environment such as we now face. This would in no sense indicate cowardice or a tendency to compromise. It is simply good commonsense to know when tactics are no longer effective and to change to those which are.

One of our problems is that we have difficulty forgetting that we are no longer a rural people. Our culture has now been urbanized. We still have our meetings at an hour originally determined by when the chores were done, and we hold revivals as we once did when the crops were laid by, or the corn was all picked. In an earlier day in our history the church building was the social center. Here people came together to talk about events in the community and to hear the news.

In these days of mass media, this is no longer the case. Family life has broken down and crowds have become oppressive. They are something from which to flee, not something to seek. Ignoring this, we frequently schedule meetings which contribute to the further disintegration of the family circle, and we try to motivate people to drive through traffic to form a crowd in which we can bring group pressure to bear to convert a few sinners who attend. We often "go to church" so much that we haven't time to serve God. The result is that we call our meetings "services" in order to compensate.

Our service is not something we do inside a structure. It is directed toward the world of humanity. The real service does not begin on Sunday morning at 10:00 o'clock. It may well begin on Monday morning at 8:00 o'clock. God is as much concerned with how you act at home, on the highway, in the office or shop, as he is with how you behave in a church edifice. Everything you do as a Christian should be worship. All should be done to the glory of God. The true Christian will no more shout an obscenity at a road-hog who cuts in on his driving lane, than he would stand up in the meetinghouse and challenge the preacher to fight because he stepped on his toes.

It is not the church building or the highway that is holy. It is you! You are God's people. You constitute a holy nation. You are a royal priesthood. Many of us censure our good Roman Catholic neighbors for what we feel is their abject ignorance. We laugh behind their backs because they tip their hats to God when they pass the parish church structure, under the mistaken view that God dwells there. We get a kick out of it because we know that God does not dwell in a cathedral at all. We know that he lives in a building that is tagged "Church of Christ" on a neon Signboard.

But the Bible specifically says that God does not dwell in temples made with men's hands, despite the fact that we have spent millions of dollars in an attempt to prove the Bible is mistaken. We even begin our services by thanking the Father that we can assemble in "the house of God." But the house of God is people. It is composed of living stones. You do not "go to church." It is the church that does the going. If you were not the church before you left home, you'll not be when you get to where you are heading. Our problem is that we are acting as if Jesus never died. We are thinking of God as having an earthly temple as He appointed in the days of Solomon. And we are mistaken!

What is our responsibility in the twentieth century? How can we show that Jesus is alive? The answer is very simple. We must show it in our lives. Unless Jesus lives in us it will mean little to say that he dwells in heaven. He must not only be at the right hand of God, but like David I must be able to say, "He is at my right hand, that I shall not be moved." It is not enough to sing lustily on Sunday night, "My God is real," and then act on Monday as if the Holy Spirit had retired on Social Security.

Men are very critical of the institutional church in our day. They say that it has nothing to offer relevant to daily life which must be sweated out in the marketplace. Many of the members have no qualm about absenting themselves on the Lord's Day in order to join the restless mass. We've even had to revise the nursery rhymes, including the famous saga of Little Bo Peep.

Alas, the poor preacher has lost his sheep,

And don't know where to find them.

Leave them alone, and they'll come home,

Dragging their boats behind them.

In spite of all this there is one thing which still holds true.

Even the world acknowledges that Jesus has to be the answer. Few indeed will sneer at the man from Galilee. In the midst of the turbulence and strife on the ocean of time many would like to put their hand in the hand of the one who stilled the waters. This provides for us a tremendous opportunity. We can introduce men and women everywhere to Jesus.

This is the greatest thrill of my life, to testify to policemen, elevator operators, parking-lot attendants, check-out clerks, filling-station operators,— everyone— that it is well with my soul. I have deposited it with one who does not need to be protected with FDIC. He has the keys, even of death and Hades. In Jesus I'm safe evermore. Praise God!

The Parable of Telstar

The Fellowship of the Unashamed

Contents

The grace of God, which is my constant source of strength and joy, has opened up great doors and effectual for me the past few years. I have been allowed the privilege of testifying to my faith in Jesus before many groups. I have had the pleasure of speaking to Jewish and professional men about the credibility of the claims of Jesus the Messiah to be the one of whom the prophets spoke. I have conducted a spiritual renewal week upon the largest Air Force base in the United States and talked to the men and women who were present about Jesus as the captain of our salvation and the commander of our destiny.

It was my privilege at Harvard to present a speech dealing with "A Conservative Alternative to Ecumenicity." In one city I was allowed to speak at the noontime services in a central city theater where businessmen and officials daily came to lend their strength to the need for spiritual emphasis in our century. Upon three different occasions I have met with the members of communes of "Jesus People" and we have shared in meaningful discussion of our commitment to him in whom dwelt the fullness of the Godhood bodily.

But, of all the places I have been led to go, I rejoice in the Lord most of all, for the encounters which have come to pass upon the campuses of our state colleges and universities. Sometimes these have been arranged under the auspices of one group, and sometimes another, but in every case I have gone with a sense of exhilaration and joy. In gatherings assembled in Student Union buildings, in dormitory lounges, in cafeterias and dining-rooms, or in fraternity houses, we have explored the relevancy of the Christian concept in our generation.

In such meetings, agnostics and skeptics, and even an occasional atheist, have questioned and probed, seeking to find the chinks in the armor and the cracks in the fortress wall. And in all of these meetings I have steadfastly insisted that I represent nothing except Jesus Christ and him crucified. It appears very important to me that I divorce myself wholly from a sectarian stance so that I am free to defend the faith once delivered unto the saints and not have to spend my time answering questions about some of the traditional hangups which are a part of every denominational complex in our land.

In most such meetings I use as my theme that the dynamic of the Christian faith is not static in our day, and I begin by pointing out that I come as a representative of no religious establishment, institution or organization, but am simply a member of the fellowship of the unashamed. I quote Romans 1:16, 17 as the foundation for my position. "For I am not ashamed of the Good News concerning Christ, for it is God's dynamic to save everyone who believes it, first the Jew and then the Greek. For in the Good News is revealed God's plan to justify those who believe, in order to motivate unto faith, for it was long ago written that the justified attain that status through faith."

Now I am ashamed of a lot of things. I am ashamed of some of the things I did when I was in high school. I am ashamed of some of the things that I thought, and some of the things I said. There are a lot of moments in my unworthy life that I would like to recall. Even since I started out to follow him who is everything to me, there have been incidents and occurrences which I am ashamed of every time that I recall them.

But I am not ashamed of the Good News about Jesus! I praise the Lord that I belong to that grand company of saints, martyrs and heroes, who unashamedly witnessed of their conviction before kings and governors, in palaces and market-places, and who sometimes paid the price of death rather than recant. It thrills me to the depth of my being to know that I can be identified with this fellowship of the fearless and this company of the committed.

Jesus said, "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed when he cometh in the glory of the Father and with the holy angels" (Mark 8:38). I know that I am going to see Jesus. I have not the least doubt that I shall look him in the eye. And I don't want to stand there in the presence of the angelic host, with my eyes averted, and trying to dig my toe into the golden thoroughfare, unable to look up and see what is going on. To be ashamed of Jesus is to be ashamed of who he is and what he claims to be. To be ashamed of his words is to be ashamed of his message and testimony. I am happy to tell you that I have absolute confidence in who Jesus is and in what Jesus said.

Perhaps you have heard of Hugh Latimer, the Protestant martyr who was condemned as a heretic and burned at the stake by "Bloody Mary," queen of England in 1555. In a sermon before the royal court, he once said, "Latimer, Latimer, thou art going to speak before the high and mighty king, Henry VIII, who is able if he think fit, to take thy life away. Be careful what thou sayest, But Latimer, Latimer, remember also that thou art about to speak before the King of kings and Lord of heaven. Take heed that thou dost not displease him."

I am happy to tell you that Latimer never weakened in his faith. He was sentenced to die with his friend, Nicholas Ridley, and they were tied to adjoining stakes with the faggots heaped about their feet. As the fires were being kindled, Latimer turned to his fellow sufferer, and said: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out."

It is this spirit which motivates me wherever I go and am called upon to speak. Certainly I do not want to be boorish or insulting to those who hear me. I must always remember that they are under the umbrella of God's love, and that Jesus died for them as well as for me. But, in the final analysis, it little matters what men may say about me, or do to me. Persecution may even bring a blessing. What does count is whether I am true to Jesus and his words. It was Woodrow Wilson who said: "I had rather be defeated in a cause that will ultimately triumph, than to triumph in a cause that will ultimately be defeated."

Long after skeptics are gone with the wind, and our tormentors have faded into the gray mists, Jesus will still be here. Julian the Apostate was so-called because he once espoused the cause of Christ and then fell away. He sought to drive Christianity from the earth by bringing back the pantheon of pagan deities. He was a master of satire, ridicule and invective. Sneeringly, he said to Agathon, a Christian: "Tell me, Agathon, what has become of the Carpenter of Nazareth? Is he still around? Has he any work at all these days, your Carpenter? Are there still some little jobs coming his way at least?" The Christian replied, "Yes, Julian, the Carpenter of Nazareth is busy, very busy, these days. He is nailing together a coffin for your empire." A few months later the emperor was gone. The Carpenter still lives. He is here today. He is building in my life. He is putting it all together.

I am not ashamed of any of the testimony about my Lord. First of all, I am not ashamed of the circumstances of his birth. I like for a professor to ask me in front of the student body, "Do you accept the idea of the virgin birth of Jesus?" It doesn't bug me one bit if he asks it as if he thought only a kook and a nitwit would say yes. I want to be able to say positively and definitely, that I accept it without reservation. I have no time for pussyfooting, wire-walking, and compromising attitudes which cause one to sort out into neat little piles those portions of the divine testimony which can then be labeled, "To be believed," or "May be doubted."

Of course, I have it on my skeptical friends. They cannot deny the virgin birth. They are too late on the scene for that. To deny it they would have had to be present at the time to examine the alleged fact. All they can do now is to doubt the witnesses, or question the evidence. It stands to reason that those who were present when a thing is affirmed to have happened, should have a better idea as to what transpired, than a Johnny-Come-Lately, who shows up a couple of thousand years later.

But I am told that it could not have happened. And I ask, "Why not?" The reply is that it never happened that way before or since. So what? All that proves is that it was unique, that it was a "once-in-history" occurrence, and that is the very thing for which I contend. The reason it did not occur again is because the Word was made flesh to dwell among us only once. It is not a question of how many times a thing happened when it is the subject of testimony by witnesses. The question is whether it is a fact that it happened as they said it did. To argue that a thing could not happen at all because it did not happen repeatedly, is a wee bit silly. That would necessitate you denying anything the first time it happened. One has to study philosophy a long time to indulge in that kind of "logic."

Then the big gun is wheeled into position and aimed at me. I am informed that if my conviction is correct, a miracle would have had to happen, and there is no such thing as a miracle. Who says so? The professor. I ask him how he knows there cannot be a miracle. And it all boils down to the idea that from observation of the continuity, order and system of the universe, he has developed a presupposition that there can be no phenomena which cannot be accounted for by natural means.

Under this kind of rationalization, when one hears or reads of a miracle, the first thing he does, before examining it, is to brand the label false, and the second thing he does is to speculate as to what combination of natural forces combined to produce it. This is sheer prejudice, for that word means "to judge in advance," or, without examination of the evidence. When confronted with the miracle of the virgin birth the prejudiced mind assumes that there could have been no begettal by the Holy Spirit, and immediately begins to ask who might have impregnated Mary.

Even the skeptic has to account for Jesus. The day of the Gnostics who postulated that he was a mere phantom is gone forever. That there was a person called Jesus of Nazareth, who lived on the earth in the days of Claudius Caesar, is so well attested that to deny it would be to blot out most of the characters of history. The evidence concerning Jesus is superior to that which we have of any other person who lived in the days of the Roman Empire, modern philosophers cannot fail to face up to this fact. They assume that Joseph was his father but that gets them into a lot of hot water, and even a college professor has difficulty keeping his cool when in hot water.

Now I happen to be a great admirer of Luke. He was an educated Greek who wrote two treatises that are now a part of our new covenant scriptures. He was the only known non-Jew who contributed to the sacred canon. Luke was a physician, and undoubtedly of the Hippocratic school, one of the most highly developed scientific institutions of a day known for its breakthrough in many areas of discovery. Luke had a special reason for writing. Both of his books are addressed to Theophilus, the ruler of a Greek city-state, if we may judge from the specialized form of address, and the purpose was to give this high imperial official authentic knowledge about the matters of which he had been informed.

Listen to the introduction and salutation as given in The Authentic Version, by Hugh J. Schonfield. This is the only translation of the new covenant scriptures by a Jew. "Since it is the case that many have endeavored to draw up an account of those matters held by us to be fact, exactly as they transmitted them to us who were initially the eyewitnesses and bearers of the Message, I have thought fit myself, as I have carried out a thorough investigation of all the circumstances from their beginning, to set them down for you consecutively, Your Excellency Theophilus, that you may realize how well-founded are the things of which you have been informed."

Notice that Luke says he had the testimony of eyewitnesses, that the information was exact in its transmission, and that the matters were held to be fact. That they were thus held by those who were so close to the time when the events occurred is very important. He declares that he personally carried out a thorough investigation of all the circumstances from their beginning. He recorded them for the specific purpose of showing how well-founded were the things which were believed. This is great, but there is more to come! Remember that Luke was a physician, so he writes like a medical doctor. He uses medical terms.

There is a difference. For instance, you tell people that you broke your shoulder blade, but the doctor says that you sustained a compound fracture of the clavicle. The doctor prescribes acetyl-salicylate for your headache, but it turns out to be aspirin. Now one of the words used by Luke is the Greek from which we get "autopsy." That means "seeing for oneself." 'When a doctor performs an autopsy he literally looks into things. That is what Luke affirms about the eyewitnesses. They dissected the evidence. The facts were established beyond denial.

Strangely enough, it is Luke, the physician, who deals at length with the virgin birth. There are three persons who must have been really concerned about the pregnancy of Mary. The first was Mary herself. You can imagine the problem of trying to explain to some of the nosy neighbor women in a provincial village like Nazareth that you were with child by the Holy Spirit. I'd like to have listened to some of the gossip sessions in the houses in the next block.

The second person who would be deeply interested is the man to whom the girl was engaged. And Joseph was no exception to the rule. I would like to know some of the thoughts that whirled around in his mind and filled his heart while he was working in the shop. Espousal was as binding as marriage, since it represented a covenant or vow. And Joseph knew what the law said. The Bible says, "The birth of the Messiah came about in this way. His mother Mary had become betrothed to Joseph, but before they could be wed she was found to be with child by the Holy Spirit. Joseph her husband being a devout man, yet unwilling to disgrace her in public, wanted to divorce her quietly." An angel of the Lord set him straight on the matter, and he accepted Mary as his wife.

The third person who would be interested in such an event would be a doctor. Luke was no exception to the rule. He investigated it like a sleuth from the Internal Revenue Department. I am indebted to him for what he uncovered and documented. Apparently Mary was still alive and he must have talked with her personally. Some of the material he preserves for us could only have come from Mary herself. And here are a few things worthy of our consideration.

First off, Luke could not have been a forger. We can be certain of that because he does what no forger would ever dare do. When one wants to fake history he writes in broad generalizations. He paints a picture of gray distances without any close details. He is not specific about persons and places because these are too easily checked. But Luke goes out of his way, and falls over backward to date his narrative, and he does it by citing the names of rulers, governors and legates, who were in office simultaneously.

Luke's narrative begins with the first recorded appearance of an angel in four hundred years. Gabriel was sent by God to a town in Galilee called Nazareth, to inform Mary that she was to be the mother of the Messiah. This was his second trip to earth in a little more than six months. Mary was told that she would conceive in her womb and have a son, and that the Lord God would give him the throne of his ancestor David, he would reign over the house of Jacob forever, and his sovereignty would be without end.

Mary asked, "How can this come about, since I am unwed?" The angel informed her that the Holy Spirit would pass over her and the power of the Most High would overshadow her. Mary consented with the simple words, "I am the Lord's maidservant. Let it be to me as you say." I believe that the ripened ovum in her own body was impregnated, not by human sperm, but by divine seed, prepared in such a manner that the eternal Word could become flesh.

If it were not so Jesus would not have been the Son of God in a unique way. I do not subscribe to the washed-out explanations which try to account for the coming of Jesus in a purely natural manner. There is no embarrassment for me to accept the fact of the virgin birth. The problem of the virgin birth is not the problem at all for those who profess to stumble at it. Their actual hangup is with reference to God and his power. If you worship the same God whom I revere you know that nothing is impossible for him.

I accept the fact that God is not limited to one way of bringing people into the world. Actually, human beings have entered this life by four different ways. The first came by creation, the second by organic transformation, and the rest by procreation, with one exception. He came by incarnation. And he was the Son of God. He was not just an excellent character, a great moral example, or a superb teacher. If that is all he was, he was really none of these.

It was C. S. Lewis who put the fire under those who piously say, "I'm ready to accept Jesus as a great moral teacher. But I do not accept his claim to be God." Lewis wrote: "A man who was merely a man and said the sort of things Jesus said would not be a great moral teacher. He would either be a lunatic— on a level with the man who says he is a poached egg— or else he would be the Devil of Hell. You must take your choice. Either this man was, and is, the Son of God: or else a madman or something worse."

We must realize that Jesus is always going to be a stumblingblock to some people. The Bible said he would be and if everyone accepted the testimony concerning him, without question, the Bible would be proven false. Peter writes: "To you therefore which believe, he is precious, but for those who do not believe, the very stone which the builders rejected has become the head of the corner, and a stone that will make men stumble, a rock that will make them fall, for they stumble because they disobey the word, as they were destined to do" (1 Peter 2:7, 8).

Certainly, human wisdom which belongs to this passing age, will seek to controvert the divine revelation. And men who worship rationalization will be led to deny the facts related to Jesus. But I do not belong to the number of those who choke out the word. I belong to the fellowship of the unashamed and I am thrilled to tell you that I accept without question the most challenging truth of all ages, that the Word who was with God, and was God, became flesh and dwelt among us full of grace and truth.

I believe that no one has ever seen God, but the only Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, made him known. He is the power of God and the wisdom of God. He is the source of our life, having been made our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption. I am not ashamed to acknowledge that he entered this world as the result of a miracle. I believe in the virgin birth.

And I believe in the resurrection of my Lord from the dead. I have no half-baked apologies to make about it. I deplore those who tippy-toe around in the pulpit, and talk out of both sides of their mouths about this event which validates the claims of Jesus to be divine. One who seeks to carry water on both shoulders on this important matter should either have one bucket knocked off or be made to spill them both.

"If Christ has not been raised then our preaching is in vain and your faith is also vain" (1 Corinthians 15:14). Do you know what this means? It means that regardless of what else I preach, how flowery my language or how moving my speech, it is a void and empty gesture if I deny the resurrection. It also means that regardless of what else you believe, or how orthodox you are about other matters, if you do not believe that Jesus rose from the dead, your faith is futile, and you are still in your sins.

I am constantly being confronted with those who tell me they accept the resurrection story, although they cannot accept the idea of the literal resurrection. They feel that it can be spiritualized. I trust that you will forgive me if I say this is sheer poppycock. In the first place there is no such thing as "the resurrection story," as they use the term. It is their idea that the disciples whipped up a narrative which seemed to them to make good sense as an approach to an interpretation of certain phenomena.

That is nonsense! The disciples were not trying to explain phenomena. They were telling what happened to them. When the front men for the national council of Judaism, consisting of rabbis, lawyers and religious dignitaries, put the political finger on Peter and John, and tried to clap a moratorium on their talk about the resurrection, those two said: "We cannot keep from telling what we have seen and heard." They did not drum up a tale to bring things into focus and make them sound plausible. They simply stated what they knew took place.

I'm always a little wary when people talk about "spiritualizing" something in the Bible. I know that generally this is a fancy term for cutting the heart out of a message. They want to phantomize rather than spiritualize, and leave you with about as much substance as a ghost. They are not so much concerned with a way of explaining truth, as they are with explaining truth away. Actually, if Jesus was not literally resurrected, he was not resurrected at all. If the one who went into the grave did not come forth there was no resurrection. That term is never applied to anything but the body. It is never used with reference to the spirit of man.

I do not go for the bit about the imagination of the tired and overwrought disciples conjuring up an image of Jesus until they thought they had seen him after his death. You must remember that some of the disciples were pragmatic fishermen, and none of them were wild dreamers or schemers. They knew Jesus and they laid their lives down rather than renounce their testimony. Jesus is alive right now. He has conquered death and the grave and he holds the key to both of them. One of these days he will unlock them and call from them all who are still within their confines. Then death and the unseen abode will be destroyed. I am going to be there for the occasion.

One need never be ashamed of his faith in Christ. Nothing can ever supplant the revelation of God in Christ Jesus. There is a graphic account extant of the meeting of Thomas Carlyle with Auguste Comté, the great French philosopher. Comté informed Carlyle that he was preparing to found a new religion which would sweep away Christianity and become a universal faith of mankind. Carlyle gave him this devastating reply: "Your idea is a splendid one. Now all that you need to do is to speak as never man spoke, to live as never man lived, to be crucified, rise again the third day, and get the world to believe that you are still alive. When you have done all this then your religion will have some chance of success."

I want to urge you to stand resolutely and with courage by the side of Jesus Christ. Do not let the world back you into a corner, close your mouth or silence your tongue. Have the bravery to live for Jesus and to tell others why you do so. If you one time take a firm stand for Jesus when others are mocking him, if you let it be known that you have placed your hand in the hand of the man from Galilee, you will not be ashamed or afraid again. And he will stand by you and the Holy Spirit will give you strength.

Stand up for Jesus! Stand up for him in the schoolroom. Stand up for him on the football gridiron or the baseball diamond. Stand up for him when you are with your best friend. Stand up for him when you are with the crowd. Right now make up your mind to join the fellowship of the unashamed and the company of the concerned. Jesus laid down his life for you. Will you take up your life for Jesus?

Walled In or Walled Out

Contents

I want to talk with you today about walls. You will note that I use the plural form, for there are many walls which men erect, and for many purposes. Some walls are justified, and even essential to the preservation of life. Others are monuments of distrust and hostility. They exist only to magnify and multiply the sorrows to which men are heirs. A wall can be a beautiful thing. It can also be a hideous thing. And the difference lies in the purpose for which it was constructed, the motivation which created it.

In 1951, my wife and I were in the Netherlands, and we traveled to see the four villages which had been built by Marshall Plan money furnished by the United States at the close of the second World War. When the Nazi armies knew that the tide of battle was turning against them and that they would have to evacuate the Lowland Countries, they deliberately blasted holes in the dikes and allowed the water from the sea to flood the polder land and the tidy villages which were in the area.

When we reached the country the dikes had been repaired and the villages restored. After visiting the schools we went to see the dike of which the Netherlanders were so rightfully proud. It was a magnificent piece of engineering, a bulwark of strength holding back the restless billows of the ocean. It was constantly assailed by a destructive alien force, which once had captured and covered the land. But day and night it guarded the lives of those behind it. And it was a veritable symbol of security and safety.

Not too far away, in the land called Germany, with its once beautiful capital city called Berlin, it was different. I have never been there but I have talked with many who have been, and without an exception, all of them have mentioned the Berlin wall. Not one of them spoke commendatorily of it. They regard this pile of stones and concrete with its barbed wire entanglement as a wall of infamy, a badge of shame and disgrace.

To those who view it from the free world, that wall exists as a symbol of hatred and of "man's inhumanity to man," which, as the poet writes, "makes countless thousands mourn." What is the difference between these two barriers? Why is it that one speaks openly of life, while the other whispers darkly of death and despair? The answer is very simple. The wall in Holland stands steadfastly against a devastating force which would ruthlessly destroy all that is held dear by those who trust in it. The wall is a trusted friend, calming their fears, stilling their trepidation, and making for peaceful repose at night. It is no wonder that the dike is constantly patrolled and is ever being made stronger and more rugged.

The Berlin wall was not built to guard against a foreign force, but to sever and separate families, and to divide brothers who once mingled freely together as one. It is a wall stained with blood and often wet with tears. Even now, families appear at strategic points to wave at loved ones on the other side, and jerking sobs are heard as helpless folk turn back to their homes, longing for a closer view of dear ones whom they cannot touch.

These two walls have a spiritual connotation for us. God has called us out of the world to be his fruitful possession, exactly as the polder land has been called out from the depths of the Zuider Zee. He knows that the world will engulf and reclaim us for its own unless a protective wall guards us and the faith.

He constructed a dike to forbid mingling with the world and engaging in fellowship with its elements, and that dike needs to be kept always in a state of repair. We must make it ever stronger and thicker. We must guard against the smallest crack or the slightest sign of erosion.

I want to read to you what the Bible says about that wall. Listen! "Do not be unequally yoked with unbelievers. For what partnership does righteousness have with lawlessness? And what fellowship does light have with darkness? And what agreement does Christ have with Belial? Or what part does a believer have with an unbeliever? And what agreement does a temple of God have with idols?"

The answer to each of these questions is one word. "None!" Righteousness can have no partnership with lawlessness— none! Light can have no fellowship with darkness— none! Christ has no agreement with Belial— none! A believer has no part with an unbeliever— none! A temple of God has no agreement with idols — none! So the divine requirement is abrupt and plain. "Come out from among them and be separate, says the Lord. Do not touch the unclean and I will receive you. And I will be a Father to you, and you shall be sons and daughters to me, says the Lord Almighty."

The world of sin and wickedness is an alien realm. Isaiah wrote, "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, says my God, to the wicked" (57:20, 21). If we are inundated by the iniquity of the world we will perish as certainly as did the antediluvians. Our task is to maintain the lines of demarcation between the temple of the living God and the idolatry of neo-paganism which threatens us upon every front.

But now comes the great tragedy. Men have quoted what God said about the lack of fellowship between light and darkness to fragment into parties and narrow sects the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. They have concluded that a believer should have no part with another believer, and should even regard him as an unbeliever. Here we see Berlin walls bisecting the territory of God, holding brethren apart, and under guise of faithfulness to Jesus, splitting the family into warring tribes, eagerly fighting for the scalps of God's other children.

The wall around Holland is a noble wall. It is a necessary barrier. But suppose that the people of Holland were to construct other walls in their own land, and inside the dikes, and separate themselves into bitter political factions thirsting for gore? There could be but one result. The time required to build and reinforce their party walls would be taken from that required to strengthen the dikes, and eventually, as the political fences grew stronger, the dikes would grow weaker and crumble, and all would be destroyed.

This has been the cruel fate of Christendom. Those who have come under the protective shadow of the Son of God have been betrayed by Satan into erecting spite fences against other brethren. The kingdom of heaven is criss-crossed with a motley assortment of barricades erected to segregate the saints. Some of the most cruel and prolonged wars in history have been religious conflicts. Rivers of blood have been shed in the name of loyalty to Christ. And while this has been going on the world has engulfed the church and Satan has been the winner. The apostle knew this and wrote: "But if you bite and devour one another, be careful that you are not destroyed by one another."

Are you aware that Jesus came as the great wall-smasher of the ages? The eternal design of God is to bring all things in the universe into a unity in Christ Jesus. This includes things in heaven and things on earth. And Jesus began this great task while he was on earth. When he came the world of mankind was divided into two great segments— Jews and Greeks. The animosity between them was bitter and deep.

The Gentiles were regarded as unclean and unholy. They were not considered as a people, and were looked upon as dogs. They were afar off. They were strangers and foreigners, without hope and without God in the world. Between the Jews and Gentiles stood the law of commandments contained in ordinances, as a high wall, somber and awesome in its appearance. So long as it existed there would be two hostile and alien camps and never the twain would meet.

But it was God's will that they should be one body, one new man, reconciled to him and to one another. How was it to be achieved? Were the uncircumcised required to become circumcised and identify with the Jews? Were the circumcised to seek by artificial means to become uncircumcised and identify with the Gentiles? This would be the human solution to the predicament. Man could see no way out except for one to give up something and move over to share with the other.

But our ways are not the ways of God, and his thoughts are not our thoughts. Jesus did not concern himself at all with circumcision which meant so much to men. He knew that the reason they were divided and hating one another was because they were not reconciled to God. He made no demand that they try to become one by identifying with each other. He simply used the cross as a hammer and smashed down the wall which held them apart and they were together before they knew what had happened. The Biblical account is quite plain, almost to the point of being dramatic. In fact, the third chapter of the letter to the Ephesians is a sort of blow-by-blow account of the battering down of the wall.

First we learn of the magnetic power of the blood of Jesus. It has a gravitational pull which reached to the remotest bounds of humanity. It could and did affect the cast-offs and outcasts, as well as the close-bys and near-at-hands. Paul writes: "Your world was a world without hope and without God. But now in union with Christ Jesus you who once were far off have been brought near through the shedding of Christ's blood." Jesus had promised that if he were lifted up he would draw all men unto himself, and all men includes those of every ethnic, social, cultural, and national group.

The apostle continues by pointing out that our ultimate peace is not a pact, a program, or a profession. It is a person. "For he is himself our peace." To accept Jesus is to accept peace. To be in him is to dwell in peace. And so, we read: "Gentiles and Jews, he has made both one, and in his own body of flesh and blood has broken down the enmity which stood like a dividing wall between them." Notice that the Jews and Gentiles did not become one on their own. They were made one. Their unity was the work of God, and not merely their own contrivance or arrangement.

Between them was enmity so great and powerful that it was like a dividing wall. On either side existed hostile parties, hating and being hated. And Jesus did not try to get them to make up, or to confer with a view to settling their differences. He arranged no delegate conference to iron out the problem. Instead, he simply died for all of them. He gave himself for them, in the most agonizing way known to man. And the blow-torch of divine love melted hearts that had been like stone. And when the wall was removed, broken down by death and washed away by blood, there they were sitting together, their hatred gone and their ire dissolved.

It was a little bit like it was when I was a lad in my parental home. We were very poor and there were six children in the family. We lived so far back in the hills that we hardly ever saw anyone but ourselves, unless someone got lost or was running from the sheriff. We had no toys except the crude ones that we made for ourselves, so our principal recreation was fighting with one another. Through regular practice we became as adept at it as later generations did at baseball and other sports. I think that I was born B. C.— before croquet!

But my parents did not favor us fighting. It aggravated them when we threw things at each other, especially rocks. They were afraid we'd rock one another to sleep, or worse yet, cripple one of the dogs. They believed in old-fashioned methods of discipline. They had not read books on child psychology, and did not realize that if you clobbered your offspring with a limb from the peach tree, or a hickory sprout, you would cause them to develop into neurotics, grow up with inhibitions, become bank-robbers, and blame it on their early training. They held to the creation idea and believed that God had especially padded a portion of the human anatomy, and cushioned the nerve-ends to provide a handy place for parents to apply stringent measures to the seat of the difficulty.

But they also used other methods of bringing home to us the wrong involved in fighting and snapping at one another like cats and dogs. Once in awhile one of us would be forced to retire to the kitchen and the other to remain in the living-room. This was not very effective because each one sat on his side of the wall and plotted revenge, and planned what he would do to the other as soon as the moratorium was lifted and they met on the shady side of the barn.

As I look back upon it from the peak of many years, I think the most effective, as well as the most humbling method was when they would summon my brother and me to come in before the judgment seat, and decree that we were to sit quietly facing each other only four feet apart, just out of reach. At first our rancor boiled up and expressed itself in frowns, but before long the humor of the situation began to manifest itself, we started giggling, and ended up laughing at our predicament. Nothing takes the fight out of you more quickly than to be forced to sit quietly looking your brother in the face.

God must have a real sense of humor or he would never have made a bunch of people like us. Moreover, he raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places. For years,

I have been thinking that the way our church buildings are constructed has contributed a lot to our alienation. The pews are in rows behind one another. Most people never go to the front of the auditorium. They plop down on the back row, and if someone beats them to it, they flounce into the next row, muttering under their breath about the audacity and impoliteness of people who hurry to get the back seats.

Most of them never see their brethren face to face. All they ever see is shirt collars, and the back of human heads. If they are inclined to be disturbed by the kind of hair which bankrupts barbers, they have an hour to sit and meditate over what the world is coming to, or whether it is "going to pot" in the full implication of the term. There is only so much thinking that you can do about human hair, as seen from the back, and you have the rest of the time to mull over the way the brethren act. Of course, you could listen to the sermon, but that would not be fair, as you would be encroaching on a preserve of the old folks.

It would seem, when trouble arises, that if we could get the opposing sides to sit down and face each other, and not argue, but pray silently for one another, it might do a lot toward relieving the tension. As long as they are on opposite sides of a wall suspicion exists. Each one is considering what the other is "up to," and when you start wondering that you always imagine the worst. On the other side of the walls things always seem dark and dire. You can talk to yourself about what other people are thinking about you until you conclude that they are reprobates, existing only to bring about your downfall.

We need to look at our unwritten creeds and conditions of fellowship as artificial walls we have constructed. Most of them stem from our trying to play God with other people's lives. We become convinced that something is worldly, or a sin, and we try to impose our deduction upon another who regards it as harmless, or at least in a neutral territory. Because it becomes an obsession with us, we think and talk about nothing else, and reach the conclusion that those who do not concur with us are out of step with God. Before we realize it we have divided our brethren into warring camps over something that God did not think enough about to even mention.

We build the wall higher and make it thicker by insinuation and innuendo, by malicious gossip and incipient slander. Before long we have many convinced that certain brethren are apostates and deniers of the faith. There is a difference between denying the Lordship of Jesus and denying the right of other men to lord it over your life. We think that because we have no written creed we have not erected a wall, but an unwritten creed is generally more dangerous than a written one.

With an unwritten creed, you can switch signals as soon as you get out of the huddle, and one never knows for sure which way to run, or for that matter, which team he is on. It is like playing ball and making up the rules as you go along. Remember that whatever a man must believe, acknowledge, or subscribe to, to be in your fellowship, or to be regarded as your brother, is your creed. And every creed is a wall that includes certain brethren and excludes others.

We have all been pretty vociferous in affirming that our creed is Christ. But we have been long in declaiming and short in practice. If we truly mean what we say it resolves itself into an acceptance of men because they are in Christ Jesus, and only because of that. We will not make our opinions tests of fellowship, nor their opinions conditions of acceptance. The question will not be, "What do you think of this, or that?" Rather it will be, "What think you of the Christ? Whose Son is he?" My plea is that we allow the cross of Jesus to become more meaningful to us than any deduction, speculation, or interpretation. We can be one in Christ by simply removing our walls.

But now, with your kind indulgence, I want to speak of other barriers to our growth in this day. The early Christians were a mobile people. They were not chained to a place. They were not slaves to real estate. When persecution arose they had nothing to lose but their lives. They had been told by the Master that when they were assailed in one city they should flee to another. They could even take joyfully the spoiling of their goods for they were but strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

The first building erected as a church edifice was built about 280 A.D. in Nicomedia. There was a great deal of opposition to it. Some felt that it was patterning after paganism with its luxurious temples for the gods. They pointed out that the only temple of God on earth is the consecrated human heart. But the building program carried the day. At first, the structure was to be used simply as a gathering-place for the saints. It was not to be used as a place in which to preach the gospel.

Gradually, however, as time went on and there developed a clergy, as opposed to a laity, a distinction which has no place in the Christian concept, the structure began to be recognized as the special precinct of a special caste. The word pulpit, which means "a stage," was borrowed from the theater, and praise became something that was conducted, rather than the spontaneous overflow from the hearts of the saved ones. Eventually, still following the lead of the theater, special lighting effects were introduced, special dress was required as the proper costume for the actors, programs detailing the performance were printed, and worship gave way to a spectator performance.

It would be a little silly, I think, for one in the twentieth century to oppose a church building, or to contend there was anything wrong with one per se. But we do need to consider seriously whether such structures in which to preach the gospel may not have become detriments instead of real aids. And we need to examine why the most aggressive movements for taking Jesus to our decadent culture arise outside of our church buildings and refuse to be confined to or by them.

The gospel is for the world, and Jesus told us to go into all the world and proclaim it to every creature. We have reversed the process now, and we invite the world to come to us. Our emphasis is not to lead men to Christ, but to "bring them to church." And we get a lot of them into "the church" whom we never get into Christ. We institutionalize them without inspiring them. We get their names on the record but their hearts are far from us. We must some day determine whether our task is to move unconverted men and women around for a 'body count," or truly lead them to the place where they count in the body.

Our problem is that we have transferred the war from the battlefield into the mess hall. And now we are no longer soldiers fighting for victory over Satan. We live in a sort of twilight zone of peaceful co-existence with the Devil. If he does not invade our territory we will not seriously assault his. If he does not bother our sheep we will not trouble his goats. If one of our preachers, under special temptation, "goes over the hill" with the church secretary we get on our high horse because the Devil will not play according to the rules. It isn't cricket for him to put the heat on a preacher. But we can live in a world swimming in moral sewage and garbage all around us, and salve our consciences because we invited them to our last two crusades, and they did not have enough ambition to come and get what we offered them.

What has happened is that we have been betrayed into walling ourselves in. We now live a kind of monastic life in which we regard the church building as a holy place. We have a special dedication service for our piles of brick and mortar, and then go to them regularly and perform a ritual. We preach to a world which is not there, and which often does not even know that we are there. Every time a new moral issue arises in the world we jump on a white charger and gallop around the premises for awhile, then dismount and hang up the saddle in the old corral, and follow our regular routine until we learn from Reader's Digest, or U. S. News and World Report, that another dragon has been sighted.

We peer through the cracks in our ivy-covered walls and take an occasional potshot at a passing Mormon or Jehovah's Witness, with our theological pea-shooter, and sing "The Fight Is On." But a few minutes later we ought to remain standing following the benediction and sing "The Fight Is Off!" It is evident that when our brethren sing "Am I a Soldier of the Cross?" they are asking for information, and a lot of times the answer is "No!" Most of us are not soldiers. We do not know how to use the sword of the Spirit.

We have been trained to go where we can sit in comfort and watch a weekly "fencing exhibition." In such a performance one demonstrates his dexterity and footwork in fancy fashion, but never intends to puncture anyone. It is done for the interest and entertainment of the listening audience. Our motto has become: "Let's you and him fight." We have as our slogan: "There he is Lord, send him!"

Do you ask what I recommend under these circumstances? My suggestions are simple. First, we need to place our buildings in proper perspective. They must cease to be refrigerators in which to preserve and defend the truth. Truth needs no defense. It only needs to be turned loose. It is no tribute to us that we are frightened and fearful that in any direct encounter of truth with error, truth will be defeated and have to be carried from the field. Our problem is to rescue the truth from the church which seeks to make it captive on the ground that it is too weak to be turned loose on its own.

Second, we need to regard our buildings as filling stations. One does not drive to a filling station to take his vacation on the ramp. He does not go there for his entertainment or simply to be with the other filling station buffs. He goes to get his tank filled, so he can get on the road. The trouble with us is that we keep filling up with regular, and we go on our way knocking and coughing as we go. We need to get filled up with high octane, anti-knock, non-corrosive fuel and step on the gas. Our brethren suffer from the weak trembles because they are afraid we will pass the world. I don't think we will even catch up with them!

Let us return from this place fully resolved that, come what may, we will carry the battle for Jesus Christ. On the campus, in the classroom, on the football gridiron, on the beach, on the street— wherever you are— let the world see that Jesus is in you and that you are in Jesus. The time for pussyfooting around is past. The time has come to act like men. Right on! We have nothing to fear. We are following a leader who will never know defeat. Tomorrow will be ours if we do not falter!

Space Age Religion

Contents

From a great many sources in these days one hears that the religion set forth in the new covenant scriptures is not adequate for the space age. It is pointed out that Jesus lived at a time when the problems of life were relatively simple. His was a provincial life within the confines of the little country called Palestine. We know of but one occasion when he stepped across the border of the Jewish commonwealth into the region of Tyre and Sidon. The communications of the day were slow and the means of travel very limited. It is reasoned that any system which would be adapted to that day could not possibly serve the requirements of these times.

We think that such reasoning overlooks certain truths which render it invalid. One of the most important of these is that human nature has not changed. It is true that men can transmit thought from one part of the globe to another more rapidly than centuries ago but it remains that what is transmitted is still human thought and much of it is not worth the cost and effort of transmission. Men can travel through space more readily and with greater ease but they are the same kind of men. There is no indication that men who ride in jet-propelled planes are any better morally or spiritually than those who walked or rode on asses or camels.

Religion is not primarily concerned with the nature of man's travel but with the nature of the man who does the traveling. Since there is no indication that man has altered too greatly in this sphere it remains that the religious provision which met his basic needs in days past is adequate to do so now. I happen to be among those who believe that man is not the mere product of a fortuitous concourse of atoms. That is simply a sophisticated expression for something that just happened or is the result of mere chance. I believe man was created by an intelligent being and that this accounts for the fact that man himself is such a being.

It seems like good common sense, or perhaps for these days, uncommon good sense, that the man who makes an automobile "from the ground up" ought to know more about it than anyone else. By the same token, I consider that the creator who made man "up from the ground" ought to know more about his need than anyone else, including man himself. I have not the least doubt that God could provide for the physical and spiritual needs of man for all time. Man needs bread and God provided the grain from which it is made. He needs water and copious streams gush from the hillsides. "Man does not live by bread alone" and God has provided the bread of life and the water of life.

Man no more outgrows his need for one bread than for the other. True he may improve upon the method of preparation and transportation of the bread, but he still needs bread. So we can improve upon our method of translation, interpretation and explanation, but we still need the bread of life. During the second world war when raw materials were in such short supply in Germany, the Nazi regime experimented with ersatz products. A certain percentage of sawdust was mixed in both the sausage and the bread and the people soon suffered from malnutrition. One of our difficulties in these days comes from modern speculation about the basic needs of man. We have too many sawdust sermons. That will explain why they are so dry. Here are some things that do not change. They will explain why we do not need another religion than that of Jesus Christ.

(1). The nature of sin has not changed. When you read the catalog of sins detailed in the first chapter of Romans it sounds just like the police blotter in one of our large cities. The prophets who portray the conduct of ancient nations write like the crime reporters of a metropolitan daily. Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are our contemporaries in their depiction of the guilt of the people. Not one of our problems is truly modern. Drunkenness is at least as old as Noah. Murder goes back as far as Cain. The eternal triangle with its emphasis upon sex reaches not only into the parliaments of today but reared its ugly head in the palace of King David.

Juvenile delinquency is no new thing upon the earth. Listen to this statement: "The children now love luxury; they have bad manners, contempt for authority; they show disrespect for elders and love chatter in the place of exercise. They no longer rise when elders enter the room. They contradict their parents, chatter before company, gobble up dainties at the table, cross their legs and tyrannize over their teachers." No, that is not a quotation from the latest issue of Time or *Readers Digest. It is from Socrates and it was written 2,500 years ago.

In 4,000 B.C., which was about fifteen hundred years before Socrates, a discouraged Egyptian priest penned these words: "Our earth is degenerated in these latter days. There are signs that the world is coming to an end. Children no longer obey their parents. Everybody wants to write a book. The end of the world is near."

(2). The penalty for sin has not changed. "For the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23). It is true that the penalty is not exactly physically and immediately as it was under the old covenant when "a man who violated the law of Moses died without mercy at the testimony of two or three witnesses" (Heb. 10:28). But we must not forget that the first covenant was both political and religious in its nature. It operated in the spiritual and civil realms through earthly courts of jurisprudence. The method of enforcement or enactment of the penalty has changed, but the penalty itself is inevitable. "For those who are factious and do not obey the truth, but obey wickedness, there will be wrath and fury" (Romans 2:8). "The Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, inflicting vengeance upon those who do not know God and upon those who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus" (2 Thess. 1:7, 8).

(3). The helplessness of man has not changed. He has repeatedly demonstrated his lack of ability to overcome sin by his own wisdom. After the industrial revolution and the introduction of technology, many thinkers predicted the coming of a golden age to the earth. It was widely proclaimed that all of the problems of crime and poverty would be solved and the earth would become a veritable paradise. The promises of future glory were ridiculed as "pie in the sky." But the savagery and ruthlessness of two great world conflicts coupled with a depression and panic on the stock markets revealed how foolish were the prophets of plenty and prosperity.

Man has not outgrown his need of religion and the revelation from heaven is as important now as it has ever been. It adequately provides for the needs of man and it is the only thing which does. Man is able to project himself into three time sequences. By the faculty of memory he can live in the past and by the use of foresight or perception he can live in the future, even as he lives in the present in actuality. Since man is a rational and, therefore, a responsible being, he can suffer remorse for his past deeds and fear of the future because of the punishment it may bring.

When man faces the past with a sense of guilt and the future with a sense of dread because of the past, the present can become a constant torture, and he may actually crack under the strain. He is caught between the tension created by the past and future and is pressed as if by two great weights. That is why such a person is spoken of as being "depressed." No one can function normally or happily in such a state. It is obvious that man must be freed and liberated in all three dimensions of time if he is to fulfill his purpose on earth. It is our conviction that a faith adequate to the needs of modern man must provide five things.

1. FREEDOM FROM SIN

No man can ever undo an act which he has committed. Since all have sinned and come short of the glory of God, and since all sin is an offence against the majesty of heaven, a religion calculated to suit man's need must be one which provides for forgiveness of sin and restoration of the state of union with the Father. Man must be freed from the guilt, contamination, dominion and consequence of his sin, else he can know no happiness in this life.

The religion set forth in the new covenant scriptures does all of this. In the first place, forgiveness is accorded by the only one capable of truly granting it, God himself. "And be kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, as God in Christ forgave you." (Eph. 4:32). Moreover, there is a distinct promise that such sins will no longer be remembered by God. "For I will be merciful toward their iniquities, and I will remember their sins no more" (Heb. 8:12). In Colossians 2:13, God is spoken of as "having forgiven us all our trespasses."

In addition, the Christian system promises us justification. This is very important to our peace of mind and we need to understand it. In the legal usage of the word no one can be justified except the man who is absolutely innocent and free of guilt. Upon such a basis none of us can ever be justified because all of us are guilty before God. In the scriptural sense God treats those who fully trust in Jesus as if they were innocent. Our justification is by divine decree through grace. "It is God who justifies" (Rom. 8:33). He simply pardons our sins when we come into Christ and regards us as if we had never sinned. "They are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 3:24).

This makes possible a reconciliation. The broken ties are restored, the gulf is bridged, the breach is repaired. The apostle says that "while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son" (Rom. 5:10). Again he says, "All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself" (2 Cor. 5:18). This is not all. Let us suppose that a man who has slaves in his possession calls them all to assemble for an important announcement and when they do, he informs them that they are granted their liberty or freedom. Surely this would be an hour of destiny in their lives. But suppose that he then informs them that he is adopting all of them into his family so they may wear his name, eat at his table, and share in the inheritance with his firstborn son who from henceforth will be recognized as their elder brother.

That is exactly what God has done for us. "So through God you are no longer a slave but a son, and if a son then an heir" (Gal. 4:7). The human personality is thus freed from guilt and remorse for sins of the past and we can be certain that these will be remembered no more.

2. A PURPOSE IN LIFE

Man cannot live happily and live a purposeless existence. He must be dedicated to a cause outside of and greater than himself which will provide an outlet for his energies and thoughts. He must have something worth dying for or he will have nothing worth living for. Much of the prevalence of nervous disorders and mental breakdowns in our day is traceable to the fact that many have no real goal in life. They have had as an aim the attainment to security only on a selfish and material level and now that "they have it made" it unmakes them.

We have become imbued with the thought of retiring when actually there can be no such thing. Thus many who retire simply die ahead of time and do not realize it. They are like professional mountain-climbers who have no peaks left to challenge them and the only thing left is to bask in the reflected glories of the past. The human spirit does not retire when one bids farewell to his job. It is for this reason that some say of men who have retired that "they flop about as a chicken with its head cut off." It is obvious that such a fowl is not going anywhere and will accomplish nothing in spite of its actions.

Christianity furnishes us an objective for life, and that statement can be taken in two ways— as to goal and time! It gives us a reason for living and does so as long as we live. Paul said, "It is my eager expectation and hope that I shall not be at all ashamed, but that with full courage now as always Christ will be honored in my body, whether by life or death" (Phil. 1:20). Contrast this vital, energizing statement with the attitude of a lot of older folk who sit around bemoaning their fate and feeling sorry for themselves. A lot of those who think they are in the way just need to be in The Way! It will make a lot of difference. Here are a few things that true faith will enable you to do.

Become a junior partner in the firm of God and Company, Unlimited, in the saving of the world.

Share the knowledge you have gained through study and experience with others who are in the learning process.

Enrich the lives of others by a genuine example of the faith which conquers difficulties and accepts, without whimpering and complaining, those things which cannot be avoided.

3. A SENSE OF BELONGING

Man is a gregarious creature. That means he is inclined to "flock" with others of his kind. He is not adapted to a lone wolf existence but is a social being. It is essential to man's welfare that he belong to the group. This tendency to want to belong is the real reason for many fraternities and associations. It is also the divine reason for creating a fellowship in which the saints may function and assist each other.

The idea that one can be just as good a Christian out of the fellowship as in it is foreign to the whole spiritual concept. Edification is a mutual process. One does not grow or mature alone but in company with others. The expression "one another" is used often in the scriptures. It is from a word meaning "mutual or reciprocal." Every person is important to Christ and must be important to every other person in Christ.

So closely knit together are those in Christ Jesus that they actually constitute a body. So interwoven are their interests that they are truly "members one of another." "For as in one body we have many members, and all the members do not have the same function, so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another" (Romans 12:5).

Just as there is no useless member of the physical body so there is no useless appendage to the spiritual body. Every member is important. All contribute something valuable. "To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good" (1 Cor. 12:7). One member cannot tell another that he is not needed. "On the contrary, the parts of the body which seem to be weaker are indispensable" (1 Cor. 12:22). The members are to have the same care one for another.

Every person to be healthy emotionally must feel that he is wanted and that he is loved for his own sake. In the body of Christ one is loved not because he is likeable but because he is loved of God. His worth is determined not by what he has but by who has him. It is not reckoned by what he can do for God but by what God has done for him. It is the cross which sets our value. If Jesus loved us enough to die for us we ought to love each other enough to live for him and for each other.

The church of God is the greatest fraternity on earth. It bases brotherhood on a common fatherhood and fellowship upon divine sonship. We are blood brothers because we have been purchased with his blood. We belong together because together we belong to Him. Here there are no national, legal, social, racial or other lines. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female, but all are one in him" because he is all in all. No one need to feel left out who has been brought in. We are citizens of the same kingdom, children of the same family, and sons of the same father. Our need for social recognition is met abundantly in the circle of his love.

4. NO FEAR OF DEATH

Freedom from the guilt attached to our misdeeds of the past takes care of our previous existence and its futility. The consciousness of having a challenging purpose in life and the sense of belonging make it possible for us to place a proper value on the present, but something more is needed. To be emotionally stable one has to have assurance that his dreams will not be forever shattered by death nor the results of his creativity suddenly end or be abruptly terminated by his decease.

Death is real. It cannot be evaded or avoided. It has to be faced regardless of our reluctance. There are many who cannot bring themselves to face its reality. When a loved one dies they tint and paint the corpse and talk about how natural he looks. They frequently say that he looks almost as if he were ready to speak. Beautiful little poems are read to the effect that, "He is not dead, he is just away!" But the word of God plainly says that "the body without the spirit is dead." When Jesus spoke of Lazarus as having fallen asleep his disciples misunderstood his meaning. "Then Jesus told them plainly, 'Lazarus is dead:'" He removed any doubt.

Fear of death may stem from a great many factors. There may be the dread of the last struggle in which the spirit wrenches itself from the tabernacle of clay, or a recoil from the dissolution and decomposition of the flesh in the narrow confines of a cold and dark sepulcher. However, it is our view that death creates dread especially because it ends one's personal participation in his plan for life. In the Saint Louis Art Museum is a piece of statuary entitled, "The Angel of Death and the Sculptor." It depicts a sculptor with hammer upraised to strike the chisel with which he is carving a beautiful figure. But the Angel of Death has just laid a hand upon his shoulder to summon him from his unfinished task. The look of incredulity and unbelief upon the face of the sculptor is almost indescribable.

Nothing is more clearly taught in the Bible than the fact that Jesus came "to deliver those who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." Death is not the end. It does not swallow up all that is precious but it is destined to be swallowed up. "When the perishable puts on the imperishable and the mortal puts on immortality, then shall come to pass the saying that is written— Death is swallowed up in victory." We are not accustomed to thinking of death and victory in the same breath but this is the effect of Christianity.

A Christian does not suffer loss but makes a gain in death. He does not leave home, he goes home. He does not end it all but all that is precious begins. It was the cheerfulness of the primitive Christians in the face of death which so amazed the Pagans. The futile fatalism of the heathen was in marked contrast to the fervent faithfulness of those in Christ. It was expressed in the words of the apostle, "That you sorrow not as others which have no hope."

Nowhere is the difference between the attitude of the believer and that of the unbeliever toward death more apparent than in the inscriptions upon the graves discovered in the catacombs, the underground galleries which served as cemeteries for ancient Rome. Jews and Pagans as well as Christians used the catacombs as a burial place. The epitaphs reveal the philosophy of the dead. Out of the scores which have been translated we select this typical one from a Pagan sepulcher. "Fortune makes many promises but keeps none of them; live then for the present day and hour, since nothing else is really ours." Contrast this with an inscription from a Christian sepulcher in which the name and age of the deceased have worn away and become undecipherable. "Blessed be the name of the Lord who gave and has taken away . . . lived . . . years, and ended his life in peace."

When Cyprian wrote concerning the Christians who died in the pestilence which raged during the reigns of Gallus and Valerian (A.D. 251-260) he said, "How often and how manifestly has it been revealed to me by the condescension of God, that I should publicly declare that our brethren who are escaped from this world by the Lord's summons are not to be lamented, since we know they are not lost but gone before. Though they are to be longed for, they are not to be bewailed; and it is not becoming for us to put on black garments for them here, when they are already clothed in white raiment there."

5. AN ETERNAL HOPE

Man, without hope, is like a person in a boat on a dark night, drifting with the current, but without light, chart or compass. Such a person, unable to pierce the gloom must only cower in constant dread of what may occur each minute. He listens for the crunch of his vessel against a rock looming up out of the void, or anticipates going over a precipice to be dashed to pieces in a whirlpool below. And all of the time he is being carried relentlessly onward, unable to stop or to deter his progress toward destiny.

No doubt it is for this reason that the writer of the letter to the Hebrews speaks of God's promise and of the oath with which he binds himself to fulfill it. It is impossible for God to lie and he needed no oath to validate his promise. But men were accustomed to take an oath for confirmation and such an oath became final in attesting to any fact. Thus, for our sakes, God adapted himself to human methods to give us no ground for doubt. "So when God desired to show more convincingly to the heirs of the promise the unchangeable character of his purpose, he interposed with an oath" (Heb. 6:17) .

Thus we have two real grounds for trust, the promise of God and the oath of God. In both of these God must be unvarying and unchangeable since his nature is at stake. "So that through two unchangeable things in which it is impossible that God should prove false, we who have fled for refuge might have strong encouragement to seize the hope set before us." The reference here is no doubt to the cities of refuge described in the old covenant scriptures.

When the children of Israel drove out the Canaanites and possessed their land, a division of territory was made on the basis of tribal lots. The tribe of Levi, constituting the priesthood, received no allotment of land. Instead they were given forty-eight cities. Six of these, three on either side of the Jordan, were designated as cities of refuge. If one accidentally killed a fellow-workman he could flee to one of these cities and be assured of protection against the pursuing avenger of blood. Here he found succor and sustenance while the high priest lived. God has appointed the church of our Lord as a city of refuge unto us today and since our high priest will never die it is an eternal provision.

Thus our hope is spoken of as an anchor to the soul. "We have this as a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul, a hope that enters into the inner shrine behind the curtain, where Jesus has gone as a forerunner on our behalf, having become a high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek" (Hebrews 6:19, 20). An anchor fastened on but one end is useless. Just being tied to the craft is not enough. When thrown out it must take hold of something solid.

One does not see the anchor in the depths nor can he see the rock to which it is fastened. He knows that it is secure by the tautness of the cable and the stability of the ship. So it is with our anchor of hope which is grounded in the Rock of Ages. We cannot envision him because he has gone beyond the curtain of flesh where the physical eye cannot behold. But the tension on the line of faith proves that he is there and we can say of him, "whom having not seen we love." We know that he died but we also know that he lives. We do not worship a dead Christ but a living Saviour. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again even so them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." If we believe! This is the basis of the one great hope which provides us shelter and comfort amidst the buffeting storms of life.

Faith reaches back to take hold of the cross which speaks of sins forgiven. Hope reaches forward to take hold of the Christ who speaks of ultimate triumph. In between is love taking hold of both and enabling us to make the present vital and full. These constitute the abiding trio— faith, hope and love— and they satisfy our needs and stimulate our service to our Father and all of his children. These make our life here rich and fruitful and promise an abundant life beyond which will be precious and eternal. Thus the Christian revelation is related to soul expansion and the unfolding personality.

Christianity is adaptable to man as he is and it is capable of making him what God would have him to be. As to the blackened past it enables him to know that the slate is washed clean by the only power capable of doing it. He does not turn over a new leaf but turns up with a new life. That life is not purposeless or useless. It is dedicated and devoted to adventure on the new frontier of the spirit. Faculties are discovered which were not known to exist, depths are probed which previously were concealed. At the same time, each new day provides new opportunity and the day of death is no exception. Death itself is no longer regarded as a forbidding wall shutting out the light but is seen as a gate opening to brighter vistas in God's tomorrow.

Religion for the space age is simply the faith of the ages. Man cannot outlive his need for it nor travel beyond the point where its tug is not felt upon his heart. So long as men live and die they must have the assurance which comes from the One who died that they might live. We cannot grow so big that we do not need faith although we may become so little that we do not recognize our need. Man cannot save himself by his own intellect or power. He can no more lift himself by his own bookstraps than he can by his own bootstraps. But God has provided for us both the power and wisdom that we need, for it is said that Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God.

"Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."

The Vitality of Christianity

Contents

It is an accepted thesis in some circles that Christianity is a failure. There are those in our day who regard it as the product of a superstitious age and unworthy of consideration by intellectuals. It is no strange role for the Christian system to be under attack by the philosophers. One of the frequent intimations in our day is that Jesus offered nothing original. It is affirmed that all of the principles he enunciated were but a re-statement of truths and facts learned from previous world performers and wise men.

This accusation is not modern either. It is a rehash of the ridicule heaped upon the apostle Paul in Athens. When he argued in the city square with those who chanced to be there, he met some of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers. Because Paul did not employ the jargon of their schools they had difficulty in grasping his theme. They heard him preach about Jesus and the resurrection and they mistook the word for resurrection (anastasis) for the name of a goddess. Since they had a female counterpart for all of their gods, they concluded that Paul was introducing a pair of deities, Jesus and Anastasis. The record tells of their puzzlement in these words, "Others said, 'He seems to be a preacher of foreign divinities'— because he preached Jesus and the resurrection."

There were others who asked, "What will this babbler say?" The word for "babbler" is spermologos. It literally means "to pick up seeds." Aristophanes used it in one of his plays to designate the crows which followed the farmer to pick up the grain being sown. Later it was used to describe the sparrows which frequented the marketplace to snatch waste particles or dart upon discarded food particles. Then it was ascribed to the human parasites who lounged around the centers of business activity and lived upon that which fell from the loaded vans and caravans.

As applied to Paul it simply meant that the philosophers regarded him as a gutter-sparrow who had nothing original to offer, but picked up crumbs and scraps of wisdom and combined these into a synthetic philosophy which they regarded as an admixture of Jewish myths about a crucified one and an attempt to palm him off on the credulous as a god who visited the earth in human form. It can be seen that the modern scholastics and "wise men of the age" are simply employing the tactics of their predecessors of some centuries ago.

I do not admit the validity of the accusations made against Christianity nor concur in the conclusions reached by the critics. Instead, I regard Christianity as I do the word which reveals it—alive and energetic (Heb. 4:12). Most of our present great attainments are the result of its influence and the very freedom to criticize it openly is at least partially attributable to the liberty which it has championed. I want to mention five areas in which it has proven its power to alter the thinking and practice of mankind.

1. HUMAN SLAVERY

When the apostles took the message of salvation to the Roman world they encountered an untold number of abject beings in the throes of slavery. It has been estimated that there were sixty million slaves in the Empire. One historian says of them. "At the lowest extreme of the social scale were millions of slaves, without family, without religion, without possessions, who had no recognized rights, and towards whom none had any recognized duties, passing normally from a childhood of degradation to a manhood of hardship, and an old age of unpitied neglect."

It has always been a point of criticism by the skeptic and infidel that Jesus and the apostles did nothing about slavery. It is affirmed that they made no attack upon it but rather seemed to condone it. This is due to a misunderstanding of the method by which the Son of man accomplished his mission. He did not come as a social reformer or revolutionary. He was not a loud declaimer nor a shouting rabble rouser. It was said of him, "He shall not strive, nor cry; neither shall any man hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory" (Matthew 12:19, 20).

A papyrus reed which had been run over with a chariot wheel was very fragile and the least touch would break it. Smouldering tow needed only the slightest contact to be extinguished. In spite of the gentleness of his approach, however, Jesus was to be effective. He always achieves his goal and brings justice to final victory. He operates not by political upheaval but by changing the hearts and affections of men. Thus Christianity by its principles has overthrown slavery without creating economic chaos. This was done by altering the attitude of men toward one another until the worth and dignity of every individual was known and respected.

When Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, the Roman slave was not regarded as a person. He was looked upon as a mere thing, to be bought, sold and traded on the market like any other commodity. His life was worth only the value placed upon it by his master and frequently this was very low. Augustus nailed one of his slaves to a cross and subjected him to an agonizing death simply because he killed a quail which had been trained to come at a whistle and eat tamely from the emperor's hand. Vedius Pollis became incensed at one of his slaves who inadvertently dropped and broke a treasured crystal wineglass, and ordered him thrown into a fish pond where bloodthirsty eels stripped him of his flesh and reduced him to a skeleton in a short while.

Even the great philosopher Aristotle taught that master and slave had no common ground upon which to meet, since the master was a person and the slave was a mere object. He declared that "A slave is a living tool, just as a tool is an inanimate slave." The death of Jesus for the guilty sinner established forever the worth of every human being before God. From the day that it became known that every man bears the image of God within, human slavery was doomed.

The victory was gained by teaching that "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them" (Matthew 7:12). Then there was the idea that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men" (Acts 12:26), and, "There is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all and in all." The letter to Philemon concerning his runaway slave, Onesimus, was the death warrant of slavery as surely as if Jesus had come with a literal key to unlock the shackles of every unfortunate human pawn on earth.

Clarkson, in his book, Abolition of the Slave Trade, page 27, says, "Among the evils corrected or subdued, either by the influence of Christianity on the minds of men or by particular association of Christians, the African slave trade appears to me to have occupied the foremost place."

2. DISRESPECT OF WOMANHOOD

One frequently hears the Christian concept subjected to criticism as a system which relegates women to an inferior or secondary status. Contrary to this, it was the influence of Christianity which ennobled the woman and has protected her rights wherever faith in Jesus has flourished in the hearts of men. When our Lord was on earth women were looked upon as mere chattels. They were considered in the same light as a piece of furniture— good only to provide for the comfort and convenience of men.

Among the Jews great debates and fervent public discussions had been held about divorce. The majority held that the woman had no right to divorce her husband. Thus the argument was almost wholly about the grounds upon which the husband could dispose of a wife by giving her "her walking papers" so that he could take up with another woman. There were two rabbinical schools and they differed greatly on the subject. The school of Shammai contended that adultery on the part of the wife was the only legal basis for divorce and remarriage. The school of Hillel, in which Gamaliel taught and which Saul of Tarsus attended, insisted that the husband had a right to divorce his wife for even trivial causes.

The interpretation varied only as to what the law meant when it spoke of the husband discovering in his wife "any manner of uncleanness." One Jewish writer says, "In fact, we know that it included every kind of impropriety such as going about with loose hair, spinning in the street, familiarly talking with other men, ill-treating her husband's parents in his presence, brawling, that is, 'speaking to her husband so loudly that the neighbors could hear her in the adjoining house,' a general bad reputation, or the discovery of fraud before marriage."

The Greeks had allowed immorality to become the order of life and practiced it in its grossest forms as a part of their religion. Cult prostitutes and homosexuals were maintained in the heathen temples and the income from their nefarious trade went to support the venial priestcraft which encouraged it. The orator, Demosthenes, described the relationship of the sexes by saying, 'We have courtesans for the sake of pleasure; we have concubines for the sake of daily cohabitation; we have wives for the purpose of bringing up children legitimately, and of having a faithful guardian for our household affairs." Aristotle wrote that, "Women are beings of a certain intermediate state between freemen and slaves."

To Christians living in such a world, Paul wrote to husbands to love their wives "even as Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it." He wrote to wives to submit themselves unto their own husbands as unto the Lord. The relationship of husband and wife was placed on the level of the relationship of Christ and the church. Thus it was elevated to a peak of spiritual values such as it had never attained before. The woman was no longer regarded as a thing but as a person purchased by the blood of God's own Son. "Neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, in the Lord. For as the woman is of the man, even so is the man also by the woman, but all things of God" (1 Cor. 11:11, 12).

No man under the influence of such teaching could ever regard his wife as a mere source of gratification for his selfish desire. It is to the influence of Christian revelation that the world owes all that has been gained in proper reverence for womankind. That revelation lifted the wife from the place of a chattel to that of a companion. It made a vital truth stand out, that "the two are one flesh," so that a man could no more abuse his wife than he would his own person. What a difference was made through such exhortations as that of the apostle Peter, "Likewise you husbands, live considerately with your wives, bestowing honor on the woman as the weaker sex, since you are joint heirs of the grace of life."

3. TAKING HUMAN LIFE FOR SPORT

As the Roman Empire became more decadent and corrupt, the sensibilities of the populace became more hardened and their tastes more cruel. The investiture of the gods with depraved passions and degenerate practices eventually produced its fruit of degradation. It is an inviolable law that man becomes more like that which he worships each time that he worships. Unconsciously he assumes the traits and cultivates the character which he ascribes to his gods. In the Roman world cruelty and salaciousness became the way of life.

The entertainments became more elaborate and more vicious. Gladiatorial combats in which men hacked each other into bloody bits were featured performances. Life was cheap. The blood spurting from human arteries, severed by the broadsword, stained the sands of the arena but brought no compassionate reaction from the stands. I should like to read you a vivid description of what occurred when men were lashed and driven into the arena to be butchered in order to make a Roman holiday.

"Straightway, tier upon tier, eighty thousand faces rise, up to the last high rank beneath the awning's shade. Meanwhile, under his silken canopy, sits the emperor of the world, sodden-faced, ghastly, swine-eyed, robed in purple; all alone, save for his dwarf, bull-nosed, slit-mouthed, hunch-backed, sly. Next, on the lowest bench, the Vestals, old and young, the elder looking on with hard faces and dry eyes, the youngest with wide and startled looks, and parted lips, and quick-drawn breath that sobs and is caught at sight of each deathly stab and gash of broadsword and trident, and hands that twitch and clutch at each other as a man's foot slips in a pool of blood and the heavy harness clashes in the red, wet sand. Then gray-haired senators; then curled and perfumed knights of Rome; then the people, countless, vast, frenzied, bloodthirsty, stretching out eighty thousand hands with thumbs reversed, commanding death to the fallen— full eighty thousand throats of men and women roaring, yelling, shrieking over each ended life. A theater indeed, a stage indeed, a play wherein every scene of every act ends in sudden death."

Christianity came pleading, "Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you" (Eph. 4:31, 32). It summoned the world to remember that some day all men will be brought into judgment, with the words, "By your hard and impenitent heart you are storing up wrath for yourself on the day of wrath when God's righteous judgment shall be revealed" (Romans 2:5).

The effect of such passages as the following can hardly be estimated. "Repay no evil for evil, but take thought for what is noble in the sight of all. If possible, so far as it depends upon you, live peaceably with all. Beloved, never avenge yourselves, but leave it to the wrath of God; for it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, says the Lord.' No, if your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him drink; for by so doing you will heap burning coals upon his head."

But the Christians were not content with proclamation alone, they also believed in action. In Fox's Book of Martyrs is recorded the deed of Telemachus, a Christian from the wilds of Asia who came to Rome to preach against murder committed in the name of pleasure. Here is what happened.

"The show went on; many had been slain, and the people, madly excited by the desperate bravery of those who continued to fight, shouted their applause. But suddenly there was an interruption. A rudely clad, robed figure appeared for a moment among the audience, and then boldly leaped down into the arena. He was seen to be a man of rough but imposing presence, bareheaded and with sun-browned face. Without hesitating an instant he advanced upon two gladiators engaged in a life-and-death struggle, and laying his hand upon one of them sternly reproved him for shedding innocent blood, and then, turning toward the thousands of angry faces ranged around him, called upon them in a solemn, deep-toned voice which resounded through the deep inclosure. These were his words: 'Do not requite God's mercy in turning away the swords of your enemies by murdering one another!'

"Angry shouts and cries at once drowned his voice: 'This is no place for preaching!— the old customs of Rome must be observed!— On gladiators!' Thrusting aside the stranger, the gladiators would have again attacked each other, but the man stood between, holding them apart, and trying in vain to be heard. 'Sedition! sedition! down with him!' was then the cry; and the gladiators, enraged at the interference of an outsider with their chosen vocation, at once stabbed him to death. Stones, or whatever missiles came to hand, also rained down upon him from the furious people, and thus he perished, in the midst of the arena."

But the aftermath was good, and Fox describes it in these words, "He had died, but not in vain. His work was accomplished at the moment he was struck down, for the shock of such a death before their eyes turned the hearts of the people: they saw the hideous aspects of the favorite vice to which they had blindly surrendered themselves; and from the day Telemachus fell dead in the Colosseum, no other fight of gladiators was ever held there."

The famous Irish historian, W. E. H. Lecky, writing in his History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne, says in Volume 1, page 282: "It is well to look at facts such as these, as they enable us in some degree to estimate the regenerating influence that Christianity has exercised in the world. The destruction of the gladiatorial games is all its work."

Again, in Volume 2, page 36, he says: "There is scarcely any other single reform so important in the moral history of mankind as the suppression of the gladiatorial shows, and this feat must be exclusively ascribed to the Christian church."

4. LACK OF REGARD FOR CHILDREN

In no area of human existence is the effect of Christianity seen more favorably than in the care for children. We live in a world where child labor laws make impossible the exploitation of little children for commercial purposes. We have child welfare and aid to dependent children programs. There are hospitals exclusively devoted to crippled children. The courts give special attention to the needs of the young. It is extremely difficult for us to envision the lot of children in ancient Greece and Rome. The merciful influence of Christianity has invaded the hearts of men and women and affected our society beyond our ability to imagine.

In the first place there existed in the pagan world what was known as child exposure. When a baby was born, if it was not wanted, it was simply taken out to the city dump or elsewhere, and tossed away. Scores of babies were left by the Lactarian Pillar in the Roman Forum, and these were gathered up after dark by people who reared them either to sell as slaves or prostitutes while they were still of a tender age. So widespread was this practice that when Justin Martyr inveighs against the morals of the pagans he declares that a man who visits a brothel may actually lie with his own daughter. It must not be thought that such a thing as child exposure was practiced only by the poverty-stricken and illiterate. It was condoned and justified by the most eminent philosophers.

It is the thesis of Plato in his Republic that the human flock or herd should be built up by breeding only the best of both sexes of mankind. He says, "Those of inferior parents and any children of the rest that are born defective will be hidden away, in some appropriate manner that must be kept secret." Aristotle writes in his Politics, "As to exposing or rearing the children that are born, let there be a law that no deformed children shall be reared."

Seneca, the great Roman statesman, philosopher and playwright, who later became the tutor to Nero, was probably born the same year as our Lord, and died by his own hands while Paul was imprisoned at Rome. Incidentally, he was the brother of Gallio, the proconsul of Achaia before whom Paul was dragged according to Acts 18:12-16. From him we have an account of the attitude toward crippled or deformed children. Seneca, who was influenced by the Stoics, wrote a series of Epistulae Morales to his friend Lucilius, who was an Epicurean. In one of the treatises on Anger he says, "Mad dogs we knock on the head; the fierce and savage ox we slay; sickly sheep we put to the knife to keep them from infecting the flock; unnatural progeny we destroy; we drown even children who at birth are weakly and abnormal. Yet it is not anger but reason that separates the harmful from the sound."

All of this lends special significance to the words of Jesus when the disciples, becoming exasperated at mothers trying to bring their children to Jesus, ordered them away. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." This raised children to a position they had not previously occupied in that generation among the Greeks and Romans. The crucial blow was struck when Jesus used a child as an object lesson for his ambitious disciples and said, "Whosoever receives one such child in my name receives me," and again, "See that you do not despise one of these little ones; for I tell you that in heaven their angels always behold the face of my Father, who is in heaven."

We cannot fail to see the underlying purpose of the expression, ''bring them up," in Paul's word to fathers. "Fathers, do not provoke your children to anger, but bring them up in the discipline and instruction of the Lord." This statement about anger was written near the time of the treatise on "Anger" penned by Seneca. It is not inconceivable that they may have been written in the same building since Seneca was a very close associate of Sextus Burrus, who was prefect of the Praetorian guard at the very time that Paul was placed in the custody of that guard in Rome. In any event, we have a striking contrast between the concept of the Stoic and that of the Christian, and we can rejoice that the latter prevailed. Every child born into this world is a debtor to the Christian faith.

5. SUPERSTITION

Those who read the pronouncements of modern humanistic philosophers are familiar with the charge that Christianity was born of superstition and grew to maturity to sire and perpetuate it. It is only these philosophers who are modern. The accusation is almost as old as Christianity itself. One has only to read the vain and ridiculous attacks made by Roman satirists in the first century to see that the moderns are but the "trained parrots" of the ancients.

What are the facts? Christianity was cradled in the hearts of slaves and other humble men in an age when superstition was rife. That age was "the twilight of the gods." The structure of classic polytheism was as hollow as its temples were empty. The emperor had been elevated to the status of a god but this served only to drag the gods down to the status of a dissolute emperor. One reads with interest the decrees of Claudius issued in an attempt to bolster faith in the gods. He recognizes that this is an open admission that the gods had abdicated, fleeing from Olympus and being ejected from the inner shrines of the beings of men. The decrees were but injections given to a corpse from which the spirit had departed.

The state of affairs is aptly described by Canon Farrar in that book which he dedicated to the poet, Robert Browning, and which he titled *The Early Days of Christianity. Here are his words: "The upper classes were 'destitute of faith, yet terrified at skepticism.' They had long learnt to treat the current mythology as a mass of worthless fables, scarcely amusing enough for even a schoolboy's laughter, but they were the ready dupes of every wandering quack who chose to assume the character of a mathematicus or a mage. Their official religion was a decrepit Theogony; their real religion was a vague and credulous fatalism, which disbelieved in the existence of the gods, or held with Epicurus that they were careless of mankind. The mass of the populace either accorded to the old beliefs a nominal adherence which saved them the trouble of giving any thought to the matter, and reduced their creed and their morals to a survival of national habits; or else they plunged with eager curiosity into the crowd of foreign cults."

The Christian faith is adapted to the needs of a crazy, mixed-up world. It was born at a time when men were pleasure-mad and living in a helter-skelter social atmosphere where suicide was advocated as an honorable way to escape the pressures and tensions of human existence. It came like a fresh breeze from the ocean of divine love blowing through the fetid tenements of the city on the Tiber. Men lost their fear of the unknown when they came to know Him who knows all. They ceased to be frightened by the gods of the people when they became "the people of God." It is not necessary that we know what the future holds when we know him who holds the future.

I deny that Christianity is either the daughter or the handmaiden of superstition. It is the greatest liberating force in the universe. Superstition is founded upon fear but Christianity is based upon love. "Perfect love casteth out fear." Superstition drives men to drink, drugs and death. Christianity leads men to love, light and life. Those who, under the guise of superior wisdom, deride the Christian way and deny its efficacy in our modern life, are only pleading for a return to the jungle with its "law of fang and claw." The fact that it will become an asphalt jungle with revolver and switchblade knife substituted for the more primitive weapons makes it only more dangerous.

Our real hope lies with Christianity. Its vitality has been attested in the centuries past. The transformed life must accompany the informed mind, or our intellectual abilities will only refine our cruelties and perfect our callousness. I believe that the Christian faith is like the Lord who gave it unto us, capable of rising from the grave in which men seek to confine it. It matters little whether the grave be a sepulcher hewn out of stone or carved in a heart of stone. There is no power which can resist the Spirit by which Jesus was raised when the fulness of God's time arrives in any generation of the world.

Think of the victories of the cross! Look about you and count your blessings and as you do, be enthralled by the realization that these are your heritage from Calvary. Life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the rights of free men in a free society— all of these are products, directly or indirectly, of the Christian faith. We have no apology to offer for the faith of our fathers. That faith is as divine as our fathers were human. If in their humanity, they made mistakes we should profit by them. We can improve upon their lives but not upon their faith. That which God gave is perfect, that which we return to him is not!

Christianity is alive! It is vital! It is the answer to all of the problems of this age as it was the answer in that age in which it was first revealed. It has not been weighed in the balances and found wanting. It is the balance in which we shall be weighed! Let us seek to make it the compelling force that it can become when translated into life.

The Scarlet Line

Joshua and Jericho! These two names have become famous in song and story. When I mention them I know that immediately we have the attention of every listener. All of us who are familiar with the Bible remember that, after forty years of leadership through what was called a terrible wilderness, Moses was retired from his post by God and Joshua was designated to lead into Canaan the descendants of those whom Moses had led out of Egypt.

Joshua was a strategic general. He knew the value of a preliminary survey of the lay of the land. While his host was in camp across the Jordan River from Jericho he sent two members of his secret service to spy on the city and to bring him a report of their reconnaissance action. As soon as the men entered the city they located the house of a harlot, whose name was Rahab, and here they established their temporary headquarters. The counterintelligence forces of the king of Jericho were on the alert, however, and they informed the king the same night that the spies had infiltrated their ranks. When it was ascertained where they were concealed the king sent members of his secret police to Rahab and demanded that the men be turned over to the authorities. Rahab informed them that the men had indeed visited her but she told them they had left at dusk just before the city gates were closed for the night. She urged the police to waste no time in pursuing the fugitives. So convincing was her story that the guards immediately left the city and hastened to the fords of the Jordan, after first checking to see that the gates of the city were closed and barred.

During this time the spies lay hidden under stalks of flax which were drying on the roof, a place of concealment to which Rahab had brought them. When she came to discuss a possible way of escape she informed them of her trust in the Lord whom they served. Although reared in a pagan environment and among idolaters, she had heard enough about the wonders which the Lord had performed for Israel that she did not doubt any longer but what His will would be done. She mentioned the miracle performed at the Red Sea when the people came out of Egypt, as well as the utter overthrow of the two Amorite kings, Sihon and Og, in the land of Trans-Jordania. She declared that these combined acts of power, one against the forces of nature and the other against the forces of armed might, had completely unnerved the armies of Jericho and there was no heart left in them.

I cannot resist mentioning just here that we have one of those undesigned coincidences which lend so much support to the Biblical account of miracles. For a number of years those critics who have been devoting their time to discrediting the miraculous have scoffed at the record of how the Red Sea was divided so the forces of Israel could go through on dry land. They have sought to account for it by many and devious ways, the most popular of which has been that a terrific wind from the desert may have blown across the shallow water and whipped much of it out of its channel so that the water appeared to be separated. But the account of what happened had preceded the Israelites and was of sufficient credibility to melt the resistance and lower the morale of nations which did not even believe in God. Rahab said, 'We have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you."

One purpose of miraculous events was to make believers. In the case of Rahab they achieved that purpose. Since she did not doubt the success of Israel's invasion she was interested in protecting the lives of her family. She wanted the men to reciprocate her kindness in sparing their lives by sparing the lives of her relatives. The men made a solemn oath that if she would not reveal their purpose in coming they would save her family when the land fell into their hands. Since her house was built with an upper window projecting over the town wall Rahab lowered the men over the wall with a scarlet line or rope.

The men said, "Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window, which thou didst let us down by: and then thou shalt bring thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father's household home unto thee. And it shall be, that whosoever shall go out of the doors of thy house into the street, his blood shall be upon his head, and we will be guiltless: and whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him." This part of the narrative closes with the words, "And she bound the scarlet line in the window."

There are some things in the story I would like to have you note very carefully. Remember that there were many houses in the city of Jericho, but there was only one with the promise of life when the time of Judgment and destruction came. It was the house protected by the scarlet line. This was the real mark of identity. This was the criterion of hope. Those who were behind the scarlet line were safe, those who were not had no promise. It was not enough to come into this house but those who did so had to remain there until delivered from fear. Those who went back out or who ventured into the street had no hope. The only possibility of salvation was to enter the house protected by the scarlet line and remain there.

Since we have made reference to the time when the children of Israel were delivered from the bondage of Egypt let us go back in our minds to that occasion and think about some of the means used by God to effect their freedom from slavery.

You will recall that while Moses was an exile and shepherd in the land of Midian he received word from God to return to the land of Egypt and demand of Pharaoh that he let the people go. Pharaoh was haughty and arrogant. He refused to hearken unto the words of God as spoken by Moses and Aaron so it became necessary for God to visit a series of calamities upon the land in order to break down his resistance. We commonly refer to these as the ten plagues.

One after another, in awful sequence, these tragedies befell the land until nine had passed. The long-suffering of God had been taxed to the utmost and he said to Moses, "Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh and upon Egypt, afterwards he will let you go hence." The tenth disaster would take the life of the firstborn in every house in Egypt. Now it was true among the Egyptians as among many other ancient peoples that the firstborn was looked upon with special reverence and respect. Later on, God was to demand the firstborn of every family of Israel, the firstborn of all domesticated animals, and the firstfruits of all cultivable trees and crops, because he had redeemed the firstborn unto himself by the destruction of the firstborn of Egypt.

The decree on the fateful night was, "About midnight I will go out into the midst of Egypt, and all the firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sitteth upon the throne, even unto the firstborn of the maidservant that is behind the mill; and all the firstborn of beasts. And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more" (Exodus 11:4-6). It was to be a night of judgment and there would be varied emotions. The freed captives would rejoice exceedingly and those who had held them captive would engage in unrestrained weeping and wailing.

Of special interest is the feast ordained to mark the occasion, for God often used festivals as monuments to outstanding events which he wished to have commemorated. Even the name given to the feast is of significance. It was called "the passover." On the tenth day of the month, the head of each household was told to take a lamb and pen it up. On the fourteenth day of the month the lamb was to be killed "between the evenings," that is, at approximately three o'clock in the afternoon, as we count time. The lamb was to be slain in such a manner that not a bone in its body was broken.

The blood of the lamb was to be caught in a basin and the instruction of God was, "And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel and the two side posts with the blood that is in the basin, and none of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning. For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood on the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you" (Exodus 12:22, 23). As God phrased it at another time, "And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where you are; and when I see the blood I will pass over you."

Let us now notice a few details of the first passover. The houses in Egypt that were to be spared from the visit of the death angel were those which had been protected by the blood of a slain lamb. It was not enough that the lamb be killed but the blood had to be applied to be effective. It is noteworthy that the blood was swiped on the lintel over the door and on the two side posts. It was not placed on the threshold for this was to be a type of the blood of Christ and not even in type was the blood of the Son of God to be trodden underfoot (Hebrews 10:29). The blood of the lamb was a scarlet line on the front of the houses.

Safety lay only inside the house which had the blood applied. It was said that none should go out of the house until morning. The night of death could be safely overcome only by remaining behind the blood line. Deliverance was by blood! And this brings us to consideration of another scarlet line of blood which extended for thousands of years from the altar of Abel to the cross of Christ.

Most of you have heard the story of the British rope-making firm which always wove a strand of red into every rope produced in its factory. This became a mark of identification for its product all over the world. Wherever a foot of severed rope was found it could always be traced to its source by this red line running through the midst of it. The same can be said for God's revelation. The word "religion" means literally to "bind back." The divinely ordained rope by which we are bound back to God has a strand of scarlet from its inception to its culmination. This is the identifying mark of singularity by which we can determine its origin.

When Adam and Eve were driven from the primeval garden, two sons were born unto them. The firstborn, Cain, grew up to be a farmer. His brother, Abel, became a shepherd. These are the oldest occupations in the world. The Bible tells us that "in the course of time" each of these brought an offering unto the Lord. Cain brought the produce of his fields but Abel brought lambs from his flock. "The Lord had regard for Abel and his offering, but for Cain and his offering he had no regard." Occasionally I meet some person who thinks God acted arbitrarily in this case. I do not think so at all.

It is my view that Abel brought the kind of sacrifice that God requested while Cain substituted something else. I regard this as an instance of will worship. Of course, in one sense, all worship is will worship. We either say to God, "Thy will be done," or "My will be done." If I am questioned as to my ground for thinking that God had specified the kind of offering he wanted I refer to Hebrews 11:4, "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh.'

"Now faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God" (Romans 10:17). Faith is simply the belief of testimony. Where there is no testimony there is no faith. Faith cannot go beyond the testimony. Where testimony ends, faith ends. If Abel acted by faith he must have proceeded upon the basis of God's expressed will. Thus, in the first two men born upon the earth, we have a demonstration of obedience based upon faith and of disobedience based upon lack of faith or concern. In Matthew 23:35 Jesus calls Abel "righteous," but in 1 John 3:12 it is said that "Cain was of that wicked one and slew his brother." The righteous are those who heed the voice of God, the unrighteous are those who heed the voice of the wicked one.

Why did God require a blood sacrifice which made imperative the death of an innocent victim? It was certainly not because of any pleasure derived merely from seeing animals die or beholding their carcasses consumed by flame. The writer of Hebrews has Jesus saying to the Father, "In burnt offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure." It was not because there was any efficacy in the death of animals to purge the sins of men. "For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins."

Perhaps we can better grasp the divine intention by an understanding of two words in the context in which these very expressions occur. In Hebrews 10:1 we are told that, "the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things, can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually make the comers thereunto perfect." The word "shadow" is applied to the animal sacrifices. But there can be no shadow without a substance. In order to have a shadow it is necessary to have three things— a reality, a light, and a reflection. As the light shines upon the substance a reflection is cast backwards and creates a shadow.

The light is the glorious gospel (2 Cor. 4:4) and as it shines upon the cross of Jesus we can see that the sacrifices which preceded his death were simply pale reflections or mere outlines of "good things to come." Before the light shone, those who offered the sacrifices regarded them as the reality. Now we can recognize them for what they are and for what they were intended to be. The Greek word for "shadow" is one that would have been used to represent a negative if the art of photography had existed in the days of Jesus. The word for "image" is actually the word for portrait. The developed photograph is found in Jesus Christ our Lord and in him we can clearly see the details of God's purpose. The animal sacrifices were the negative, his sacrifice is the positive representation of God's word. The idea of the photograph is a good illustration because the word literally means "written in light."

God began a scarlet line with the altar of Abel. It flowed through the centuries and ended only when the spear was thrust into the side of Jesus and his blood gushed forth. In Acts 20:28 we learn that God purchased the church "with the blood of his Own." The scarlet line provides salvation for "the house of God which is the church of the living God" (1 Tim. 2:15). There is but one body or church in the world for the church is a divine building created of living stones. Those who are in the church are behind the scarlet line. They have the protection promised by God to all who are in Christ Jesus.

There are some persons so foolish as to argue that they can be saved as well out of the church as in it. They overlook the fact that when God appoints salvation in a place one must be in that place or suffer the consequences. God appointed salvation inside the ark constructed by Noah and those who were outside of it perished. He appointed salvation in the cities of refuge which he set aside in the possessions of the tribes and those who did not enter them were slain by the avenger of blood. In Egypt on the night of the passover salvation lay behind the blood line and those who went out of the houses protected by it died for their daring. In the city of Jericho salvation was found only in the house of Rahab. Those who were outside were destroyed. God has ordained that the saved ones today be in the church. It is our shelter against evil and destruction. In it our "life is hid with Christ in God."

The cross of Calvary gave meaning to every altar constructed by Abel and Abraham, by Jacob and Job. The blood flowing from the bodies of slain beasts was not an end in itself but simply the means to an end. Recently a group of cave explorers, who call themselves "spelunkers" set out to investigate a portion of a cavern in Missouri where no one had even gone before. As they went along they unrolled a ball of red string which was securely fastened to the wall at the entrance. If they became lost or confused by the tortuous trail they pursued they could always trace their way back to the light by following the red line. So God makes it possible for mankind groping in darkness to follow the blood line until it terminates at the point where the light of the world was seen in the fulness of glory. Without the cross the altars and sacrifices would have led nowhere and all would have been utter confusion. The old rugged cross is the terminal of a long rugged road.

One of the great hospitals in a large midwestern city has worked out a clever method of saving time and personnel. There are three different lines of colored tile laid down the corridor from the very entrance. If a visitor asks how to get to the cafeteria he is told to follow the yellow line; if he wants to get to the elevator he is instructed to follow the blue line. The center line is red and it guides donors directly to the blood bank. God drew a red line from man's entrance into the world, from the Garden of Eden, and by following it man was led from the door of sin to the great blood bank of heaven, the cross of Jesus, where the whole world can be transfused and given new lease upon life by his blood. Here we do not come as givers but as receivers; here love reaches us and assures us that in Him we are safe. Man who was at cross purposes with God is restored by the "cross purpose" of heaven.

Let us think again of the house of Rahab, the only house in Jericho where there was safety, and that because it was under the protection of the scarlet line. Rahab knew that destruction was coming and she also knew where hope of life could be found. Her relatives depended for their preservation upon the information she furnished and upon the invitation she gave them to come into the house. Without her willingness to share the news with them they would have been destroyed. The same thing is true today. Those who are in the house of God and who know about the salvation provided by the blood of Jesus are obligated to take this message to all who are outside. The invitation to come in must be given. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come; let him that heareth say, Come." If men are lost through our indifference or carelessness their blood will be upon our heads.

But it is not enough to enter God's house. One must remain behind the blood or be lost. To go out again into the street of sin is to invite disaster and catastrophe. God does not force anyone to enter nor hold them captive against their will or volition. We come in by choice and remain through desire. It would no doubt amaze us if we knew how many begin the race of life and never finish it, or how many are lost by defection. Once when I was a mere lad I witnessed the burning of a barn in which a number of horses were stabled. A few of them could be reached and were led to safety, but several of these jerked loose from their rescuers and dashed back into the raging inferno where their agonized screams betokened the torture preceding death. One can excuse this precipitous action upon the part of unreasoning animals but how can we account for rational beings who were saved from sin plunging back into a state where they will suffer the pangs of hell?

In Jericho those who went out into the street brought their own blood upon their heads. Their rashness brought death because they deserted the only place which offered hope of life. There was no exception made. Whether one went out to meet friends, to transact business, to pursue pleasure, or to satisfy idle curiosity, he had to pay the price for his folly. Nor did it make any difference how long he had been in the house before he went out. His refusal to abide by the decree of the spies, the servants of God, was sufficient to incur death. A great many today are lured by business and pleasure, or by worldly friends. Some who have been in God's shelter for years abandon it to follow their fleshly inclinations. But the choice must be made between his blood upon our hearts or our blood upon our heads.

We believe that a correct understanding of the design of the scarlet line flowing down the altars of past ages will be a sufficient answer to the liberal critics of our own day. These often scoff at the old covenant scriptures. They talk in derision about God as "a bloody butcher" and speak of "a slaughter house religion." They look at the form and not the spirit and confuse the shadow with the substance. Seen in proper perspective the validity of sacrifice is apparent to one who loves God. The age of animal sacrifices is regarded as an educative interval leading the minds of men upward and onward. It was essential to lead a world of fallen mankind to a correct apprehension of the enormity of sin, the nature of redemption and the majesty of God.

The shedding of blood speaks eloquently to a careless world of how God regards sin. We are prone to excuse and minimize our transgressions. 'We regard our iniquity too lightly, forgetting that it affects our being in every department of our existence— physically, mentally, morally and spiritually. Sin corrupts the heart, sears the conscience, alienates the affections and pollutes the body. But no man can be rescued who does not know that he is in danger. One will not be saved who does not recognize that he is lost. The full impact of sin must be brought home to the indifferent. Nothing is more calculated to do this than to see death inflicted upon an innocent victim and to know that the suffering and loss incurred comes because of one's own guilt.

In the kindergarten and elementary days of human development, when mankind was passing through the ages of infancy and childhood, and the race had to be taught by object lessons, God brought home to human consciousness through sacrifices, lessons that could be learned in no other fashion. Before we accuse the heavenly Father of unworthy tactics, let us at least seek to understand the motivations behind his actions and requirements. When we do we will see that sacrifices were not offered to arouse benevolent feelings in God nor to stimulate his mercy and loving kindness. Instead of our calling God's grace into active application by sacrifice, it was the grace of God active in our behalf which provided sacrifice for lessons we could learn in no other way. A parent should not be censured for allowing children to play in the shadows when their eyes have been blinded and they must approach the light by degrees. It is an act of mercy not to thrust them at once into the full glare of the sunlight. Sacrifice is not the cause of His love but an effect of it. It is not the key that unlocks the door of God's goodness unto us but a manifestation of a loving heart that even our sin could not close against us.

The scarlet line not only binds us back to God and to each other as "blood brothers" of the Lamb, but it binds together and correlates into one harmonious whole the entire revelation of God. The message to the patriarchs who led a nomadic existence, and to whom God spoke in lonely solitude, is related to that which was thundered from the summit of Sinai at the constitution of a nation come to birth. And both are tied by altar and sacrifice to the Christian message of the cross with its cleansing blood. The unity of purpose, the consistency of design, the significance of a pattern— these are seen in the whole body of the sacred scriptures.

The cross was not a mere after-thought. It was not an expedient devised at the last minute. It did not result as a mere answer to human conspiracy. Instead it was the culmination of a plan of the ages, the capsheaf upon an eternal program of salvation. It was the one sacrifice to which all other sacrifices pointed, the altar of all altars. This fact alone brings assurance and inspires confidence as nothing else can do.

We exist in a modern Jericho, filled with pagan ideas and idolatrous worship. The ancient gods were things made with men's hands; the modern things become gods in men's minds. Still today, as then. a place of safety is provided. Then it was a scarlet line which provided a way of escape for men of God and became a symbol of protection for all who came in and remained behind it. Now it is a scarlet line of blood offering remission to those who trust in Jesus and heed his call to come in from the streets of sin. The house of God is plainly identified. It is the place where the scarlet line is displayed as the hope of salvation. We urge all who have not entered that house to do so at once. Salvation is inside, death is outside! Each of us is confronted with the choice between life and death. Let us not forget the word of him who spoke to the captives of Egypt. "When I see the blood. I will pass over you!"

Power In the Blood

How much attention do you pay to the sentiment expressed in the songs we sing? Do you concentrate upon the words and seek to understand the message they contain? I fear that all too often we are motivated primarily by catchy words and lilting melodies, and our singing becomes more sensual than spiritual. Under such circumstances we do not so much worship the Father as we entertain ourselves. I want to talk with you about the significance of an old familiar hymn and kindle an appreciation for it in our hearts. I refer to the song entitled "There's power in the blood!" Just what power is to be found in the blood of Jesus?

1. CLEANSING POWER

The blood of Christ is the only solvent in the universe which can remove both sin and its stain. In the days when Jesus was upon earth, men did not possess the bleaches which they can now purchase commercially. Cloth was bleached by men who were called "fullers." So important was this craft that in the excavated city of Pompeii the building which was the headquarters of the fullers' guild or union ranked second only to the basilica. In the prophecy of Malachi which predicts the coming of John the Baptist and Jesus, our Lord was declared to be "like fullers' soap" (3:2). This is significant because of the statement about the garments of Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration. "His garments became glistening, intensely white, as no fuller on earth could bleach them" (Mark 9:3). Of the redeemed in the heavenly vision, it was affirmed, "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb" (Revelation 7:14). The blood of Jesus accomplished what no earthly power could do.

In our modern day and with our automatic washers we do not use soap. Detergents have been developed to take its place. We may fall into the mistaken notion that the Bible is old-fashioned because it refers to "soap" but that is not so at all. The word "detergent" is a combined form of de, which means "off or away," and tergere, which means "to wipe." A detergent is that which wipes away soil and stain. Jesus is described as the one "that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood" (Rev. 1:5).

When we talk of sins that are grievous we refer to them as "black" but the Bible calls such aggravated transgressions "red." "Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they are red like crimson, they shall become like wool" (Isaiah 1:18). This is due to the fact that the crimson dye which was extracted from the shell of a little mollusk called the murex was impervious to sun or water. It was non-fading and tub-fast as our advertisements say. Scarlet stain could only be removed by the crimson flood that flowed from our Lord in his death. There is no sin more powerful than the blood of God's Son. It is an insult to refuse to come to him because you think you are too great a sinner. You cannot be a greater sinner than he is a Savior.

Perhaps you enlisted in the Christian life and the going became too rough and you gave up. You may feel that there is no hope for you now, that all is lost and that you are helpless, hapless and hopeless. I come with a word of cheer for you. Not only does the blood of Jesus cleanse us from our past sins but it continues to cleanse us from contaminating influences. In 1 John

1:7 the record says, "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin." The word here used for "cleansing" signifies a continuing action. It does not refer to an act which is performed once for all and is never repeated. It literally means that the blood of Jesus keeps on cleansing from all sin. There is power in the blood to take away your sense of guilt, to purge and purify your heart, and to give you a "clean slate."

2. LIFE-GIVING POWER

The Bible implies that man was a vegetarian until after the flood. When God created man, he said, "Behold, I have given you every plant yielding seed which is upon the earth, and every tree with seed in its fruit; you shall have them for food." But after the deluge, when God blessed Noah and his sons, he said, "Every moving thing that lives shall be food for you, and as I gave you the green plants, I give you everything." In allowing this freedom to eat flesh, God placed one restriction upon it. "Only you shall not eat flesh with its life, that is, its blood."

This ban has never been lifted. It existed throughout the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations, and when a question arose in the early church as to what should be demanded of Gentiles, the apostles, elders and congregation at Jerusalem, in conjunction with the Holy Spirit, wrote unto them that they should abstain from blood (Acts 15:29). The reason for this divine regulation is revealed in Leviticus 17:10, 11. God declared that if an Israelite or foreigner who lived in the land was guilty of eating blood, he would set his face against that person and cut him off from among the people. He then declares, "For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement, by reason of the life."

Through the years some who profess to be scientific have sought to throw the Bible on the scrap heap of antiquity. They have implied that it was behind the times, suited only for an ignorant and superstitious people, and wholly unfitted to deal with the needs of a cultured civilization. It is interesting to note that, as greater scientific research has uncovered additional truths, the Bible has been vindicated and has been proven to be ahead of the times, rather than behind them. We are reminded of the story of the race between the hare and the tortoise. The hare started out briskly and when he got far enough ahead took time out for a nap. When he awakened he looked back down the trail but the tortoise was not yet in sight. He loped off casually toward the goal only to find the tortoise there awaiting his arrival.

The subject we are now dealing with is a good illustration of what we mean. For generations medical science in its most advanced state regarded every disease as an indication that the blood was unduly affected and should be drained from the body. Actually, the barbers were the physicians, and the barber pole with its red and white alternating bands still stands as a visible symbol of the blood and the white bandages which were wrapped around the patient after the blood had been drawn from his veins.

It is altogether possible that the death of George Washington was hastened by his medical practitioners. When the famous general became ill at night after exposure to rain and snow the day before, a Mr. Rawlins came at daybreak and drew slightly less than a pint of blood from his veins. About nine o'clock in the morning Dr. Craik took more blood and did the same two hours later. When the specialist, Dr. Dick, arrived at about three o'clock in the afternoon, he consulted with the other physicians and they decided to take more blood. The patient died that night shortly after ten o'clock.

Medical science has at last come to realize the need of blood transfusion, and in cases where the patient shows signs of alarming weakness, instead of taking blood from the veins it is injected into them. The Bible revealed the fact that blood was the life of the flesh in the days of Noah. Modern science has caught up with the revelation of God in this respect.

Just as physical life is sustained by blood so our spiritual life is maintained by the blood of Jesus. We are members of his body and he has given us a memorial service in which every member partakes of the cup which he declares to be the new covenant in his blood (1 Cor. 11:25). This circulates to each member and maintains a sense of constant relationship with the body. It is the unity with Christ Jesus which makes spiritual life possible.

3. PEACE-PRODUCING POWER

When Our Lord came into the world, mankind was divided into Jew and Greek. A state of animosity existed between these two great segments of the human family. The Jews regarded the Gentiles as unclean and a great gulf existed between the two peoples. Each morning the devout Jew offered a prayer to God in which he thanked the heavenly Father that he had not been made a Gentile, a slave, or a woman. The apostle Paul describes the Gentiles thus, "Remember that you were at that time separated from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world." He urges the saints to "no longer live as the Gentiles do, in the hostility of their minds." He declares that the Gentiles "are darkened in their understanding and alienated from the life of God because of the darkness that is in them."

In spite of the great divergences between the two peoples it was the design of heaven to make the Gentiles "fellow heirs, members of the same body, and partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus through the gospel" (Eph. 3:6). The Mystery of the ages was how this could be accomplished. In its outworking the plan did not contemplate making Jews of the Gentiles, nor Gentiles of the Jews. "Was anyone at the time of his call already circumcised? Let him not seek to remove the marks of circumcision. Was anyone at the time of his call uncircumcised? Let him not seek circumcision. For neither circumcision counts for anything nor uncircumcision, but keeping the commandments of God" (1 Cor. 7:18, 19).

Jesus did not effect unity by moving the people but by removing the wall between them. The oneness was achieved by breaking down the barrier which separated them. He simply spanned the gulf between them. The Latin word for priest is pontifex. This means "bridge builder." Jesus is our great high priest and as such he has built a bridge across the chasm between God and man, and between man and man. The magnetic force which draws us closer to God and to each other is his blood. "But now in Christ Jesus you who once were far off have been brought near in the blood of Christ" (Eph. 2:13). The apostle goes on to declare, "For he is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility, by abolishing in his flesh the law of commandments and ordinances, that he might create in himself one new man in place of the two, so making peace."

The little word "so" is the one that should be emphasized in this passage as it ought to be in many other passages. It relates to method, means or agency. It shows how a thing was accomplished. "So making peace." Notice how it was done. Our peace is personal. It is not achieved by a plan, program or proposition. "He is our peace." In the last analysis all peace must be personal because it is a relation between persons. Our peace is a divine product. He "made us both one." We did not come together but we came to Him and this brought us together. Our peace is practical. "He broke down the dividing wall of hostility." The spite fence has been abrogated. When you wall others out you wall yourself in. The higher you build the wall of hate the less sunshine you can enjoy. Our peace is purposeful. It was to "reconcile us both to God in one body through the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end" (Eph. 2:16).

It would seem that if we are to pattern after our Lord we need to build bridges rather than walls between brethren. To the extent that we create areas of hostility we undo His glorious work. We can make the power of His blood effective by striving for reconciliation with God and with each other. Do we not miss the whole purpose of the Christian life when we allow ourselves to be estranged from our brethren and permit hatred and envy to destroy the work for which Christ died?

4. CEMENTING POWER

Not long ago I learned a good lesson. I was attempting to repair a chair and I applied glue to the broken part. Then I put wood clamps on to hold the pieces together. I drew them up perfectly and it appeared that I would have an excellent job. I did have so long as I left the clamps in place, but when I removed them and tested the strength of the place that I had repaired it pulled apart again. The glue did not create a strong enough bond to withstand the pressure. I found out that it is one thing to bring two elements together but a wholly different thing to keep them so under stress and strain.

God knew this, of course, and he provided not only the power to draw us together in Christ but the power to keep us together. There is a slang expression extant in our day to describe one who loses control of himself under tension and pressure. Such a person is said to "come unglued." God does not want the body of Christ to suffer such a predicament, nor to be like the doll which the little girl dropped on the concrete porch, only to run screaming to her mother, "Mama, please help me, my baby has exploded!"

There is power in the blood of God's dear Son to keep us one in Him. It has been said that human blood is the most powerful cohesive force in the world. Robert Ripley, in "Believe It or Not" tells the story of a bridge built across the Tillis River in the Caucasian Mountains. This stone bridge has withstood the raging spring torrents for centuries while every other has been washed away many times. Ripley declares that the secret lies in the fact that centuries ago, when slaves were so cheap in the area as to be considered worthless, their blood was used to mix the mortar to lay the bridge. The helpless victims of an inhuman master were slaughtered on the spot and their blood drained into the mortar. You may, as Mr. Ripley suggests, believe this or not, but I trust that you will believe in the adhesive power of the blood of Christ.

In Colossians 1:19, 20 it is said of Christ, "For in him all the fulness of God was pleased to dwell, and through him to reconcile to himself all things whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross." It was not enough that he should make peace by a process of reconciliation, so verse 17 declares, "He is before all things, and in him all things hold together." The strength of Jesus is not abated by the passing of the centuries. The tie that binds does not grow weaker under the relentless attack of time. If it be true that "in him all things hold together," we should be ashamed of our strife and division which holds us apart. There is power in the blood!

5. RANSOMING POWER

Abraham Lincoln has been called "The Great Emancipator" because it was through his influence that "The Emancipation Proclamation" was drawn up and signed. This document which was issued on New Year's Day in 1863, conferred liberty on more than three million slaves, who were declared to be "then, thenceforward, and forever free." In spite of its far-reaching effect upon the Civil War, this step was as nothing compared to the act of our "Great Emancipator" who died on the cross to ransom the slaves of sin.

The apostle Peter said, "You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish and without spot." It is possible that the minds of those so addressed would revert at once to the passover lamb and the circumstances connected with the feast which was inaugurated therewith. The children of Israel had left a significant symbol to the Israel of God in the Christian dispensation.

In Egypt the children of Israel were in bondage and in dire straits. They were hopeless to rescue themselves when God intervened. On the night of their deliverance the death angel was sent over the land to strike the firstborn of every home not protected by the blood of a lamb which was without spot or blemish. The story of this great event was rehearsed annually in every Jewish home. All were familiar with the means by which salvation had been obtained for their fathers. They knew the words quoted by Isaiah, "For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Savior. For I gave Egypt for thy ransom."

But the passover lamb was but a type of our Lord, of whom it was said, "For even Christ our passover is sacrificed for us" (1 Cor. 5:7). It was his precious blood which ransomed the slaves cringing under the lash of Satan. He gave deliverance to those who were bound and set the captives free. During his earthly sojourn he said, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28). After he had returned to heaven the apostle Paul declared of him that he "gave his life a ransom for all, to be testified of in due time" (1 Tim. 2:6).

In recent years we have come to think of the word "ransom" in connection with crime and tragedy. A child is kidnapped and held for ransom. Frantic parents are notified of the amount demanded and seek to meet the requirements in order to have their loved one safely back again. This is not exactly the meaning of the word in the sacred scriptures, but even here there are some likenesses. Certainly when we were captured by sin God loved us and wanted us to be at home with him. However, this love was not manifested when we were his beloved children but when we were enemies. Paul says, "But God showed his love for us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8). In the very same context he declares, "For if while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life."

Ransom, reconciliation, and rejoicing— what tremendous words these are. How they speak of grace and mercy, of love so full and free. No wonder the record says, "We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received our reconciliation." We must not think of the sacrifice on our behalf as being accidental. Men did not so much take the life of Jesus as he gave it. He was not stricken down in life but he laid down his life. This indicates deliberation and purpose. In the beautiful parable of the shepherd and the sheep, Jesus makes a simple statement which is pregnant with meaning, "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd lays down his life for the sheep." He concludes by saying, "The Father loves me because I lay down my life, to receive it back again. No one has robbed me of it; I am laying it down of my own free will. I have the right to lay it down, and I have the right to receive it back again; this charge I have received from my Father" (John 9:18).

A proper understanding of this should enable some of us to correct our speech. Occasionally someone speaks of Jesus as having spilled his blood. The scriptures nowhere sanction such an expression. Instead, the term "shed" is used. Thus, our Lord in ordaining the memorial feast said of the cup, "Drink from it, all of you. For this is my blood, the blood of the covenant, shed for many for the forgiveness of sins." Again it is affirmed that under the old covenant "without the shedding of blood there was no remission" (Heb. 9:22). The word "spill" in our modern day generally connotes the result of an accident, but the blood of Jesus was shed on purpose and for a purpose.

What value can be placed upon blood as a redemptive agent? I know a college student who has paid a part of his expenses by periodically selling his blood to be used for transfusing patients who are critically ill. He has never seen the patients and does not know if his blood has saved them or not. With him it is a simple commercial transaction. How different it is with the patients for whom it is a matter of life and death. But no money on earth could purchase our lease upon spiritual life. "Not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." The word "precious" is the translation of an original term which meant "Of superlative value, of great price." This was heaven's investment in each one of us.

6. SANCTIFYING POWER

The word "blood" occurs more frequently in the letter to the Hebrews than in any of the other new covenant epistles. The reason for this will become obvious to the student who remembers that Hebrews is a treatise on priesthood. The design of the writer is to show the superiority of the priesthood of Jesus over that of Levi, and priesthood is directly concerned with sacrifices and offerings. The relation of blood to priestly service is best understood by a study of chapter nine where the theme is discussed at length and the contrast clearly shown. In this one chapter the word "blood" occurs twelve times.

The chapter begins with a description of the tabernacle and the furniture found in both the holy place and the most holy place. The author closes his brief descriptive paragraph with the statement that it is not his intention to deal specifically with each item of furniture. The implication is that there is a typical significance attached to the various items but his present procedure will not permit him to indulge the time required to portray this in detail. He plunges immediately into the theme at hand which concerns the service of the priests.

Whereas the priests daily officiated in the holy place before the veil, it was not so with the holy of holies. Into the awesome darkness of this cubicle behind the veil, only the high priest was allowed to go and he was restricted to one visit per year, on the great day of atonement. On this occasion he took blood with him which he offered for his own sins and for those of the people. The writer points out that as long as this practice was in vogue it was apparent that "the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest." The people could not go behind the veil and thus could not approach the mercy seat where God abode between the cherubim. That this was to be a temporary arrangement, however, is proven by the statement that the regulations and carnal ordinances imposed were to be effective "until the time of reformation."

In the very next phrase we learn what is meant by the reformation. The record says, "But Christ being come." The advent of Christ into the world wrought a greater change than most of us realize. Even the very method of counting time was altered. A new calendar was inaugurated. It was as if the world paused and time stood still— and life began anew. His coming not only brought new light for the future but cast new light upon the things of the past. Those things which had seemed to be realities were shown to be but shadows. The values attached to them for themselves were proven to be worthless and their only value lay in their relationship unto Him.

The tabernacle made with hands derived its chief importance, not from the fact that it provided a way of worship before Christ came, but because it was the undeveloped negative of the "greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands." The high priest was significant, not because of what he accomplished by his annual pilgrimage with blood into the holy place, but because he was really pre-figuring the piercing of the flesh curtain by Jesus and his return into heaven itself "bearing his own blood." For the first time in the history of sacrificial offerings the reason behind the requirement of the blood of bulls and goats could be understood. It was not that such blood could take away sin. It was not that God desired sacrifices and burnt offerings for his own pleasure. Instead, the blood flowing from the slit jugular veins of lower animals constituted an ever-lengthening red finger pointing with increasing hope toward the unknown future and culminating at the cross.

There is a tremendous contrast expressed in verses twelve and thirteen. The blood of bulls and goats and the ashes of an heifer sprinkled upon one who was ceremonially unclean and thus deprived of social privileges could sanctify only by purging or purifying the flesh, the outward man. "How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?" The blood of Christ was not like the blood of animals. Their blood could be sprinkled only upon the flesh of man. Its application was external and could not affect eternal values. But the blood of Jesus reaches to the core of human problems by reaching to the heart of man. "Having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:22).

We are coming to realize more and more the effect of guilt-consciousness upon human personality. As a rational being man must possess the faculty of memory, but this faculty in a responsible being forces him to recall his evil as well as his good, and leaves him with the threat of punishment hanging over his head. Man cannot undo his deeds regardless of how remorseful they may leave him.

Under the previous economy the constant offering of sacrifices served only as a reminder of sin. When Christ came he offered himself once for all time. Those who trust in his blood recognize its efficacy. They need retain no further consciousness of forgiven sins. The record says, 'We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." This great truth lends importance to the declaration immediately following: "And every priest standeth daily ministering and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices which can never take away sins, but this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool. For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."

We should not be misled by the word "perfected." This does not mean that those who are sanctified have been brought to a state where they are impervious to temptation and are sinlessly perfect. The word means "complete" and the context is dealing with consciousness of sins committed in the past. The blood of Jesus is so potent that it not only removes the stain but also the shadow of guilt and leaves the sinner with a sense of inward cleansing and purity. The blood of Jesus purifies, reconciles and sanctifies us.

The next time you join in singing "There's Power in the Blood" you can do so with the full assurance that you are singing the truth.

The Greatest Counterfeiter

Contents

Not long ago I saw an interesting display of money. There was currency of almost every denomination, but it was worthless. The exhibit had been prepared by one of our government agencies for the purpose of informing the public to be on the alert against counterfeiters. Our legal tender is issued by proper authority and those who seek to duplicate it undermine that authority. In addition to making victims of their unsuspecting dupes they weaken the fiscal structure of our nation and if they were allowed to operate unchecked they would eventually destroy our financial integrity and create panic and chaos. It is a well known fact that when nations are at war they frequently attempt to flood the other country with counterfeit money and thus produce a state of disruption.

A counterfeiter is defined as "one who makes an imitation of something genuine with intent to deceive." It is not merely the making of an imitation but the motive for doing so that makes one a counterfeiter within the scope of the law. Please remember this fact as I talk with you about the greatest counterfeiter in the world. I am not the least hesitant in applying the term "greatest" to this personage because he is clever, persistent and diabolical. This last word is actually a transliteration of one of his Greek titles for I am speaking of the devil. Unquestionably, he has deceived more people in the world than anyone else.

You may be surprised that I speak of Satan as a person. It is no longer considered a special indication of intellectual brilliance to do so. Not long ago a prominent clergyman suggested that we should delete from the Bible every reference which seems to indicate that Satan is a personal being. He thought we should substitute some such expression as "evil force." This is a good sample of the kind of muddled thinking to which our modern age is subjected. In its final analysis, and traced back to its absolute source, all power and force is personal. One of the most effective bits of deception the devil has ever pulled is to convince men that he does not exist. He has perfected the art of camouflage until men think he is not there at the very time he is pursuing his work of deception.

The writers of the Bible had no doubt about the personality of the devil. Peter wrote, "Your adversary the devil prowls around like a roaring lion, seeking someone to devour" (1 Peter 5:8). Peter had encountered the devil because Jesus had told him that Satan desired to have him to sift him as wheat. He also knew what Satan could do to men and women when he filled their hearts to lie, as he did in the case of Ananias and Sapphira.

Paul knew the devil existed and wrote to "keep Satan from gaining advantage over us; for we are not ignorant of his designs" (2 Cor. 2:11). It is apparent that a great many today are ignorant of the devices and stratagems which Satan employs and he easily gains an advantage over them by his operations. It will help us to realize that one of his most effective methods has been that of counterfeiting. Whatever God has done, Satan has sought to create chaos and confusion by duplicating it without authority. Let us consider the areas in which he has offered substitutes.

1. GOD

The central fact of the old covenant is expressed in what has been called "the watchword of Israel." It declares that "The Lord our God is one God and beside him there is no other." The very foundation of that covenant is found in the first two commandments of the Decalogue. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," and "Thou shalt not make unto thyself a graven image." Satan infiltrated society with polytheism and men soon worshiped gods of three kinds— natural, artificial and imaginary. Even the covenant people were rebuked by Moses in the stirring words, "They stirred him to jealousy with strange gods; with abominable practices they provoked him to anger. They sacrificed to demons which were no gods, to gods they had never known, to new gods that had come in of late, whom your fathers had never dreaded. You were unmindful of the Rock that begot you, and you forgot the God who gave you birth" (Deut. 32:16-18).

Belief in the Bible leads one to accept as factual that God made man in his own image; whereas idolatry promotes the belief that man can make a god in his own image. The frightful consequences attendant upon "exchanging the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man or birds or animals or reptiles" can be read upon the pages of both the revelation of God and the history of the nations. In spite of the fact that Satan corrupted the power structure of the universe, the very existence of idols is a testimony to the one God. There can be no counterfeit which is not preceded by the genuine!

2. PROPHETS

God chose to make his will known in previous ages through prophets. "In many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets" (Heb. 1:1). "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:21). "From the day that your fathers came out of the land of Egypt unto this day, I have persistently sent all my servants the prophets to them, day after day" (Jer. 7:25).

Satan lost no time in creating false prophets to go forth and contradict the faithful. These appeared in innocent guise for purpose of deception. So Jesus warned, "Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing but inwardly are ravenous wolves" (Matt. 7:15). These men not only came while Jesus was on earth but in previous ages, for he says, "Woe to you when all men speak well of you, for so their fathers did to the false prophets" (Luke 6:26). They were also to come after Jesus, because he warns, "And many false prophets will arise and lead many astray. And because wickedness is multiplied most men's love will wax cold" (Matt. 24:11, 12).

That such prophets did come is evident from the statement of John many years later. "Beloved, do not believe every spirit, but test the spirits to see whether they are of God; for many false prophets have gone out into the world" (1 John 4:1).

3. CHRIST

When God sent his Son into the earth he announced that his name would be Jesus, which means Saviour. It was revealed that Jesus was the Messiah for whom the Jews had long been looking. Satan not only stirred up their hearts to deny him but further complicated the situation in their days of anxiety and expectancy by sending others who professed to be the Messiah and pretended to perform miracles. Jesus warned of such pseudo-Messiahs in two memorable passages in Matthew 24.

"Take heed that no one leads you astray. For many will come in my name, saying 'I am the Christ,' and they will lead many astray" (verse 5). "Then if anyone says to you, 'Lo, here is the Christ!' or 'There he is!' do not believe it. For false Christs and false prophets will arise and show great signs and wonders so as to lead astray, if possible, the very elect" (verses 23, 24). These passages inform us of the multiplicity of counterfeit Christs and of their widespread influence. They also tell us of the effectiveness of the methods they employed.

One needs only to read the works of Flavius Josephus who was born about the time that Saul of Tarsus was converted to realize how accurate was the prediction of Jesus. Lack of time will not permit us to detail the stories of the various false messiahs. We must content ourselves with a reference to Bar Cochba who led an insurrection just a century after the death of Jesus.

Most of us are quite familiar with the discovery of the Qumran community and the "Dead Sea Scrolls," the first of which came to light in March, 1947. Many of us may not know that, in the eagerness to investigate the area, other important finds have been made in the Judean wilderness. In 1952, about a dozen miles south of the site of Qumran, two letters written by the leader of the second Jewish revolt of A.D. 132-135 were located. These revealed that his real name was Simon ben Kosebah. In 1959 a bundle of papyri was discovered and upon being unwrapped was found to contain additional letters of Bar Cochba to two of his officers, Jehonathan and Masabala. This sparked a renewed study of the times and efforts of one who was widely hailed at first as "the Messiah."

From the times of Porcius Festus, the simmering hatred of the Jews in Palestine grew more intense, boiling up in the days of his successor to the procuratorship, Albinus, and boiling over in the days of the next official, Gessius Florus (A.D. 64-66). Florus tried to quell the revolt and the Roman legate in Syria sent his militia to aid. The Jews, fighting with almost insane fury, drove them back and occupied most of the garrisons constructed by Herod the Great. Nero sent his general, Vespasian, to direct the fight and by A.D. 68 he had subjugated almost all of Palestine except the area about Jerusalem. At this time Nero died and Vespasian returned to Rome to be declared emperor by the military forces. In A.D. 70 he sent his son, Titus, to complete the task, which he did by razing Jerusalem to the ground.

It was during these conflicts that the exclusive community of the sect of the Essenes, which had been established in the hills near the Dead Sea, was destroyed. The panic attending the approach of the Roman legions caused the faithful guardians of the community archives to conceal their documents in the caves of the vicinity, and here they were discovered by sheer accident in the spring of 1947.

Soon after the death of the last apostle of our Lord, a revival of hope began to be whispered among the Jews all over the world. Rabbis became infected with the belief that the Messiah was coming to recapture the holy land and restore Judaism as the principle of righteousness in the earth. Imbued by longing, and with hearts aflame, the Jews of the Dispersion arose against their overlords in A.D. 115 during the reign of Trajan. The revolt was quelled with inordinate cruelty and bloodshed. It burst into flame again in Palestine in A.D. 132.

The emperor Hadrian issued a decree forbidding the practice of circumcision and observation of the sabbath. A temple dedicated to Jupiter was erected on the site of the Temple in Jerusalem. In A.D. 132 Ben Kosebah, known as Bar Cochba, a name meaning "Son of the Star," proclaimed himself to be the Messiah and professed to have the power to work miracles. Even the famed Rabbi Akiba was deceived and acknowledged the impostor to be the Messiah of the prophets. Under his leadership the city of Jerusalem was recaptured and the Jews, under the mistaken idea that the reign of the Messiah was imminent, fought with blind passion for three long years. Finally, in A.D. 135 Bar Cochba was killed in the capture of his last stronghold at Bethar. Tens of thousands of Jews perished. Palestine was reduced to a desert waste. The city of Jerusalem was rebuilt as a pagan metropolis under the name Aelia Capitolina. Only Satan profited by the cruel counterfeit.

4. APOSTLES

Jesus chose certain men to be apostles or envoys to an alien world. These he qualified and commissioned and sent forth with the good news. They were designated as holy apostles (Eph. 3:5). Immediately the devil began his work of duplication of the method adopted by our Lord. He sought to overthrow the work of the apostles by denying the authority of one of them (Paul) and by creating false apostles to deny the truth. These men, operating under a disguise, claimed to work on the same basis as the real apostles.

Paul writes to them, "And what I do I will continue to do, in order to undermine the claim of those who would like to claim that in their boasted mission they work on the same terms as we do. For such men are false apostles, deceitful workmen, disguising themselves as apostles of Christ. And no wonder, for even Satan disguises himself as an angel of light. So it is not strange if his servants also disguise themselves as servants of righteousness. Their end will correspond to their deeds" (2 Cor. 11:12-15).

Even more revealing is the translation by J. B. Phillips. "They are counterfeits of the real thing, dishonest practitioners, 'God's messengers' only by their own appointment. Nor do their tactics surprise me when I consider how Satan himself masquerades as an angel of light." This will serve to explain the statement in the letter to Ephesus, "You cannot bear evil men but have tested those who call themselves apostles but are not, and found them to be false" (Rev. 2:2).

5. TEACHERS

The apostle declares that "God has appointed in the church first apostles, second prophets, third teachers," etc. Thus, in the congregation at Antioch "there were certain prophets and teachers" (Acts 13:1). Because of the activity of Satan in this particular field a warning was necessary. "But false prophets also arose among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you, who will secretly bring in destructive heresies, even denying the Master who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction" (2 Peter 2:1).

6. LETTERS

Because the apostles could not continue indefinitely on earth, the message which they transmitted orally was committed to writing in order to preserve it. Moreover, the congregations, required communications to correct disorders, instruct more fully, and encourage a more fervent spirit in the work of the Lord. Thus Paul writes, "So then, brethren, stand firm and hold to the traditions which you were taught by us, either by word of mouth or by letter" (2 Thess. 2:15).

This provided Satan an opportunity to create forged documents and circulate them as being genuine. In the same chapter from which we have just quoted, the apostle wrote to the brethren not to become "excited, either by spirit or by word, or by letter purporting to be from us" (verse 2). To give the saints a means of identifying the genuine letters, he concludes, "I, Paul, write this greeting with my own hand. This is the mark in every letter of mine; it is the way I write" (2 Thess. 3:17).

We do not have forged letters from the days of the apostles but there are epistles which date back to the early centuries and which were circulated as the writings of Paul. There is a fake epistle to the Corinthians, another to the Laodiceans, and six letters to Seneca. It is obvious that these are all forgeries and they demonstrate the length to which the great counterfeiter will go.

7. MIRACLES

The only authentic credentials for one who claims to be supernaturally sent is to demonstrate supernatural powers. In conformity to the laws of evidence and credibility, our Lord arranged for his ambassadors to confirm the truth of their declaration and to create faith in the testimony by miracles. Paul said, "My speech and my message were not in plausible words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and power" (1 Cor. 2:4). Of the salvation afforded by the gospel it is said, "It was declared at first by the Lord, and it was attested to us by those who heard him, while God also bore witness by signs and wonders and various miracles and by gifts of the Holy Spirit distributed according to his own will" (Heb. 2:3, 4).

Again we read in John 20:30, 31, "Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name." To defeat the purpose of God, Satan also engaged in the performance of fake miracles. "The coming of the lawless one by the activity of Satan will be with all power and with pretended signs and wonders, and with all wicked deception for those who are to perish, because they refused to love the truth and to be saved" (2 Thess. 2:9, 10). "Then I saw another beast . . . it works great signs, even making fire come down from heaven in the sight of men; and by the signs which it is allowed to work in the presence of the beast, it deceives those who dwell on the earth, bidding them make an image for the beast which was wounded by the sword and yet lived" (Rev. 13:13, 14).

8. CHURCH

The word "church" was selected by the translators of the King James Version to represent the Greek ekklesia, which literally means "called out." The church is a divine creation and a living organism. It is composed of every person on earth who has been "called out of darkness into his marvelous light." Every saved person in the world is in the church. The Bible teaches that there is one church, the body of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not composed of denominations or of congregations, but of individuals. "Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it" (1 Cor. 12:27).

Nothing has created more confusion than the idea that there are many "churches" and that "one church is as good as another." In the first place, what are generally called "churches" are simply parties. These have grown up around crystallized opinions, interpretations and religious philosophies of men. They have served to divide God's children into rival, and often warring tribes and camps. Families have been split and riven asunder. Communities have been torn and rent by those who profess to follow the Prince of Peace. The resultant strife has discouraged many and disgusted others.

Division among the believers has been one of the most potent weapons in the arsenal of Satan. It is like poison in the blood stream of the spiritual body, paralyzing and deadly in its effect. The great "accuser of the brethren" realizes that if the people of God ever unite so they can bring the full strength of a unified front to bear upon his hosts that they must retire in abject defeat. "God is not the author of confusion but of peace" (1 Cor. 14:33).

SIN OF SUBSTITUTION

The great counterfeiter is a master of the art of substitution and transplantation. He realizes full well what consternation and confusion results when men get their values mixed. It is somewhat like keeping the coffee in the sugar container, the sugar in the salt container, the salt in the flour container and the flour in the coffee can. Under such circumstances one never knows if he will have salt in his coffee or sugar in his flour.

God does not want his people to be in a messed-up mix or a mixed-up mess. The prophet says, "Woe to them who call evil good and good evil, who put darkness for light and light for darkness, who put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter" (Isaiah 5:20). Observe that two things are condemned. One is calling something that which it is not, the other is putting something in place of another thing and palming it off as that thing. The Pure Food Administration is interested in the labels attached to products. A constant survey is made with a view to provide for honest packaging. You can be sure that Satan will not abide by God's spiritual "food and drug act." He will deceive when possible.

Our enemy is constantly at work seeking to improve upon his "engraving process" so the spurious will look more like the real and thus deceive the greater number. It is a matter of constant education by our federal officers that the best way to avoid being duped by counterfeiters is to be thoroughly familiar with the marks of the genuine currency. They urge all of us to know what real money actually looks like. In the realm of the spirit the same thing is true. It is because of the ignorance and indifference of the masses that Satan has a "field day" in his deceptive work.

The prophet Hosea, surveying the ruin of God's people in his day, wrote thus, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge" (4:6). The wisest monarch who ever sat upon an earthly throne said, "By knowledge the righteous are delivered" (Prov. 11:9). He also declared, "Knowledge is easy for a man of understanding" (Prov. 14:6). I think the reason for this is that one who has understanding will seek to know. He will apply himself and diligently attempt to improve his state. When everyone is thoroughly aware of the will and revelation of God, Satan will have a difficult time palming off his delusions.

It is not necessary to know all of the errors of our present age. One could not live long enough to read all the books of false philosophy and mark the errors they contain. Our hope of heaven is not contingent upon our knowledge of all the mistaken ideas extant but upon our knowledge of the truth and our willingness to walk in the way. In the days of the Mississippi steamboats a nervous woman passenger approached the captain in the pilot house and asked, "Do you know where all the sandbars, snags, shoals and rocks are located?" The pilot answered her in the negative and informed her that no one knew where they all were. The woman said, "Then we have no hope of reaching our destination and avoiding a wreck." "Not at all," the captain replied, "You see, I do know where the channel is."

I suspect that all of us have read the book by Daniel Defoe in which he describes the experience of Robinson Crusoe. Few who have read it know the real purpose of the author in writing it. Deeply opposed to clericalism and the established church, he wrote to prove that our relationship to God was upon an individual basis and even a person on a desert isle could be faithful to God. The humble savage, Friday, rescued from cannibals, was introduced to show that the gospel was for all. The book strikes a blow against racial prejudice. Go back and read it again and mark those passages in which Robinson Crusoe expresses faith in God, and it will be an interesting piece of research for you.

Defoe also wrote another book entitled "The History of the Devil." In it he disagrees with some of the conclusions of the great Puritan poet, John Milton, as given in "Paradise Lost," but this is not the real purpose of the personal "history." He designed to outline the means by which Satan had pursued his course through the centuries. One of the effective methods was the "sowing of discord among brethren." This, you will recall, is labeled as an abomination unto God.

Speaking of the rise of the papal system and the ordaining of Boniface as the first pope, Defoe says, "Since the conquest over Eve in Paradise, by which death and the Devil, hand in hand, established their first empire upon earth, the Devil never gained a more important point than he gained at this time." He continues, "He had indeed prospered in his affairs tolerably well for some time before this, and his interest among the clergy had got ground for some ages; but that was indeed a secret management, was carried on privately, and with difficulty; as in sowing discord and faction among the people, perplexing the council of their princes, and secretly wheedling in with their dignified clergy. Also he raised abundance of little church rebellions, by setting up heretics of various kinds."

The gist of the whole thing is that Satan so confused the state of religion that the world was in a turmoil. Under these circumstances he convinced men that the only hope of the survival of truth was to elevate a man to a place of undisputed authority, grant him infallibility, and thus assure that any errors which he labeled truth would be perpetuated through the ages. Those who opposed such errors would then be regarded as fighting against God. Thus provision was made for the destruction of all who contended for righteousness.

Let no one doubt that we are pitted against a cunning foe. When Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, Satan moved the murderous heart of Herod in an attempt to kill the helpless babe. When Jesus was immersed in the Jordan, Satan lost no time in meeting him in the wilderness. Here he used the most glittering enticement to seduce the Son of God to forsake his mission. Failing in every attempt, he sought to counterfeit the crucifixion by putting two other crosses on Golgotha at the same time Jesus died, thus making it appear that he was merely one of several criminals who died upon that occasion.

When Jesus was placed in the tomb all was in readiness for the final great test. If death proved to be too powerful and could not be forced to release him all was lost. If the jaws which swallowed his body could not be pried apart the hopes of the world would turn to ashes. It was for this very occasion that Jesus had become clothed in human flesh. This was the inevitable moment toward which his whole earthly career and the purpose eternal had relentlessly driven him. "Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise took part of the same nature, that through death he might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong bondage" (Heb. 2:14, 15).

It is because of the glorious triumph of the resurrection over the "prince of the power of the air" that this became the theme of the early saints. The great counterfeiter was met upon his chosen field of battle which he had prepared through the generations. He was handed his favorite weapon— death. But that very weapon was turned against him and his stranglehold upon humanity was broken forever. "That through death he might destroy him who has the power of death."

Today we know that we face an inveterate, but not an invincible enemy, a foe who can fight but cannot frighten those who trust in the Lord Jesus. The keys of death and hell were wrested from the grasp of their proud owner. They are now in possession of the risen Saviour. "Fear not, I am the first and the last, and the living one; I died, and behold I am alive forevermore, and I have the keys of Death and Hades" (Rev. 1:17, 18). We have not yet gained the final victory but Jesus has. Victory in Jesus! He is the person and the place of our victory!

"I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me: Write, blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." You cannot die in the Lord unless you live in the Lord and you cannot live in the Lord unless you get into the Lord. The most important thing in the world is where you are. If you are not in Christ you are in danger! You will have to choose whether you will be safe or sorry. Do not be gullible. Do not be taken in by the greatest counterfeiter in the world!

A flood of books dealing with the Holy Spirit has been pouring from the presses. The emptiness of modern man, coupled with a sense of the futility of earthly existence in a nuclear age, has combined to promote a genuine interest in a Power that can transform life and provide hope of human relationship with the ultimate and infinite. As is true in every age of crisis, much of the appeal to the sensational and emotional is provided purely for the enrichment of the authors.

But many good things of lasting value are being said and written. Further, it is time for men to seek a greater understanding of the will of God and to come to a closer walk with Him through the Spirit. In many respects this volume is different from other such books on this theme now on the market. It is not intended to encourage men to think of the Spirit as a gimmick or fad. It is not the result of a current wave of interest, but it was planned many years ago.

The purpose of the book is to stimulate thought and promote a deeper study of the revealed will of God. I believe that God has spoken, and the revelation of what He has said is contained in the Bible. It is not my intention to be judgmental about the personal experiences to which men and women testify, but I hold that experiences must be judged in the light of the Scriptures, and not the reverse.

The Holy Spirit is not the Word of God; He is the divine agent through whom that Word was conveyed to human agents. The Spirit did not simply deliver the Word and then retire from the scene, however. He took up His abode in the hearts of men to strengthen, aid, and comfort them, in the fulfillment of the divine purpose for their lives. Because of this, this book first identifies the Spirit and then details in practical fashion how He helps us harmonize our lives with the divine will.

The final chapter makes use of material originally written for a journal. It appears in this volume to give it wider circulation and to induce a greater impact upon the lives of those who read it. But simply reading about the Spirit will not enable one to achieve the joy that should be the lot of the redeemed. One can starve to death while studying a cookbook. The Spirit must be allowed to motivate, quicken, and stimulate.

If this little volume leads you into a life of sharing with the Father and all the other members of His family— our brothers and sisters; if it brings freedom from fear of the present; and if it strengthens your faith, it will have achieved its goal and God will be praised.

The Holy Spirit— Who or What?

Contents

Many years ago I attended a Bible-school class in a village church in the heart of the Missouri Ozarks. I was in the region on a bass fishing expedition, and, as my custom was, I attended the services on Sunday morning. I sat in the adult class taught by a local farmer who seemed to be quite knowledgeable about the Bible. His occasional quaint comments made the lesson especially interesting for me.

I surmised, from the discussion by members of the class, that the little town was in a dither because of claims being made by a "faith healer" who was holding forth nightly in the rather decrepit tent. Finally, one man asked, "Well, just what is the Holy Spirit, anyhow? I've heard about it all my life and no one has ever rightly told me what it is." The teacher waited, with a slight smile on his face, until the questioner had finished. Then, holding his well-worn Bible slightly aloft, and waving it for emphasis, he replied, "This Book is the Holy Spirit, and all the Holy Spirit there is. When I have it in my overcoat pocket, the Holy Spirit is in my pocket. The Holy Spirit is the Word of God, and that's what this Book is, the Word of God, and the Holy Spirit."

He looked around the class to see if there were any challengers, but found none. Apparently they had too many burdens to bear in farming their rocky land, in trying to wrest a living from their thin soil, to give much attention to the identity of the Spirit. They were content to leave such questions to the teacher whose respect for the Book caused him to read its pages each night in the soft glow cast by his Aladdin lamp. And since no further questions were forthcoming, the teacher sought to clinch his argument by saying, "Jesus himself said, 'It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life' (John 6:63; KJV). There it is, as plain as the nose on your face."

I could not be satisfied with the quick response to the tremendous question, "What is the Holy Spirit, anyhow?" Somehow, I was convinced that the quotation drawn from the words of Jesus did not furnish an adequate answer. Although I knew little about the Spirit of God, I had a vague uneasiness at the thought that He could be captured, caught up, and confined to pages bound in black leather, stamped in gold, and crammed into an overcoat pocket. After I retired to my tent, I lay awake pondering a question for which my meager knowledge had no solution. Before I dozed off I made a pledge to learn all I could about the functions assigned to the Spirit. Through the years I have learned much, not the least of which is that almost from the time Jesus promised that the Spirit would come, much confusion has existed about His nature and identity.

I recall talking far into the night with a professor of philosophy in a state university. He had been reared by parents devoted to the Word of God, but during his academic career his own faith had been eroded. This left deep furrows in his intellectual life where the rich topsoil of belief had been washed away by the constant rain of skepticism. He flattered himself that he still maintained faith, but as we conversed it became apparent that his faith was in his own righteousness and in "the wisdom of this passing age" upon which he relied.

"What do you think about the Holy Spirit?" I asked. He looked at me for a minute before he replied. "I believe in a holy spirit, I suppose," he said, "but I do not believe in anything called the Holy Spirit." He gave a lengthy dissertation in scholastic jargon. The gist was that men assign different values to the word "holy," meaning only what each man makes it mean.

He finally explained he thought that the Holy Spirit was merely one's own spirit, his inner self, committed to unselfish sharing with others. It was self, devoted to relieving conditions that affected the social structure for evil, consecrated to working with and through nature for the betterment of all. Pinned down, he confessed that he was a humanist, and the expression "Holy Spirit" was merely a catchword, a handle with which to turn off religious discussion. The Holy Spirit no longer had any real relevance for him.

Then there was the wealthy manufacturer who invited me to his palatial home to talk about his idea of God and the created universe. In his voluminous library we sat down to canvass the thinking of each other. He proved to be a mystic and a student of esoteric religions. His idea of the Holy Spirit was that of a nebulous, pervasive influence, which invaded all religion and led men to a higher degree of achievement through art forms and literary productions. He regarded the Bible as inspired, but only as he thought the works of Rembrandt, Titian, or Shakespeare were inspired. The Holy Spirit was the rarefied atmosphere breathed by the gifted, the composite influence derived from heredity, training, and fellowship with others. He thought the tendency was ever upward and onward. He fully expected that this certain but subtle influence would so affect the world that someday men would become more god-like, and sorrow and suffering would be conquered and pass away. The world would be saved by its art and literature.

My affluent friend regaled me with various quotations from eminent philosophers, but the widely divergent views caused me to explore my favorite field, history, to see if the same kind of confusion existed in earlier times among those who professed to be believers in Christ. I was not too greatly surprised to find that such was the case. I should like to share with you a few highlights of this research.

If you are inclined to think that the contemporary problems of the Christian world are multitudinous, you need only to read the account of conditions in the first four centuries to realize that by comparison we are in relatively calm waters. That "the Way" has survived at all is a testimony to God's providential care and concern. Whereas many of our debates are about peripheral matters, those of which we speak struck at the very nature of the Godhead. The real questions were related to the identity of Jesus, but these resolved into disputes about the Holy Spirit as well. Here are some of the reasons for controversies that divided and fragmented the primitive believers:

First, the gospel was taken to the Jews, and the original community of saints was composed of Jews and proselytes. To many Jews it appeared, and still does, that disciples of Jesus were affirming the existence of three deities, and since they measured all teaching by the revelation of God in the Torah and Hafterah, the Law and the Prophets, they had to rationalize the subordination of the Son and the Holy Spirit.

The problem was intensified with the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., and the consequent scattering of the Jewish community of believers. Gradually the members who were dispersed drifted into a denial of the divinity of Jesus. They regarded only the Gospel according to Matthew as valid and they considered Paul an apostate. Since they proscribed all of his epistles, they could not use them as source materials with reference to the Spirit. Eventually they came to regard Jesus as a creation of God and the Spirit as a creation of Jesus. The Spirit thus became a son of Jesus as Jesus was a son of God which is the equivalent of saying that the Spirit was God's grandson.

Second, the term for spirit originally meant "breath" or "wind." This is true in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and even in Anglo-Saxon. In Hebrew the original is ruach, in Greek pneuma, in Latin spiritus, and in English, ghost. In every instance the original means "blow" or "breath." For this reason, many believers in the early centuries of the faith came to think of the Spirit as merely an impersonal force, with no more consciousness than the wind or breath. Certain expressions in the divine revelation seemed to lend force to their deduction. John records an incident after the resurrection when Jesus suddenly stood among the disciples and invoked peace upon them. "And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and said to them, 'Receive the Holy Spirit'" (John 20:22; RSV). The conclusion was that the Spirit was merely the breath of God.

When the apostles were present on the Day of Pentecost, awaiting the overwhelming of the Spirit as promised, "suddenly a sound came from heaven like the rush of a mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting" (Acts 2:2). No wind filled the house. The sound was like the noise of a gale, and since "they were all filled with the Holy Spirit," it was an easy matter to think of wind and Spirit as interchangeable.

The early disciples, however, like many of the cultists in our own day, overlooked certain facts about language. They were trapped into trying to fit every use of the word for Spirit into their own little traditional cubicles. Language is like the persons who employ it for communication. It is not static. It is constantly growing and changing. It tends always to expand and become broader in scope. One can no more force acquired usage into primitive root meanings than he can, in his maturity, force his body into the trousers he wore to kindergarten.

Thus the versatile Greeks extended the word pneuma beyond its basic meaning of a movement of air, or the breath of the nostrils, to the vital principle by which the body is animated. From that they went on, through a logical sequence, to the rational spirit, the power by which a human being thinks, feels, wills, and decides. Eventually, the spirit in man came to be recognized as that part of man which is rational, giving him the power to perceive and grasp divine things, so that the Spirit of God can exert an influence upon him.

At this point I suggest that the serious student can avail himself of what is commonly referred to in our day as Thayer's *Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament. The foregoing definition was adapted from it. Actually, this helpful volume was not produced by Joseph Thayer, but by C. L. Willibald Grimm, an Austrian who expanded and improved upon a work by C. G. Wilke. Thayer translated it into English and made some revision. This is mentioned because Dr. Grimm, in his *Prospectus, announced that one of his purposes was "to exhibit the historical growth of a word's significance and accordingly in selecting vouchers for New Testament usage to show at what time and in what class of writers a given word became current."[1]

My goal is not to produce a volume for advanced scholars. It is to share insights with those who love the Lord and the written Word, whose opportunity for research is limited both by lack of time and the need for making a living. I have written this because of the imposition of certain cultists who disturb the minds of the unlearned by insisting that, since the root meaning of "spirit" is wind or breath, when a man ceases to breathe the spirit ceases to exist. This conclusion I deem to be neither Scriptural nor sensible.

Again, I am indebted to the lexicographer mentioned above for pointing out Martin Luther's statement that the pneuma is "the highest and noblest part of man, which qualifies him to lay hold of the incomprehensible, invisible, eternal things; in short, it is the house where Faith and God's Word are at home."[2]

A third and fruitful source of conflict and confusion about the Spirit has been the rise of cult leaders who projected false opinions, causing millions to be misled and to follow in their wake. Some of these were sincere but self-deceived, while others were simply deceivers motivated by their own ambition. It was not always easy to distinguish the class in which each one belonged, but the damage done by the schismatic teaching was generally the same.

It is axiomatic that like causes produce like results. This is as true in the religious realm as in any other. In times of ferment and social upheaval, when "the hearts of men fail them for fear," an element of mysticism takes over, and out of this is spawned a kind of fanaticism, which grasps at strange and bizarre doctrines for a ray of hope. An outstanding example of this occurred about the middle of the second century, perhaps in the decade following A.D. 160. In Phrygia, the worship of the goddess Cybele was predominant. This female deity was regarded as the earth-mother and the source of all life. Her priests, called Corybantes, led in the worship, which was frenzied and orgiastic, generally conducted in sylvan glades or in the depths of dark forests.

One of these priests, Montanus, became a convert to Christianity. He sought to inject into Christianity the same excitability and emotional excess that had accompanied his pagan ministrations. He imagined and announced that he was the Paraclete, the "other Comforter" whom Jesus had promised to send to earth upon His return to glory. Montanus was subject to raptures during which, according to his testimony, the divine took over in his life, and used his tongue to utter enigmatic and mystic expressions, which were interpreted as messages of Heaven to the saints.

Montanus declared that the return of Christ was imminent and would occur during the lifetime of those present. His coming would usher in a thousand years' reign, a millennium in which the Lord would personally rule over the earth and straighten out the tangled state into which sin had plunged the universe. In preparation for this, Montanus called upon the believers to exercise rigid discipline over themselves and to redouble their efforts to convert mankind. Frequent fasts were imposed; celibacy was recommended; and second marriages were unconditionally forbidden. Mortification of the body was enjoined, and the unkempt appearance with tattered garments was encouraged as a sign of humility and self-denial in preparation for the end of the existing order.

Two women, Priscilla and Maximilla, also visionaries, were proclaimed to be prophetesses. They traveled with Montanus as "companions of the Paraclete." They also were preoccupied with the thought of the last days. Epiphanius has preserved a statement of Maximilla to the effect that, "After me there will not again be a prophetess, but the end will come." Priscilla claimed to have seen the Lord himself. She testified that He appeared in the form of a woman attired in shining garb, to inform her that the New Jerusalem would soon descend from Heaven and settle upon the earth at Pepuza, in Asia Minor.

I beg the kind indulgence of my readers for inserting here what may appear to be a too lengthy statement from the book, The Early Church, written by David Duff, an eminent professor of church history in Edinburgh, Scotland. The following quotation points up those conditions which seem to bring to the forefront mere human beings who imagine that they are either the Holy Spirit, or His authorized spokesmen:

> Montanism had something of the character of a revival. It was the first reaction, while the Church was still young, against a widespread lukewarmness and worldliness, and especially against the slothful, if not the scoffing spirit of the multitude of believers who no longer cherished the lively expectation of the parousia of Christ, which had been so general in the first days, but said, "The Lord delayeth His coming," forgetting that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. It is not wonderful that, in these circumstances, many should be dissatisfied with themselves, dissatisfied > with the Church, dissatisfied with the episcopal rulers, who were now consolidating their power. But here were enthusiasts, who sought not only to recall the lost ideal, but, in view of the approaching end, and under the inspiration of the Paraclete, to make Christianity holier and purer than in the days of the apostles. Their ecstasies, their zeal, their rigorism, and even their spiritual pride, were fitted to gain them adherents far and wide, and possibly the fear of those Gnostic speculations by which the objective truths of Christianity were subverted had a powerful influence with not a few, and induced them to embrace or favor a system in which the objectivity of Christianity, and particularly the doctrine of the parousia, was made to absorb the thought and energy of the individual.[3]

The persistent student of church history will soon become aware that at intervals there is a recurrence of almost universal concern with the Holy Spirit and His activity on the contemporary scene. When the religious structures become solidified and those who maintain them become adamant, when worldliness and apathy rule the lives of the membership, those whose deep emotional needs are not being met seek a closer walk with God, and a visible manifestation of the presence of the Spirit. It is easier to walk by sight in a world of fear and trepidation than to walk by faith.

In every such period men like Montanus arise, and if they do not, as he did, claim to be the Holy Spirit personified, they do profess to be His Vicars. They produce prophecies that the uninitiated are expected to receive unquestioningly, under threat of damnation for refusal. Repeatedly there has been a reaffirmation that the last days are at hand. When the world becomes so complex and confused that men can find no solution in social experiments and political expediencies, they turn toward God.

As it is with so many other things in human life, there are both good and bad features involved in such a cyclical process. It is good that men are brought to a realization of the need of God's influence in human affairs, and good that the power and impact of the Holy Spirit are once more affirmed. It is regrettable that the daily and constant concern of God for mankind is so soon forgotten after the excitement and agitation have died away. It is also a tragedy that many historians, aware of the predictions, which never come to pass, conclude that the whole Christian fabric has been woven from the overheated imaginations of men without real basis in fact. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Because Jesus has not returned at the time appointed by men does not mean that He will not return at the time appointed by the Father.

It will be helpful, I think, to study carefully the words of a German historian and analyst, K. R. Hagenbach, who in about 1850 wrote the following:

> Has not at all times a rigid way of life, especially when it arms itself with a prophetic, enthusiastic speech, and turns itself against the existing order of things, produced a mighty impression on the multitude? To observe with all wisdom and patience the quiet course of God in history, and to follow its traces even where the natural eye perceives only a natural succession of events, belongs only to the man who has been exercised and trained in spiritual things. The mass loves the astounding, the thoroughgoing, the uncompromising; and hence the extraordinary outpourings, the improvised prophecies, of a heated and extravagant imagination, supported by an energetic will, have ever imposed more on the rude mind than the harmonious exhibition of a calm and simple piety. Montanism is not an isolated phenomenon. Distrust of science, contempt for heathen literature, hostility to art and culture, a bold disregard of established social relations and forms, a rough exterior, a constant prominence given to repentance, coupled with predictions of fearful judgments— such marks the Montanists have in common not only with the different sects of the Middle Ages, and > the Anabaptists of the age of the Reformation, but more or less, with the Puritans of England and the Camisards of France, and the many "awakened" (so-called) of more recent and most recent times.[4]

The validity of the thesis of Hagenbach is established by the fact that it might have been written within our own generation without changing a word or sentence. It would be surprisingly easy to show the various periods to which he alludes that men have been carried away on a wave of enthusiasm, repetitious of other such occasions produced by the state of the world in previous times. This procedure, however, would be only incidental to our real purpose at present and we must postpone it until a more propitious season.

Let me then summarize what I have said. I have asserted that the present confusion about the Holy Spirit is not a unique phenomenon. Much misunderstanding about the nature, essence, and work of the Spirit has characterized every age. I have sought to show that some of the perplexity has originated in an ignorance of the Godhead, and the conjecture that an admission of the personality of the Spirit would demand an assumption that there existed a plurality of Gods.

Again, I have shown that uncertainty has arisen because of the etymology of spirit, and the failure to recognize that words, as do trees, grow from roots, and that such growth necessitates change. One can no more develop a language by insisting that root meanings must remain static than he can produce fruit by cutting off every shoot that springs above the surface of the soil from the roots below.

I have also given proof that professed teachers have deceived the multitudes through the centuries, either by alleging that they were the Spirit incarnated, or by claiming to be special functionaries of the Spirit, with new and fanciful revelations that appealed to the credulous.

It is now time to turn from this avenue of approach to study and analyze the teachings of the Scriptures with reference to the identity of the Holy Spirit. As we do this it will be necessary to avoid the dogmatic and authoritarian attitude. In a spirit of sharing let us turn to a continued investigation of the nature of the profound relationship between the Holy Spirit and the human spirit. Surely no greater theme than this can challenge the intellect.

Is the Spirit the Word?

Contents

Is the Holy Spirit the Word of God? Is the Spirit a pervasive influence of righteousness, or the spirit of man consecrated to a service to humanity, simply because "holy is as holy does"? The only source from which to obtain an answer to these questions is the revelation of God. Revelation, from the Greek apokalupsis, means laying bare, making naked, or uncovering. It relates to God's unveiling that which otherwise must remain a mystery to man.

There is a sphere beyond the ability of man's intellect to probe and penetrate. Being finite, man is circumscribed in the range of knowledge to what he can apprehend by his senses and to what he can deduct by rational thought processes. By memory he can recall the past, and by imagination he can project himself into the realm of fantasy, but he cannot know divine thought without divine revelation.

One who postulates that man is the creation of an intelligent Being will accept as a corollary that such a Creator will communicate to His creation. Thus, the fact of revelation is substantiated by the nature of God and man, since only God can supply the need of man for that knowledge which is beyond his grasp.

The apostle Paul declares that what could not be ascertained by the eye, or learned by hearing or rational perception, has been revealed to man by the Spirit. He affirms that the Holy Spirit sustains the same relationship to the mind of God that the human spirit does to the human mind and that, therefore, the Holy Spirit alone is able to reveal the thoughts of God.

Revelation is the uncovering for man by the Holy Spirit of what man cannot discover for himself. There is a difference between the undiscovered and the undiscoverable. The first is capable of being found out by additional research, while the last is beyond man's power to fathom without divine assistance. God never reveals to man what he can learn by his own study or be taught by another, for to do this would be to circumvent the very rational powers He gave to man. These are the means by which man is distinguished from the rest of the animal kingdom and exhibits the image of God.

The Holy Spirit is a subject for and of revelation. We can grasp the nature and identity of the Spirit only from a study of the Word of God. We cannot do research into the existence of the Spirit by means of our sensory apparatus, nor by use of our perceptive powers. In clarifying for us the identity of the Spirit, God's revelation will also disabuse our minds of false concepts and free us from mistaken ideas.

To begin with, it seems obvious to me that the Spirit is not the Word of God. These two bear a close relationship to one another and work together in a harmonious way, but they are not identical in any sense. The Word of God has been manifested in three forms: the living Word, the oral word, and the written word. In none of these forms is the Word to be confounded with the Spirit.

The Greek term for the living Word is Logos. This was the term for both reason and word. If we think of these in a purely contemporary sense, as we now employ them, we will not do justice to them, nor assign to them the values that they exhibit when employed in the Scriptures. We generally think of reason simply as an intellectual process, and of a word as a mere symbol of thought. But the ancient philosophers regarded both in a much more profound light. A recognition of this will enable us to understand their use in God's revelation. Reason was creative. The origin and order of the cosmos were attributable to it. Before the material universe existed, reason was. It gave form and meaning to all else. It was the only primal reality, the first cause. As everything existed in an idealistic concept before it was translated into being, reason was the womb out of which all else was delivered. The sculptor could summon the form of reason from marble and give it a body as he did other qualities and attributes of deity, and when he did the statue was worshiped as a god.

In the same way the wise-men of old regarded words. Words were not carelessly used as they often are now, because they were looked upon as possessing life. Indeed, they were thought of as having souls and bodies. The soul was the thought, the vital imagery given birth in the mind, while the sounds or written characters constituted the body in which it was encased. Words could be mutilated by ridicule and distortion of the thought, or they could be murdered by destruction of their message.

Various forms of illustration were devised to portray the power of words to effect change in the universe. They were as arrows shot forth from an unseen bow, and sometimes they were poison bringing death to those who received them into their hearts. Sometimes they were aflame, setting on fire the passions of men and consuming them. They were also looked upon as birds winging their way from a mental dovecote and carrying messages to distant realms. Certainly they were not "dead letters" or dry material, although they might be referred to as chaff.

Recognition of these things will help us appreciate more fully the testimony of the apostle John, who wrote to counter the inroads of Gnosticism, a dangerous philosophy that threatened the existence of "the Way" in the Greek world. Our present purpose will not be served by lengthy explanation of this pernicious doctrine, but prominent among its tenets was advocacy of the idea that all matter is inherently evil, and God could not involve himself directly with man in the flesh. The Gnostics, who took their name from gnosis(wisdom), had much to say about the Logos as the impersonal creative wisdom out of which the world was conceived.

John begins his testimony of Jesus as the Messiah and Son of God by the affirmation, "In the beginning was the (Logos), and the (Logos) was with God, and the (Logos) was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made" (John 1:1-3; KJV). The Logos is here portrayed as personal, and not impersonal. He was Creator and not created. When the beginning occurred He was already existent. Place the beginning where you will, but He was already there.

The Logos was with God, so there existed God and the Logos. But the Logos was God. He was Deity. He was not one who existed with God as of a different nature and character. He existed not from the beginning, but in the beginning, uncreated and creating, so the Logos was God.

John then makes an interesting commentary about the Logos' relationship to man. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men. And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not" (vv. 4, 5; KJV). The expression, "in him was life," does not mean merely that He was alive. Such a statement would have been unnecessary. The Logos was the repository of life. He was the origin of all life as we know and experience it, but He was not the creator of life. Life is uncreated and eternal. In a sense God is life, for just as there was never a time when God was not, so there was never a time when life was not. Of course, like Paul, I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of the flesh. The expression "a time" as used here is awkward because Deity is not subject to time or space.

The light that was in the beginning in the Logos is the light of men. Life, then, is more than existence. It is illumination. It is a sharing of the divine with the human, a bestowal of the divine energy, the creative urge upon man as a rational being made in the image of God and the Logos. It is the life that is the light, and man by his very nature— his human nature— is instinctively within the range of that light.

Sin brought a pall of darkness upon the universe. It was not created to be in darkness, but in light. Sin changed "the course of this world" and surrendered it to the dominion of the prince of the power of the air, under whose reign the children of disobedience produce "the unfruitful works of darkness." Still, the life, which is the light, continues to bring its impact upon the darkness, and the darkness is not able to overcome it. It cannot engulf or swallow up the light. Just as light is superior to darkness, so life is superior to death. When one moves in, the other must surrender its tenancy.

We come now to the capsheaf of John's witness. "And the (Logos) was made flesh, and dwelt among us . . . full of grace and truth" (v. 14; KJV). This statement bewildered the Greek world and challenged its thinking as nothing did. Even in our own day many persons find it extremely difficult to accept. The word for "dwelt" in the original means tent or tabernacle. What John is saying is that the Logos was made flesh and brought His own tent (body) with Him. He came to share our nomadic life as strangers and pilgrims on the earth.

The Holy Spirit is not the living Word. That Word became incarnate as the Son of God, and when the sonship was publicly recognized, the Spirit descended upon Him as a divine attestation of His relationship. It all happened when Jesus presented himself to John the baptizer to be baptized in the Jordan River. Here is the account of what happened: "The next day John seeth Jesus coming unto him, and saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. This is he of whom I said, After me cometh a man which is preferred before me: for he was before me. And I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel therefore am I come baptizing with water. And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God" (John 1:29-34; KJV).

We cannot determine whether or not John was personally acquainted with Jesus before He came to be baptized. It is possible that the expression, "I knew him not" referred to recognition as the Messiah who should be presented to Israel. John had instructions to prepare the hearts of the Jews by giving them knowledge of salvation through the remission of their sins. He was informed that when he would see the Spirit of God descend in the bodily form of a dove and remain upon the One whom he was baptizing, he would know that He was the Son of God.

At the beginning of Jesus' personal ministry there was a distinction between the Spirit and the Son. The two are never confused in the New Covenant Scriptures. In a disputed passage (1 John 5:7) occurs the statement, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one" (KJV). Even though this does not appear in the oldest and best manuscripts, and may be an interpolation from the marginal notes of an early translator or transcriber, its message is true. There are three, and yet they are one.

Just as the Holy Spirit is not the living Word, so the Spirit is not the oral word as delivered by the apostles and prophets. In a memorable section of his first letter to the Corinthians, Paul discusses his initial approach to their city. It had given its very name to licentiousness and vice of the lowest degree. Here lust was worshiped as homage to the goddess of love, and deviant sex was regarded as a means of expressing religion. In this setting Paul came with a message of cleansing, sanctification, and justification in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of God (6:11).

When the apostle arrived in the city, which prided itself upon the very philosophy that had resulted in an urban sprawl of immorality, he refused to engage in the kind of rhetoric so popular in the Greek world. He specifically affirmed, "When I came to you to present the evidence for the secret of God, which it was my purpose to declare, I rejected the eloquent vocabulary associated with philosophy" (paraphrase of 1 Corinthians 2:1).

The difference between the philosophers and the apostle is simply stated. The philosophers took what was plain and left it a mystery; the apostle took what was a mystery and made it plain. To Paul, the string that unraveled the secret of the ages was the cross. Thus, he declared, "I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (1 Corinthians 2:2).

Having committed himself to this course, Paul freely admitted that he personally felt a sense of his own weakness, accompanied by dread and great trembling. This does not mean that he was ready to "press the panic button," nor does it imply that he was frightened by what might happen to him personally. He was deeply concerned about the reception of his testimony. Accordingly, he declared that his language and message were not set forth in plausible words of wisdom.

It is a common trick of hucksters to conceal inferior and unacceptable fruit in the bottom of a container and the better fruit on top. In much the same way the philosophers were masters in the art of enticement through carefully planned usage of vocabulary. The apostle scorned the employment of such methods. He wrote: "For we are not, like so many, peddlers of God's word; but as men of sincerity, as commissioned by God, in the sight of God we speak in Christ" (2 Corinthians 2:17). He did not put the cross in the bottom of the basket to be discovered later by those who were attracted to Jesus. Christ's death on the cross was placed on top for everyone to see. That death, not a higher degree of moral conduct, made redemption a fact. The speech and message were, therefore, in demonstration of the Spirit and power, in order that the faith of those who heard would not rest in human philosophy, the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. Men were to be captured for Christ, not by being blindfolded or hood-winked by persuasive eloquence, but by the influence of the Spirit and the dynamic of the thing proclaimed. The content of the message, not the wrapper in which it was packed, was to transform profligate Corinth.

A realization of this will preclude a common error created by the King James Version, which renders 1 Corinthians 1:21, "For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Many students conclude that this merely refers to the act of preaching. But nothing in the mere act of proclaiming will save anyone.

The original word for "preaching" is kerygma, which refers to the thing proclaimed, the message announced. The thesis of the apostle is that the Jews were waiting for a demonstration of power to save them as their fathers were rescued from enslavement in Egypt. Meanwhile, the Greeks were seeking to transcend the human experience by the sheer attainment of logic.

God allowed man to get to the point where he realized the futility and powerlessness of human rationality to effect a change. It was not until human wisdom had exhausted its possibilities and man had sunk to the depths of degradation that God intervened. Paul described what happened: God waited until the divine wisdom dictated that man had sufficiently demonstrated that human wisdom was incapable of discovering the divine, and at that time it pleased Him by the proclamation of a historical event, which seemed foolish, to save them that believe.

The event was the death of Christ. The thing preached was the crucifixion. To the Jew the cross was a scandal; to the Greek it was simply absurd. It was foolishness. Thus, those who were saved by trusting in the cross manifested a faith that was not grounded in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God.

In 1 Corinthians 2:6, Paul speaks of "the wisdom of this world," that is, of this passing age. In the following verse he contrasts it with the wisdom of God, which is not transitory but was ordained before the world, that is, decreed before the ages. While man was seeking to penetrate the veil of the future, God was biding His time, waiting in infinite patience for the right moment to draw aside the veil of His own secret. Finally, what man could not ascertain by visual or audible testimony, and what he could not deduce by his rational processes was revealed by the Spirit. The Spirit sustains the same relationship to God as the human spirit does to man. Only the inner man is aware of the thoughts, intents, and purposes of the man. Likewise, no one outside knows or comprehends the thoughts of the Infinite except the Spirit of God.

It is important for us to remember that thought cannot be conveyed from one mind to another without a medium of communication. Thought occurs as imagery in the mind, but that imagery cannot be projected without one's employing mutually accepted symbols. With the use of such symbols the imagery is reproduced in the receptive mind.

The highest form of communication known to rational beings is that of speech. It is a God-given faculty, for God not only created the organs of speech, but apparently taught man the use of them. No man has ever spoken who was not first spoken to, and it is evident that man did not invent or develop speech. God spoke to man, and man learned to speak.

Speech makes use of language, and all language was at first oral. The very word is from lingua, tongue. When God was ready to unravel the secret of the ages, the revelation was given by the Spirit, as the divine agent. And the Spirit, in conformity with God's recognition of man as a rational being, capable of receiving and understanding messages conveyed in language, made use of words to unveil the mystery.

Paul wrote that he spoke the things God freely revealed to us, not in words taught by human philosophers, but as revealed by the Holy Spirit, who enables us to interpret spiritual truths in spiritual language (v. 13).

We need to be careful in our approach to this statement. It does not mean that the Spirit invented a new or sacred vocabulary, and used it as a vehicle to transmit the divine message. To have done this would have defeated the purpose of God, for it would not have been a revelation at all. What is meant is simply that the words used by men were adopted and adapted to communicate or transmit divine thought. This is in harmony with the practice and purpose of God.

When God was ready to allow the Living Word to be made flesh, He did not create a new type of body, just as when the written Word was recorded it did not require a new body of type. The Word became flesh by being conceived in a human womb, and delivered by the same birth process as every human being. Jesus stripped himself in order to assume the guise of a slave in that He became like men and was born a human being. And the spoken word came in the linguistic form of everyday existence.

The difference in the body of Christ and the bodies of other men was not in composition but in the spirit within. The difference in the words of revelation and those of ordinary communication is that the Spirit infused the first. It would appear that anyone could see that the Spirit was not identical with the words of the apostles. There is a difference between a teacher and the words he employs, and Paul is quite plain in saying, "We speak these things in the words the Holy Spirit teaches" (v. 13).

Why do some men eagerly seek to identify the Spirit with the spoken word? It is possible that they want to be able to control, to manage, and manipulate the Spirit. Men can exercise control of words and make them their servants. If the Holy Spirit can be equated with the spoken word, then the Spirit comes under the management of men. The Spirit will be dependent upon the will and volition of men.

What has been said about the oral message is also true of the message committed to writing. There is no difference. What the apostles taught while they were present with the brethren is the same thing they wrote when they were absent from them. Consider such expressions as the following: "Do you not remember that when I was still with you I told you this? . . . For even when we were with you, we gave you this command" (2 Thessalonians 2:5; 3:10). For this reason the admonition could be given, "So then, brethren, stand firm and hold to the traditions which you were taught by us, either by word of mouth or by letter" (2:15).

The Holy Spirit never was the Word of God and is not now bound into a volume. The Spirit cannot be set in type, or placed on tape. The Spirit cannot be imprinted on a press or purchased at a bookstore. The written Word is the effective instrument, or word of the Spirit. "And take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Ephesians 6:17; KJV).

Our responsibility is to study the revealed Word, made available to us through the grace of God and by the Holy Spirit. No one can be true to his Christian commitment who derogates either the work of the Spirit or the need for knowledge of the Word. It is not a matter of the Spirit or the Word, but rather of the Spirit and the Word. One can never get a sufficient measure of the Spirit that he no longer needs the Word, nor can he attain to such a degree of knowledge that he no longer needs the Spirit.

It is true that the more one thinks about and appreciates the work of the Spirit, the more ardent will become his desire to acquaint himself with the words of the Spirit. The greater one's knowledge of the Word becomes, the more fervently will he seek the glorious companionship of the Spirit. It is a strangely warped view of God's program for our spiritual growth when one concludes that, because of his acquaintance with the Spirit, he can ignore further research into the Word that the Spirit delivered as God's will for mankind.

What Does the Spirit Do?

Contents

The sincere follower of Jesus seeks to shape his career on earth by the words and deeds of the Lord. Surrender of the life to Jesus means more than one's merely trying to do better according to a new code of rules and regulations. It is not the turning over of a new leaf, but one's turning up with a new life. I am reluctant to say that it means adoption of a new life style, for this implies that one may choose to live by other styles. If Jesus is rejected, what is chosen is not life at all, but death. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life" (1 John 5:12; KJV). What is set before man is not a variety of life styles from which to make a selection. God is not operating on a glorified cafeteria basis. He has said, "See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil" (Deuteronomy 30:15; KJV). To walk in the steps of Jesus means more than merely to change direction, although that is obviously involved. When one is crucified to the world and the world is crucified to him, he no longer lives to the world. He is dead. If he is to exist, another must live in him, seeing through his eyes, speaking with his tongue, and thinking through his brain.

Such a representative of the new humanity does not question whether the life of Jesus will be practical or expedient, or whether it will "pay off." The initial decision takes care of all of that. When he ascertains the manner in which Jesus regarded a question and the language Jesus used, he simply speaks of it in that manner.

A good example of this is found in the attitude toward the identity of the Holy Spirit. The follower of Jesus regards the Spirit as did Jesus. When the Christian speaks of the Spirit he does so in the language Jesus employed. The vocabulary of Jesus becomes his vocabulary. He not only speaks where the Bible speaks, but he speaks as the Bible speaks. When he speaks about the Spirit he means the same thing Jesus meant when speaking of the Spirit.

Even the most casual reader will at once see that Jesus regarded the Spirit as a person. It would be impossible in the limited compass of this chapter to explore fully every reference made by Jesus to the Spirit. Fortunately, that will not be necessary for our purpose. We may limit our study to one discourse delivered in the upper room in Jerusalem, just before Jesus' betrayal and crucifixion. The record of this address is found in John 13:16.

John prefaces the discourse with the statement that Jesus knew His hour had come to depart from this world to the Father. Having loved His own who were in the world, He loved them to the end. The experience was traumatic for both Jesus and the disciples, as He who prepared to depart from the world must prepare the others to remain in the world. The announcement of His impending exodus was made firmly, but gently. "Little children, yet a little while I am with you. You will seek me; and as I said to the Jews so now I say to you, 'Where I am going you cannot come'" (John 13:33).

This immediately aroused questions, and as usual, Peter put them into words: "Lord, where are you going?" The answer was not direct or definitive. Instead, it cut to the real heart of the matter that of continued intimate association. Jesus replied, "'Where I am going you cannot follow me now; but you shall follow me afterward.'" This did not satisfy Peter, who quickly interjected, "Lord, why cannot I follow you now? I will lay down my life for you." Jesus said that before the cock would crow for the morning watch, Peter would deny Him three times. Instead of Peter's laying down his life for Jesus, he would lay down Jesus for his life.

Jesus' announcement of His departure brought consternation to the troubled hearts of His followers, and He sought to allay their fears. He assured them that in spite of the fact they would not be able to see Him as before, their relationship would not be dissolved. There would be no loss of *power. "'He who believes in me will also do the works that I do; and greater works than these will he do, because I go to the Father'" (14:12). There would be no loss of *communication. "'Whatever you ask in my name, I will do it, that the Father may be glorified in the Son'" (v. 13). There would be no loss of *companionship. "'I will not leave you desolate; I will come to you'" (v. 18).

The word rendered "desolate" is the Greek word *orphanos. Literally it means one who is bereft of a father or parents. The word is translated "fatherless" in James 1:27. When Jesus announced His imminent departure, He addressed the disciples as "little children." This indicates that He regarded them not only as a father would his offspring, but as young children immature and relatively helpless. He informs them that they will not be abandoned or cast adrift as orphans, but He will come to them.

A study of the context will show that Jesus was going to request the Father to send another Helper or Comforter, and that this Helper would be so like Him that He could be considered as His other self. The association would be so remarkably intimate that it could be regarded as the Father and Son dwelling in them. "'If a man loves me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home with him'" (v. 23).

The original word Jesus used for this new Companion was Parakletos. It is difficult to find an English term to do justice to this Greek word, and translators differ in the terms they select for translation. The word means, "one who stands beside another to render assistance in time of need." Translators of the King James Version selected the word "Comforter" to designate the work of the Spirit, and "Advocate" to designate the work of Jesus (1 John 2:1)— the only other time the original occurs. Only John employs the word in the Scriptures.

The word "Comforter" may be somewhat misleading in this age because of our "watering down" of the meaning of comfort. Once the word had to do with strength and defense in time of attack, as the word "fort" indicates. A fortress was a bulwark against death and the destruction of all that one held dear. The word "comfort" is from the Latin comfortare, to make strong. So a comforter was one who brought power to hold out against attacking forces. In the days of King James I the word was a good one to employ for "Paraclete."

The Revised Standard Version uses "Counselor," and this reflects much the same idea as "Advocate." The Greeks used parakletos to describe an attorney who appeared beside one in court to advise and defend. This idea is still found in such words as judge-advocate and counselor-at-law. The New English Bible employs the word "Advocate," while Today's English Version uses "Helper."

That Jesus regarded the Spirit as a divine person seems apparent from His language when He said, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another (Helper), that he may abide with you for ever" (John 14:16; KJV). The Greek had two words for "another": heteros, which means "another of a different kind"; and allos, which means "another of the same kind." The latter is used here. The Spirit was to be another Helper, like Jesus. Just as God sent Jesus as a Helper, He would now send the Spirit in the same role. True, Jesus brought His own tent with Him; that is, He came in a body. The Spirit, on the other hand, did not come in His own body, for He was to dwell in the bodies of believers. "He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you" (v. 17).

So personal would the relationship with the Spirit become that it would compensate for the absence of Jesus. The Spirit would be with the disciples forever, literally, through the age in which Jesus is absent. The saints of God are never to be desolate or orphaned by the absence of Jesus. The other Helper, who succeeded Jesus on the earth, will be succeeded only by the return of Jesus.

No one who seriously studies the language of the Lord can fail to note the use of the masculine pronoun in the references to the Spirit. This is especially singular when we remember that pneuma is the word for spirit, and in its original usage meant wind, breath, and sometimes air. For this reason it is generally represented by a neuter pronoun, seeing it is a neuter noun. The word pneuma did not remain static, but grew in semantic stature through the ages until, in the divine vocabulary, it was given its highest significance. This was also true of *logos, which once meant simply "word" or "reason." When the Spirit adopted Logos and adapted it to the Word made flesh, it was given personality, and no longer referred merely to a rational concept or to the means of communicating it. So it was with *pneuma.

In speaking of the Helper who was to take His place, not once did Jesus leave the impression that He was describing a mere breath or influence. Over and over the words "He" and "Him" are used to portray the abilities and functions of the Spirit as a person. Consider, for example, the declaration, "Even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it neither sees him nor knows him; you know him, for he dwells with you, and will be in you" (John 14:17).

The masculine pronoun ekeinos is indicative of a person who can share in the intimacy of fellowship. Those who object to this point out that the term "Spirit of truth" is used as an identification, and implies something besides personality. This is fallacious reasoning when one recalls that the Spirit is often identified by terms depicting His ministry to the saints. There are other expressions, such as the Spirit of life, the Spirit of grace, and the Spirit of promise. In the passage immediately under consideration He is called "the Spirit of truth" because of His ministry through the apostles to the unregenerate world. He was to guide them into all truth, recall for them the truths Jesus had taught them and provide the truth related to things yet to happen. He was not to be a spirit of truth, or truthfulness, in the abstract, but the Spirit through whom saving truth was to be revealed and channeled. He could be known as an abiding presence. The word "know" so often used in the Scripture does not refer to an accumulation of facts about another, but personal identification with him.

A good illustration of this will be found in the words of Jesus, "'I know my own and my own know me, as the Father knows me, and I know the Father'" (John 10:14, 15). Our experience of the indwelling Spirit is a transcendent life-sharing phenomenon in which the world cannot participate. It belongs only to those who have established a covenant relationship with God, the Spirit being the seal of the covenant.

Those who are inclined to cavil frequently refer to the statement that the world cannot receive the Spirit because it cannot see Him. They ask if the disciples of Christ can see Him, and if not, how they can know that He dwells in them. It may help our understanding to know that the word originally related to men who were appointed as public deputies to attend the games, inspect conditions and participants, to see that all that transpired was legal and orderly. The word did not refer to merely watching, as a spectator in the stands, but to one who looked with interest and purpose.

Because it is unconcerned and indifferent, the world does not see the Spirit. The world occupied with distracting trivia, is insensible to the Spirit's power and pleading. The eyes of the world are closed (Acts 28:27), and the Spirit cannot manifest himself. On the other hand, the person whose heart is open will dwell with Him and be in Him. "With" signifies companionship, while "in" signifies identifying relationship.

In John 16:13-15, the pronouns "he" and "his" occur nine times, in such a context that the personality of the Spirit must certainly be recognized. The Spirit is spoken of as coming, hearing, speaking, recognizing authority, guiding, declaring a message, and glorifying another.

Jesus told the apostles that He was leaving much unsaid because the burden of complete revelation would weigh too heavily upon their hearts. They were in no condition to hear more, lest they be overwhelmed by future responsibility and the suffering that would accompany their ministrations. They were disturbed already by the news that Jesus was leaving them.

"When he comes who is the Spirit of truth, he will guide you into all the truth; for he will not speak on his own authority, but will tell only what he hears; and he will make known to you the things that are coming. He will glorify me, for everything that he makes known to you he will draw from what is mine. All that the Father has is mine, and that is why I said, 'Everything that he makes known to you he will draw from what is mine'" (John 16:13-15; TNEB).[5]

W*hen He comes*! This phrase betokens the forthcoming arrival of a person as certainly as it does when used in connection with the advent of Jesus. The Spirit was to accomplish three great objectives: (1) to guide the apostles into all the truth, even to revealing things yet in the future; (2) to glorify Jesus; (3) to be sent by the Father at the request of Jesus, but also to "come" by His own power.

He is the Spirit of truth, that is, truth is His very nature. The revelation can be relied upon. It is authoritative and decisive. The expression "all truth" does not refer to the truth related to all aspects of the universe. It is the truth that redeems and reconciles, and restores the divine-human relationship. The apostles were not yet in a position to receive all details of this saving truth that the Spirit would relay to them. He would do so as they would become able to assimilate and properly apply it.

One who trusts in Jesus can scarcely doubt that the divine design was to vouchsafe to the apostles during their lifetime the full and complete revelation of all that is essential for man to know of his relationship in the kingdom of Heaven. The position of the apostles is unique and they have no successors. Whatever was not revealed during their lifetime is not essential to God's purpose for our lives. Not a single authentic revelation has been given to man since John on Patmos laid down the calamus after writing, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen" (Revelation 21:21; KJV).

Once more it must be emphasized that the revelation of the Spirit was not given upon the authority of the Spirit. The power of the Spirit to speak is not questioned, but He did not assume the royal prerogative of doing so. The thoughts conveyed were those of the Father, and the Spirit transmitted them with infinite value and faithfulness. The Spirit told the apostles on earth what He had been told to speak from Heaven. His message was not just truthful; it was *the truth.

Jesus promised that the Spirit would inform the apostles of what was to come. Those things related to the destiny of the kingdom of Heaven in its encounter with the kingdoms of this world were to be made known as sources of comfort to the saints. The believers would be assured of the final triumph of good over evil, of righteousness over unrighteousness.

This was no new role for the Spirit. He had spoken to and through the prophets of old, warning a profligate people of their fate, revealing to kings and lesser rulers their impending doom. Now, as the divine Helper sent to complete the mission of the Son on earth, He was to gaze through the telescope of the future and see the return of the Lord and the culmination of the divine purpose as it relates to mankind.

Paul was instructed concerning the state of affairs that would obtain in the last days. "The Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils" (1 Timothy 4:1; KJV). He was informed concerning the nature of the resurrected bodies of those who had died, and the transformed bodies of those still alive at the coming of Jesus (1 Corinthians 15:50-57). In the same connection he was told of the ultimate arrangement by which the Son was to deliver the kingdom of God to the Father, so that God could be all in all.

Peter was empowered to write of the certainty of the coming of the day of the Lord, which was to be unexpected as a thief. He also wrote that at that time the "heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, and the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (2 Peter 3:10; KJV).

But John, banished to the isle called Patmos, gazed upon the panorama of the future as it was unrolled. The great sequence of events was paraded to the very end. His divine commission was to "Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter" (Revelation 1:19; KJV). He depicts for us in awesome symbols the clash of titanic forces directed from Heaven and from the depths of the abyss. There is the repeated admonition, "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

If revelation is the unfolding of mystery previously hidden from the discernment of men, surely John's volume is appropriately named. It begins with the narrator watching a door opened in Heaven, and a voice like a trumpet issuing the invitation, "Come up hither, and I will shew the things which must be hereafter." John records the fact, "Immediately I was in the spirit" (Revelation 4:1, 2; KJV). He pens his startling vision, only to conclude, "And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true: and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly be done. Behold, I come quickly" (Revelation 22:6, 7; KJV).

The Spirit was also to glorify Jesus. The original for "glorify" is doxazo, meaning "to magnify" or "honor." Jesus is the very basis of revelation. All revelation revolves around Him as the center of the moral and spiritual universe. In the solar system the planets revolve around the sun, and in the moral universe all things gain their meaning from the Son of righteousness. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Revelation 19:10).

It is interesting to note that the Spirit would glorify Jesus because everything He would make known to the disciples would have come from Jesus. The original wording should be more correctly rendered, "He will draw from what is mine" (John 16:15; TNEB). It is as if the Spirit were drawing out of a cistern or well of living water to provide sustaining truth to men. While that which is drawn out is sufficient to quench the thirst, it does not exhaust the supply. Much remains to be learned and known when the Son of man comes in the fulness of His glory, accompanied by all of His holy angels. Jesus' statement that the Spirit would draw from what belonged to Jesus is important because it emphasizes the Godhead in its unity. The Father is portrayed as the originator of all things, the Son as the heir of all things, and the Spirit as the revealer of all things ordained for the good of mankind. In Matthew 11:27, Jesus says, "All things are delivered unto me of my Father: and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him" (KJV).

Any theory of Deity that makes the Son inferior to the Father in glory cannot be sustained by Scripture. God entrusted everything to the Son, and the Spirit glorified the Son by taking from the inexhaustible supply to share it with the apostles, that we in turn might be profited. We glorify the Son in our willing acceptance of the revelation the Spirit gave concerning Him. We dishonor Him when we deny that testimony.

In summarizing the content of this chapter, let us remember that when Jesus spoke of the Spirit He did so in personal terms. He was forced to leave the earthly scene in order to accomplish His purpose. His ascension into Heaven was as important to the divine order as His descent into the earth. It was essential for Him to make intercession at the right hand of God, but He would ask the Father to send another Helper who would make intercession for the saints on earth. This Helper was to be His replacement, and He would function so effectively it would be as if Jesus were still here.

In an interesting statement Jesus said, "Nevertheless I tell you the truth: it is to your advantage that I go away, for if I do not go away, the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you" (John 16:7). The opening words of this declaration indicate that it would be difficult for the hearers to accept what Jesus said. He reinforced His announcement by insisting that He spoke the truth.

Obviously the apostles would not understand how it could be profitable for Jesus to leave them, so He proceeded to explain that the Spirit would do for them what He could not do by remaining on earth. Moreover, the Spirit would convict the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment, in a manner that could not be done if Jesus remained in the flesh.

All of this points to one conclusion, that Jesus regarded the Spirit as a person, a divine person, and all who desire to imitate Jesus in thought and speech must do the same. Perhaps nothing is more comforting than for one to realize that the divine plan involved an intimate fellowship on earth, first with Jesus dwelling in His body, and second with the Holy Spirit dwelling in our bodies. "Do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God?" (1 Corinthians 6:19).

How Does the Spirit Work?

Contents

Our knowledge of the Holy Spirit must come from what the Spirit has revealed concerning himself in the Word of God. I say this in spite of the fact that the view may be unpopular in a time when personal feelings and emotional reactions are frequently considered to be the source of information concerning the nature of the Holy Spirit. This is not to affirm that the Spirit is confined in or to the Word of revelation, nor is it intended to lessen the value of any experiential relationship with the Spirit by the Christian. It does mean that, in revealing the will of God, the Spirit has described and identified himself in such a manner that man can ascertain all that he needs to know about the character of the Spirit in exactly the same way that he learns other aspects of the divine disclosure.

We dare not test or measure the Word of God by personal feelings. We must judge our feelings in the light of God's Word. The ultimate criterion can never be the subjective, but the objective. It is foolish to say, "I do not know what the Word of God says, nor do I care, for I know how I feel." Feelings can be deceptive. One can be as happy when he believes a lie as when he believes the truth. One can be persuaded that a lie is the truth, as every confidence man on earth realizes.

Jeremiah 17 records the judgment of God upon His people. They are condemned for two things: many persons trusted in men rather than in the Word from Heaven (v. 5); others trusted in their own hearts. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: who can know it?" (v. 9; KJV). It must be remembered that this is not the evaluation of the prophet, but the declaration of God.

One can be deceived by others, but he can also be deceived by his own heart. This necessitates the twofold warning found in the Scriptures: "Let no man deceive you with vain words" (Ephesians 5:6); "Let no man deceive himself" (1 Corinthians 3:18; KJV). These things are mentioned so that the reader will understand why my appeal is to the revelation of God as we seek to identify the Spirit and to grasp the significance of His work in our world.

I believe the Bible teaches that the Holy Spirit is a divine personality, and it will be my purpose to share with you my reasons for so believing. This is done without apology inasmuch as Jesus said, "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Matthew 4:4; KJV).

It is not my intention to become embroiled in the theological donnybrook about the nature and constitution of Deity. I shall be content to speak of Scriptural things in Scriptural terms without inventing or projecting a specialized jargon that tends more to confuse than to enlighten. If it is true that all we know about the nature of God is what has been revealed, and if the revelation has been provided in words, it is apparent that we can find the terms to express any aspect of the divine will.

All thought must be expressed in words to be communicated. If there are no words for a thought, the idea is not there. If, on the other hand, there are words to express the idea, and if all persons accept the words of Scripture as the norm, there can be no division, as long as all men use Scriptural terms to express Scriptural ideas.

An example of what happens when people do not accept the Scripture is found in the use of the term "Trinity." This word does not occur in the Scriptures. It was first used by Tertullian in the second century, and was employed to express a view of the nature of God that was under attack by certain of his contemporaries. Consequently, the brand, Trinitarians, was being applied to certain ones, and this, in turn, led to the designation Unitarians for the opposers. Both groups considered themselves orthodox expositors of the apostolic doctrine. Yet, if one had asked any apostle if he were a Unitarian or Trinitarian, he would not have understood the question. I shall not belabor the question of whether Deity consists of "three persons in one" or "one person in three."

Matthew speaks of the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit (28:19). Paul writes of the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit (2 Corinthians 13:14). One who studies the Bible can determine the functions ascribed to each of these, and from what is taught can reach conclusions as to their respective offices.

Upon this basis I consider the Holy Spirit as a personality. I use the term "personality" rather than "person," although I have no objection to the latter. Our word "person" comes from the Latin word for an actor's mask, and refers to one who enacts a role or performs an individual part in a drama. We still use persona to designate a character in a novel or play. The Holy Spirit had a unique part to play in the relationship of Deity to creation, and the sum of the individual qualities and attributes assigned to the Spirit make Him a personality.

Having introduced the word "attributes" we are now prepared to examine the Scriptures and see whether the Spirit is portrayed as an intelligent being in His own right.

The Spirit possesses a mind*. "And he who searches the hearts of men knows what is the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God" (Romans 8:27).

This statement occurs in a context of reassurance that God has provided the Spirit to help us in those matters where we show weakness. One such area is that of prayer. We do not know how to pray as we ought. There are deep desires and earnest longings that we cannot express. Our linguistic talents fail us when we try to translate our profound feelings into our limited vocabulary. In such a time "the Spirit himself intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words."

We can be certain that the Father knows the mind of the Spirit and that we are not left to "go it alone." In 1 Corinthians 2:11 we are told that the Spirit knows the mind of God, and in Romans 8:27 we learn that God knows the mind of the Spirit. The mind, or intellect, is the possession of an intelligent being, and this leads us to accept the Spirit as being in that category.

The Holy Spirit can speak and thus communicate thought. Upon this matter there is no room for doubt, if anyone accepts the plain statements of the Scriptures as valid. Occasionally the Spirit took command of human tongues and used them as organs of speech. In Acts 11:6, Peter states, "Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning Judas" (KJV). In Acts 4:25, God is given credit for what He "by the mouth of thy servant David hast said." In Acts 28:25, the apostle declares, "Well spake the Holy Ghost by Esaias." In Hebrews 3:7 occurs a citation from Psalm 95:7 with the preface "as the Holy Ghost saith," also in Hebrews is a quotation from Jeremiah 31:33, of which the writer said, "The Holy Ghost also is a witness to us" (10:15-17).

Again, Jesus told the apostles not to be concerned about their defense when they were apprehended and arraigned before governors and kings. He said, "But when they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you" (Matthew 10:19, 20; KJV). Notice that both the content and method would be taken care of by the Spirit.

A question that always seems to agitate the minds of men who must "pin things down" and arrive at specifics before they can be happy is the way in which the Spirit has revealed the message of God. Certain terms have been created to designate the various ideas upon the subject. Some have contended for verbal inspiration, others for thought transference, and the like.

As is frequently the case when we try to capture divine action in human vocabulary, the Spirit may not have been limited to any one theory or any combination. He may well have employed all of them at different times. We know that in old times "men moved by the Holy Spirit spoke from God" (2 Peter 1:21), and we are also told that God spoke in former times through the prophets in different times and in many ways (Hebrews 1:1).

On one occasion the apostle wrote, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly," that is, exactly or precisely. This is an indication that at other times the speaking was done with less directness; however, we must never develop a theory that eliminates the use of words in the communication of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit employed language known to men and used by them in their social interchange; otherwise, what was conveyed would not have been a revelation at all. If the language employed was an esoteric or secret code, the subject would have remained a mystery. This is the exact opposite of revelation.

On the Day of Pentecost the Spirit came to provide visual and audible proof that Jesus had been exalted to the right hand of God and had received of the Father the promised Holy Spirit. Through the apostles He testified to wonderful works of God. He communicated this testimony through the native languages of the hearers who were present "from every nation under heaven." Those who spoke in "other languages," that is, in languages they had not learned, did so "as the Spirit gave them utterance."

No revelation has been given to man except in the language of man, that is, as relates to the obligations and duties of man. Nothing else could be regarded as a revelation. It is true that because of the multiplicity of languages used by peoples, tribes, and nations, translation is necessary to make the message understandable to those who did not receive it directly. Revelation is one thing, and translation is another, however.

In the previous chapter, mention was made of Paul's original encounter with the residents of Corinth. This city, the center of commercialized vice in the ancient world, was a veritable showcase exhibiting the fruits of human wisdom coupled with idolatry.

Into this maelstrom of human wickedness entered one who confessed that he came "in weakness and in much fear and trembling." He came bearing the good news that the living God had visited the earth in the form of a Son, and that message was presented in words of stark simplicity. It was a matter of allowing the facts to speak for themselves. Paul intimates that he had the power of deciding his approach to a given culture. He could have used the philosophic method. He was familiar with the teachings of the pagan world, for he quoted from Cleanthes, Epimenides, and others, at various times. But he chose to decry the wisdom of "the rulers of this transitory age" and to impart the wisdom that "God decreed before the ages for our glorification."

This wisdom has to be revealed. It could not be learned by visual or audible methods, because it was beyond the power of the senses to ascertain. Nor could it be learned by rationalization. It was outside the realm of deduction for finite minds. It could be revealed only by the Holy Spirit. It bore no resemblance to the spirit of the age, because that spirit knows nothing of the purpose and pleasure of God.

We are told that the Spirit used words for communicating the things freely given of God. "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth" (1 Corinthians 2:13; KJV). Surely it requires an intellectual being to select and employ a vocabulary to transmit divine thought to human mentality. The Spirit possesses a mind to accumulate divine information and the ability to share it.

The Holy Spirit can testify to fact and bear witness to men and through men. This is made clear in Jesus' talk with His disciples just before His betrayal and crucifixion. These men were sad because Jesus had told them He was to leave them and return to the Father. They had forsaken everything in order to follow Him. They had been His constant companions for three or more years. The contemplation of a life without this Friend was almost unthinkable. Jesus pointed out to them that He would compensate for their grief and loneliness by requesting the Father to send them another Helper, a Companion who would remain although He himself was absent. In direct language He identified this advocate as the Holy Spirit, and informed them of some of the things the Spirit would accomplish and provide. He reassured them with these words: "But when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall testify of me: and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning" (John 15:26, 27; KJV). The Holy Spirit was to come and bear witness to the culmination of the divine purpose: that all authority should be granted to the Son, and He would occupy a seat at the right hand of God. The apostles were witnesses to the personal ministry of Jesus from its beginning. The Spirit descended upon Jesus to inaugurate His personal witness to the world. The same Spirit would descend upon the apostles to inaugurate their witness to the world.

In many respects the apostolic mission was the mission of the Spirit, the apostles being the agents. The Spirit would act as a teacher and guide, assuring perfect recall of the precepts of Jesus. "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (John 14:26; KJV).

An analysis of this statement may be helpful. The Spirit was to be sent by the Father, but in the name of Jesus. This last expression indicates the authority under which the Spirit would operate. At the accession of Jesus to the throne, all authority was conferred on Him, and He will continue to exercise it until the last enemy has been destroyed. Any divine action taken in the kingdom of Heaven must be under the authority of the Son.

The Holy Spirit has no direct authority, but acts or functions by derivative authority. All authority was invested in the Father until it was transferred to the Son (1 Corinthians 15:27). The Spirit does nothing in His own name, that is, upon His own authority.

Another point of interest is that the Spirit was to make use of the rational powers of the human messengers of Jesus. It is certainly true that upon occasion, and in emergency, the Spirit commandeered the tongues of the apostles to speak words of defense with no thought required by the speaker. Such involuntary speech was certainly rendered when the apostles were unjustly arraigned before kings and magistrates. But the Spirit also taught them, and this involves a learning process requiring cooperation upon the part of the student. In addition to the faculty of perception, that of memory was also stimulated so that those who had been with Jesus could recall the things He had taught. Later this would be designated "the gift of knowledge."

The promise to the apostles was amplified by another statement of Jesus: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: for he shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak: and he will shew you things to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall shew it unto you" (John 16:13, 14; KJV).

"All truth" refers to the body of truth of divine revelation, that which is required to save and sanctify men. It was such truth the apostles were commissioned to furnish the world, and which they were to receive from the Spirit. The expression, "for he shall not speak of himself," is frequently misunderstood and misapplied. It is taken to mean that the Spirit will say nothing about himself, His influence, or function. This cannot be true because the Scriptures furnish us much material about the Holy Spirit. If the Spirit had not spoken about himself we would have known nothing about His work.

The expression here does not mean that the Spirit will say nothing about himself, rather that He will not speak upon His own authority. This passage is clear even in the King James Version when properly considered, "He shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak." The thought is that the Spirit is the agent for, not the source of, the testimony. The Revised Version and New English Bible are correct in rendering the expression, "For he will not speak on his own authority."

It must be noted that the Spirit was not only to bring to memory the things Jesus had taught in the past, but was also to reveal future things. Jesus had to forgo dealing with many things because His disciples were not yet able to bear them (John 16:12). The word translated "bear" means literally, "to lift up for the purpose of carrying." Metaphorically it signifies one's taking up thoughts or assimilating concepts. In subsequent revelation the Spirit disclosed many things that were to transpire. One such record is called The Revelation, or Apocalypse. It actually portrays the future of the kingdom of the heavens and the kingdoms of this world.

The Spirit would glorify Jesus, in that every disclosure that was made would be drawn from Jesus, the embodiment of all wisdom and power. Jesus made this clear. "All that the Father has is mine; therefore I said that he will take what is mine and declare it to you" (John 16:15; RSV). It is evident that the Spirit was to be the earthly advocate or helper during the time Jesus reigned by the will of the Father. It seems equally evident that the witness borne by the Spirit was to be personal, teaching, reminding, and foretelling future events. These are not the actions of a vague influence, but of an individual, divine and prescient.

The Spirit is credited with selecting and calling men to fulfill certain missions. The congregation of saints in Antioch of Syria was fortunate in having a number of prophets and teachers in its service. "While they were worshiping the Lord and fasting, the Holy Spirit said, 'Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them.' Then after fasting and praying they laid their hands on them and sent them off" (Acts 13:2, 3).

It is interesting to note that while they were sent forth by the congregation, Luke also gives credit to the Holy Spirit. "So, being sent out by the Holy Spirit, they went down to Seleucia; and from there they sailed to Cyprus" (v. 4). That the Spirit mapped out their route and determined the places they were to visit is strongly suggested in Acts 16:6: "And they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia, having been forbidden by the Holy Spirit to speak the word in Asia." From this it appears that the Holy Spirit is a personality regulating and arranging the work of apostolic mission, exercising control over both time and place for the initial proclamation of the good news in various places. We, being human and limited in both knowledge and insight, are not always capable of judging the opportune time in which to present our witness to a people; but the Spirit, knowing the hearts of men, is able to judge.

The Spirit is portrayed as possessing will and acting accordingly. Three chapters of Paul's first letter to the Corinthians are dedicated to a discussion of special gifts of the Holy Spirit. This was made imperative because of strife, especially over misuse of the ability granted to some to speak in other languages (1 Corinthians 12-14). In 12:7 Paul points out that the gifts are distributed to various members of the body, and each one who receives a manifestation of the Spirit is to use it for the common good.

There follows a catalogue of the nine spiritual gifts, all of which were apparently possessed by individuals in that congregation. The apostle then writes: "All these are inspired by one and the same Spirit, who apportions to each one individually as he wills" (v. 11). It is clear that in the distribution of gifts the decision as to who should receive them remained with the Spirit. Regardless of how eager one might be to receive a special gift, the final apportionment was not dependent upon the will of the recipient, but upon the will of the Spirit.

An interesting observation about the origin of prophecy occurs in 2 Peter 1:21, where the apostle asserts that the things spoken and written by godly men of old did not result from an interpretation of events by the prophets themselves. They did not observe what was going on and deduce their prophecies from their views of what might lie ahead as a result. They spoke as they were motivated by the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit determined both the appropriate time and content of prophetic declarations. In this the human will of the mouthpiece was made subservient to the will of the Spirit.

A summary of what has been said in this chapter will remind us that the Holy Spirit possesses a mind, and can communicate thought. Moreover, the Spirit can testify to what has been said by another, guide listeners into truth, men into certain missions, and exercise will in selecting those who are to be recipients of special gifts and qualifying abilities.

Again, it must be emphasized that these are attributes of a person and can hardly be assigned to a mere influence or a vague, motivating force. This means that if one is to share in the life of the Spirit he must become a partaker of the divine life— the life of God— in a genuine personal relationship. This is the distinguishing characteristic between the one who recognizes Jesus as Lord over his life and the one who rejects His lordship. One's acceptance of Christ makes the difference between life and death.

How Is the Spirit Related to God?

Contents

One cannot always judge a person by those with whom he is associated. Sometimes a grave injustice is wrought by attempting to do so. But I think a legitimate conclusion to reach with reference to the Holy Spirit is that He is both a person and is divine. He is repeatedly mentioned in direct conjunction with two divine persons, with no qualifying statement indicating that He is different. The conclusion is bolstered by the connections in which the combinations occur and by the functions performed by each of the principals.

For the sake of brevity we will confine ourselves in this chapter to the New Covenant Scriptures. A good place to begin is in conjunction with the incarnation. Gabriel was sent to Mary from God (Luke 1:26). He assured the virgin that the Lord was with her. He quieted her fears by telling her that she had found favor with God. She was then told that she would be impregnated by the Holy Spirit. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, . . . therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke 1:35; KJV).

In this instance we have God, the Holy Spirit, and the Son of God. It is the Father who wills, the Spirit being the executive agent, the conveyor of life. Nothing about the fertilization of a human ovum by a divine seed, or life-giving principle, should cause doubt to one who believes in the creation of man by God. In the beginning the breath of God, breathed into an elemental body taken from the dust of the earth, made human life possible.

In one sense, the only life we have is the result of the divine and human, and all of us by nature are sons of God. If the first Adam became a living being by the divine breath, it is not strange that the second Adam began His earthly mission by a union of the divine and human.

We do not need to understand or be able to explain fully the varied roles of the principals involved in the birth of Jesus to realize that the Father, the Spirit, and the Son all had distinctive parts in the drama of the ages. The means may remain a mystery while we accept the fact upon faith. When Mary submitted herself to the will of God with the words of resignation, "Be it unto me according to thy word," her womb became the depository of the divine seed, and that meant that the Son of God was sent forth to be "made of a woman, made under the law" (Galatians 4:4; KJV).

We turn now from the advent of Jesus to His final commission to the twelve before His ascension to Heaven. As Matthew records it, after the resurrection of Jesus the eleven apostles journeyed northward to Galilee. They gathered on a mountain where He had promised to meet them. When they saw Him they worshiped Him, although some felt that "it was too good to be true." Then Jesus revealed that all authority was granted Him in Heaven and on earth, a way of explaining the universality of the lordship bestowed upon Him by the Father. This empowered Him to send them forth as ambassadors to all nations of men. The Authorized Version renders His words, "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" (Matthew 28:19, 20).

Once again we have found the Holy Spirit appearing in relationship with the Father and the Son, and in such a connection that a clear distinction is to be made between the three, although such unity is manifested that the word "name"

We turn attention next to Ephesians 4:4-6, where Paul enumerates the seven "ones" upon which our unity is conditioned and must be maintained. The immediate context expresses concern that those who are called conduct themselves in a manner that will bring honor upon that calling. Since we have been called into unity with Christ, nothing reflects against that calling more than strife and division. Of all people on this earth, those who are in Christ Jesus should be most harmonious.

In order to maintain oneness, four essentials are recommended: lowliness, meekness, longsuffering, and forbearance in love. The first of these is better represented by our word "humility." It must be remembered that in the world surrounding Ephesus this was not regarded as a virtue. Humility implied cowering and cringing under servility, or slavishness. Jesus clothed this term with beauty and grace by His own sacrifice and service. He humbled himself to come in the form of a servant and became obedient unto death, even the death on the cross. In this light, humility took on a completely new color. It was no longer regarded as an indication of weakness, but of genuine strength and power. E. H. Chapin said, "Humility is not a weak and timid quality; it must be carefully distinguished from a groveling spirit. There is such a thing as an honest pride and self-respect. Though we may be servants of all, we should be servile to none."[6]

Humility is as essential to the maintenance of unity as breath is to life. When one knows his qualifications and abilities, and yet is willing to step down in favor of another who may not have the same potential; when he is qualified to play first violin, but is willing to "play second fiddle" so that harmony will prevail in the orchestra, unity will generally be preserved. Humility recognizes its rights, but refuses to assert or insist upon them, realizing that rights are secondary to responsibilities.

"Meekness," in its original Greek form is full of beauty that cannot be completely captured in any single word in our English language. Any correct understanding of it must begin with the recognition that meekness is not weakness, but just the opposite. Many centuries ago a Christian wrote, "The meek are not those who are never at all angry, for such are insensible; but those who, feeling anger, control it, and are angry only when they ought to be. Meekness excludes revenge, irritability, morbid sensitiveness, but not self-defense, or a quiet and steady maintenance of right."[7] It is doubtful that any modern writer could give a better description of the quality called "meekness."

Nothing else is more likely to cause strife and contention than impatience coupled with a short temper. The word for "longsuffering" is *makrothumia, a combined form of *makros, long, and *thumos, temper. Certainly it is associated with endurance under pressure, but it is interesting to know that it never occurs in the Greek classics. The virtue it represents was unknown to the poets and philosophers, or was despised by them as unmanly. So the word can be regarded as one given meaning or content by the life and teachings of Jesus.

The reason for this is easily seen when it is recognized that makrothumia was first a characteristic of God, who patiently endured and put up with human shortcomings in order to work good. The longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah while the ark was being prepared. God is long-suffering toward us, not willing that any should perish. The gods of the Romans and Greeks were conceived as vengeful and spiteful. Since people are like their gods, it is understandable why longsuffering is an attribute of Christians rather than pagans.

Impatience, the enemy of the trusting heart, upsets the mental equilibrium, chafes the spirit, and destroys all inner tranquillity. It is an irritant enflaming the mind and erupting in open criticism mingled with the gall of bitterness. Ralph Waldo Emerson, who wrote much about patience, declared that patience coupled with fortitude conquers all things. He urged all men to adopt the pace of nature, declaring that her secret is patience. It is unwise to allow the corrosion of impatience to rust the hinges of the heart so that when the blessing is delivered it cannot open the door to receive it.

Closely allied to patience is the word "forbearing," from anecho, or "hold back." It describes the person who does not give vent to hurtful expressions, that is, one who restrains himself from actions that antagonize or intensify feelings. We are to bear one another in love, not allowing shortcomings or failures to cause us to explode in anger or recrimination.

All of these qualities are emphasized as essential to those who are "eager to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Unity is not created by these attitudes, great and noble though they may be. Unity is received from God and not achieved by man. It is a gift of the Spirit. "Maintain" is from a word meaning "to guard, watch, or preserve." It was used twice to describe the action of the four squads of soldiers detailed to guard Peter while in prison (Acts 12:5, 6). The unity of the Spirit has been entrusted to us, placed in our custody, and we are under divine orders to keep it, lest it inadvertently slip away while we are off guard.

The restraining force by which we can keep the unity of the Spirit is the bond of peace. To the extent that we disturb or weaken the peace we lessen the hold we have upon unity. When peace flies out the window unity leaves by the door. The four personal qualities prescribed are not given in order to maintain unity, but to strengthen the bond of peace, which binds unity within the framework of our association. Our calling is to exhibit and manifest the unity God has ordained as His ultimate purpose only in Christ Jesus.

Seven units in that unity are gifts of the Spirit. All of them are provided by divine wisdom and are to be received by us as essential to the eternal design. Not one of these provides for any question as to its existence or validity. It is not that there ought to be one body, one Spirit, and one hope, but they are. It is not that there should be one Lord, one faith, and one baptism, but they are. Their existence is not contingent upon human understanding or discovery. They are integral parts of the given unity, the unity of the Spirit. Perhaps that is why the one Spirit is mentioned before the other members of the Deity.

By one Spirit, one faith, one baptism, we are brought into relationship of the one Lord, welded together in the one body and made partakers of the one hope. All of this is according to the will of one God and Father whose personality penetrates the entire arrangement.

A powerful argument for the oneness of all the believers is here presented, and is enhanced by the harmony between the one Father, one Lord, and one Spirit. In spite of their divergent functions they are one in nature and purpose. Since we are indwelt by the one Spirit, we should work together. It is appropriate to have impressed upon us first of all the attributes essential to the maintenance of unity, and then learn that the unity of the Spirit involves Heaven as well as earth.

Another illustration of the association of the Spirit with the Father and Son is found in the treatment of spiritual gifts, the charismata, possessed by the saints in Corinth. The congregation planted in this center of Gentile profligacy was fortunate to have had the ministrations of Paul. He refers to them as "my workmanship in the Lord," and writes, "If to others I am not an apostle, at least I am to you; for you are the seal of my apostleship in the Lord" (1 Corinthians 9:2).

From the very beginning the Corinthians were accustomed to those demonstrations which constituted divine credentials, confirming the apostolic message as of heavenly origin. All truth must be rendered credible before it can be believed. Credibility can be established only by evidence. Natural truths may be sustained by natural evidence, but supernatural truth requires supernatural validation. So Paul reminded the Corinthians "The signs of a true apostle were performed among you in all patience, with signs and wonders and mighty works" (2 Corinthians 12:12).

When the apostle was forced to move on to other fields of labor at the call of the Spirit, he did not leave the Corinthians without divine assistance, but conferred upon them gifts of speech and knowledge, in the same manner he had confirmed his own proclamation. "In every way you were enriched in him with all speech and all knowledge— even as the testimony to Christ was confirmed among you— so that you are not lacking in any spiritual gift, as you wait for the revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ who will sustain you to the end" (1 Corinthians 1:5-8).

Unfortunately, those who were invested with the gifts became proud of their possession, and began to abuse them by diverting them from their true purpose. It became necessary for Paul to recall them to a more responsible attitude. We dare not rejoice over their malpractice, but we can still benefit from what was said in correcting the error, and we must not forget to profit by their mistakes.

It is interesting to note that Paul began the section of the Corinthian letter relating to spiritual gifts with the words, "Now concerning spiritual gifts, brethren, I would not have you ignorant" (1 Corinthians 12:1; KJV). The word "gifts" is not in the original, and a literal rendering would probably be "spiritual things"; however, the information that follows leaves no doubt that the subject is the special endowments, that is, the gifts of the Spirit.

The expression "I would not have you ignorant" points up the fact that acquisition of knowledge in matters of the Spirit is the will of Him who sent the Spirit. The same expression is used with reference to things, such as Paul's purpose and intention with regard to Rome (Romans 1:13), the persecution suffered because of his preaching in Asia Minor (2 Corinthians 1:8), God's design as related to Israel (Romans 11:25), and the resurrection of the sleeping saints (1 Thessalonians 4:13). When God furnishes information, refusal to learn is inexcusable.

Obviously, God does not want us to continue with unused mental capacities. Ignorance is not bliss! It is also apparent that if God does not want us to be ignorant about a subject, the information He supplies will be adequate. An examination of the revelation related to spiritual gifts will show that we are supplied facts concerning their origin, variety, purpose, function, and regulation.

It is important to remember that the dispelling of ignorance concerning spiritual gifts was not left to those who had the gifts, but as assumed by the apostle who put it in writing. The Corinthians came behind in no gift, but "to one (was) given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit" (1 Corinthians 12:8; KJV). If the gifts were self-validating and instructive, the Corinthian congregation would have required no apostolic letter upon the subject. Yet, to this congregation the written message was sent. Hence those who would not be ignorant concerning spiritual gifts should turn to the apostolic letter for instruction and guidance. The saints in Corinth who possessed the gifts were ignorant of their purpose and function, otherwise this portion of the letter was superfluous.

After declaring he would not have them ignorant about spiritual gifts, Paul wrote, "Ye know that ye were Gentiles, carried away unto these dumb idols, even as ye were led" (v. 2; KJV). The real problem at Corinth was created by those who had the gift of speaking various kinds of tongues. They had exercised this gift in such a manner that unbelievers dropping in upon the assembly could have concluded they were insane.

The Corinthians had been idolaters, having grown up in a pagan culture. The apostle mentions that they had been carried away to dumb idols. Graven images could not speak. Molten gods could provide no message or revelation. But the living God could not only reveal His thoughts, but could also empower His servants to convey His words in "other tongues." So overjoyed were the former heathen that theirs was a speaking God, they could hardly restrain themselves.

Men respond according to the spirit that motivates them. In 1 Corinthians 2:12, the apostle contrasts the spirit of that age with the Spirit of God. The Corinthians had paid homage to dumb idols even as they had been led. The spirit of the decadent age influenced them in their devotion, but Paul gave them to understand that no one "speaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jesus accursed: and that no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Corinthians 12:3; KJV).

To say that Jesus is Lord constituted a much more serious responsibility in the Roman Empire than it does today. Rome was regarded as tolerant of the religious beliefs of the provinces, and well she might be, because she regarded them all as harmless superstition. While this was true, one thing was required. Annually, on the birthday of the emperor, every citizen had to appear in the marketplace before the bust of Caesar, burn a pinch of incense, and publicly affirm "Caesar is lord." This presented no particular problem to the pagans who believed in a multiplicity of deities. The Roman Senate had officially elevated Caesar to the pantheon and declared him to be divine. His character, while certainly not godlike, was like that of the other gods.

The one group in the Empire whose members could not freely join the populace in hailing Caesar was the community of the reconciled. The apostle states the problem clearly: "There be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many,) but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him" (1 Corinthians 8:5, 6; KJV). The problem was complicated by another requirement of any person brought under suspicion. If an accusation was filed against him concerning his faith in Caesar, the magistrates were to bring him before the statue and demand a public affirmation under penalty of death or banishment from family and friends. If the accused was suspected of belonging to the despised followers of Christ, he was required, in addition to his affirmation of the lordship of Caesar, to announce, "Anathema Jesus," that is, "Jesus is accursed." So to say that Jesus was Lord might well be a matter of life and death. Preserved for us is a remarkable document alluding to this very matter, a letter written by Pliny the Younger to the Emperor Trajan, near the beginning of the second century. Pliny was appointed governor of Bithynia. Never having had to cope with the problem of Christians, he wrote to gain information as to the proper procedure to follow. If you have not read his letter it will be interesting to do so. Here it is:

> Having never been present at any trials of the Christians, I am unacquainted as to the methods and limits to be observed in examining and punishing them. Whether, therefore, any difference is to be made with respect to age, or no distinction is to be observed between the young and adult; whether repentance admits to a pardon; or if a man has been once a Christian, it avails him nothing to recant; whether the mere profession of Christianity, albeit without any criminal act, or only the crimes associated therewith are punishable; in all these points I am greatly doubtful. In the meanwhile the method I have observed towards those who have been denounced to me as Christians, is this; I interrogated them whether they were Christians; if they confessed I repeated the question twice again, adding a threat of capital punishment; if they still persevered, I ordered them to be executed. For I was persuaded, that whatever the nature of their creed, a contumacious and inflexible obstinacy certainly deserved chastisement. There were others also brought before me possessed with the same infatuation; but being citizens of Rome, I directed them to be carried thither.

These accusations, from the mere fact that the matter was being investigated, began to spread, and several forms of the mischief came to light. A placard was posted up without any signature, accusing a number of people by name. Those who denied that they were Christians, or had ever been so, who repeated after me an invocation to the gods, and offered religious rites with wine and frankincense to your statue (which I had ordered to be brought for the purpose, together with those of the gods), and finally cursed the name of Christ (none of which it is said, those who are really Christians can be forced into performing), I thought it proper to discharge. Others who were named by the informer, at first confessed themselves Christians, and then denied it; true, they had been of that persuasion formerly, but had now quitted it (some three years, others many years, and a few as much as twenty-five years ago). They all worshiped your statue, and the images of the gods, and cursed the name of Christ.[8]

It was for just such a crisis that the Spirit was given as Comforter, an inner source of strength, so that men might glorify Christ in death as well as in life. When Jesus promised to send the Spirit He said, "He will glorify me." Caesar had his legions willing to die with his name upon their lips, and if the Lord of life could not trust those who had enlisted under the banner of faith to do the same, His cause was lost. Thus, the acclamation "Jesus is Lord," while the Roman lictors stood guard ready to flay the flesh from the body with their rods, or to sever the head with the axe, was not only a test of one's faith in the lordship of Jesus, but a proof of the indwelling Spirit. Men act according to the spirit that motivates them.

No man speaking by the Spirit of God would say

"anathema Jesus," as even the Roman governor of Bithynia bore witness. Neither could a man make the public declaration that Jesus is the Lord except by the help of the Spirit who dwelt in him. It is interesting to note that the term "Spirit of God" is here used interchangeably with "Holy Spirit."

After this introduction the apostle affirms that various gifts and functions were to be performed by their use, but all of these had a common origin. "There are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit" (1 Corinthians 12:4). The whole tenor of the chapter is the unity that should prevail in the body of Christ. Inasmuch as the body must supply many needs and perform diverse functions, gifts were imparted of such a number and nature as to enable the body to fulfill its mission. God is a divine economist. He did not create needs and then supply gifts to meet them but needs existed and He created gifts to meet them.

We can be certain that the saints did not lack anything essential to their fulfilling their role upon earth. We can be just as sure that every gift was to be utilized in such a manner as to edify or build up the whole. The exercise of the gifts must not be divisive, for the Spirit is one. Nine gifts are mentioned, and these were given to encourage and stimulate the body to act as God had ordained.

"There are varieties of service, but the same Lord" (v. 5). The original term for "service" is diakonia, sometimes translated "ministry." This may be misleading in our day when ministry is regarded as the domain of one man hired by a congregation as its minister. No such specialized meaning was applied to it by the apostles. Every Christian is a minister, and every form of service is part of the ministry. Various ministries are to be carried out and each is essential and commissioned by the same Lord.

"And there are varieties of working, but it is the same God who inspires them all in every one" (v. 6). God works in His saints, Christ directs the work into meaningful forms of service, and the Spirit empowers and enables the saints to fulfill their varied tasks. A difference exists between the Holy Spirit, Christ, and God, and yet a profound unity is involved in them. Surely the Spirit is as much a divine personality as the other two.

One of the most beautiful statements of Paul is his closing sentence to the Corinthians, in 2 Corinthians 13:14. The setting lends interest to the reading. He pointed out that if he should return to Corinth he would not spare any of those who had sinned. His stated intention was to give full proof to all who questioned that Christ was speaking through him. He held forth the hope that the Corinthians would abstain from evil, not because of a desire to gain approval for his own work, but to establish their own moral integrity. He urged them to be "perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace shall be with you" (2 Corinthians 13:11; KJV).

In spite of the agonizing problems in the congregation, the apostle concludes with the words that have often been repeated as a benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen" (v. 14). The breakdown of these three blessings is important. It was not by accident that the various attributes were credited as they were.

"Grace" is a good example of a term into which the Spirit breathed and infused new life. The result is that any attempt to define it serves only to confine it. Our verbal garb acts as a straitjacket. The consequence is that many who parrot a definition think they understand grace, when all they do is to underestimate it. Grace is not so much to be explained as to be experienced. God is not so much concerned that we experience a share of grace as He is that we share in the experience of grace. That experience relates to the eternal purpose from the moment of its inception and on through the ages of ages. As is so often the case, a study of the derivation constitutes the best definition, for the evolution of the term made it a "vessel fit for the Master's use." In the beginning, charis referred to charm, an inner quality resulting in what we refer to as personal magnetism or admirable skill. That kind of concern for others manifested itself in proper decorum under all circumstances, politeness, and deference mingled with understanding of others. We revert to this original use when we speak of those who possess charisma, that attractiveness which draws others to them. It is what we mean when we speak of a graceful person, or one who is gracious.

With the passing of time charis took on a deeper meaning. The quality the word described was not attained by study or striving, but seemed to be inherent. It was thus assumed to be a gift of the gods, enabling certain individuals to stand out from the multitude. The sculptor whose skill could draw forth figures from marble was said to posses a charism for carving. The orator whose use of words was powerful enough to make men alternately laugh and weep was thought to possess the charism of speech or rhetoric. We still speak of persons who are gifted in the same manner.

C*harisma* seemed to be present in an individual from earliest childhood, before he had exerted any effort to secure it. Thus the ancients deemed that it was a gift of a god, unearned and undeserved, empowering one to fulfill the purpose for which destiny had marked him out. Any failure to fulfill the responsibility entailed by the gift was an insult to the deity that bestowed the gift.

By the time Jesus came to earth the word charis had come to refer to an undeserved gift, bestowed by a deity, for the purpose of helping to fulfill the ideal of the gods among men. It is no wonder that the Spirit adopted a term so pregnant with meaning and endowed it with a richness it never before possessed. From a gift bestowed by an imaginary god it came to mean that quality in the living God which motivated Him to share himself with sinful men.

Grace reached its apex in Jesus, who emptied himself and took on the form of a slave that He might share in the life of men doomed to die. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ is not simply something that He gave to men or bestowed upon them. It embraces the whole arrangement by which He agreed to abide with us in our suffering that we might someday share in His glory. The greatest gift of Jesus to the world is himself.

In direct conjunction with the grace of Christ is mentioned the love of God. It is a philosophic question whether grace was prompted by love, or love by grace. It is true that the important thing is to be recipients of these blessings whether or not one ever has a clear concept of their metaphysical relationship. My personal conviction is that grace grows out of and is a fruit of love. This is based upon the fact that God is love. This is His essence. Grace is the benevolence applying that love to fallen man. It is God's moving into the human realm and sharing himself without restraint or limitation.

"Love" is our translation of agape (ah-gah-pay), one of four words for love found in the Greek language. The others were too limited in scope and nature to be employed in describing the love God had for us and we must have for one another. Agape is not a classical word, and was not found in the writings of the great philosophers. Why did the Spirit select it and reject the others? One reason is that the other terms generally describe an emotion. They have to do with an involuntary feeling of the heart. Emotions are spontaneous reactions to situations or conditions. They require no conscious effort and do not occur as a result of our searching or seeking. They belong to the heart and its passions.

Agape is not an emotion, although it involves the emotions. It is a state resulting from an act of will a deliberate choice of the mind. One cannot speak of "falling in love" when talking about agape, because it is not something into which you tumble. It is a vital, active principle of life. There is a difference between falling when you cannot help it, and stooping down to share the lot of another. Jesus did not become the Son of man because He fell in love with us, for He did not fall at all. Because He loved us He stooped down to participate with us in the human predicament.

Agape represents an achievement of the mind, a victory attained by determination. It is a conquest over one's nature. This is obvious when it is realized that no one can love his enemies until selfishness is vanquished and he has conquered every natural inclination and desire.

Other forms of love see the good or value in a person or thing and love because of it. Agape creates its own sense of values by the very act or process of loving. Under other kinds of love a thing is loved because of its value; in agape it is valued because it is loved. God loved us when we were alienated and hostile, hating Him and hating one another. Nothing in us was loving or lovable, but because we were loved we were made deserving. "God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Romans 5:8; KJV).

Agape, like charis, can never be fully defined in words developed for human communication. To reduce it to words is to imprison it in a finite conception. In the very act of imprisoning it, it escapes us. All that we can do is to create a working statement by which we will be able to measure our own concept of love, rather than measuring love itself. My own rather feeble mental approach to it can be stated as follows: Agape is that active and beneficent goodwill which stops at nothing to serve the good of the beloved object.

Love bestowed to elicit or receive a response is prompted more by the need of the giver than the receiver. It is not a benefaction, but an investment. Noteworthy is the fact that love originated with One who had no need and is always outgoing toward those whose needs are great. We are told that God is love, but we are also told that "love is of God."

The love we share for others is not really our love at all. We become channels for the love of God. The water flowing through the pipes into our homes does not belong to the conduits through which it is pumped. Likewise the love flowing like a fountain through us is not ours. It is poured out into our hearts by the Holy Spirit.

This brings us to the third item in the benediction to the saints at Corinth: the communion of the Holy Spirit. Remember that it is connected with the majestic terms, grace and love. This very association is indicative of the manner in which God regards it. Grace, love, and fellowship— these constitute a triad of blessings associated with the greatest names in the universe. It is a matter of great importance that the apostle closes his epistle to the distressed and distressful congregation at Corinth with such a benediction.

The word here for "communion" is *koinonia, generally translated "fellowship." Most lexicographers agree, however, that it is a word of such depth that no single English term can exhaust its meaning. This becomes evident when we realize the variety of terms for it occurring in the *King James Version. The root word means "common," indicating something shared or held in common. From it we derive such words as "community."

What is the fellowship of the Spirit? Certainly it is not something men attain or achieve by their own merit or efforts. Just as grace is bestowed by Christ and love is bestowed by God, so fellowship is a gift of the Spirit. We share in grace, love, and life as blessings from Heaven. The very best definition of fellowship is "the sharing of a common life," and the New English Bible so translates *koinonia.

The fellowship, or communion, of which the apostle writes is not the mere participation with others in common pursuits. Men may pool their resources and combine their efforts without recourse to the Spirit at all. History is filled with misguided attempts of atheistic social reformers to create colonies where the name of God was proscribed and reading of the Bible was prohibited. The common life in which we are to share is the life of the Spirit.

To substitute the term "share the life of the Spirit" for the term "communion (fellowship) of the Spirit" still does not answer the question as to what is meant by, or involved in, the life of the Spirit. In the New Covenant Scriptures the word koinonia is found twenty times. It is rendered "fellowship" twelve times in the King James Version, which also translates it "communion" four times. Of the twelve times it is translated "fellowship," one-third of these occur in 1 John 1. In this chapter we gain a glimpse of the common life in which we participate through the Spirit. John begins the chapter by an affirmation regarding the living Word, that is, the Word of life. He asserts that this Word was manifested, or embodied, and that the apostles had visual, audible, and manual proof of His existence upon the earth. They had heard Him, seen Him, and touched Him.

The life of the Word was eternal life, and when the apostles gazed upon the Son of God they saw eternal life incarnated. "We have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us" (1 John 1:2; KJV). Three actions are referred to in this statement. The first was personal experience, and experience of the best kind. "We have seen." This provides eyewitness testimony. The second is public proclamation of the testimony, bearing witness to the world. The third is declaration to the saints for their edification and comfort. That which was manifested to the apostles was life, and that which they proclaimed to the saints was life. But it was not simply existence, it was life that had been with the Father, the God-life now shared with men in a bodily manifestation. This is important because it demonstrates that Christ came in order to show that eternal life can dwell in man even now.

The next statement of the apostle is significant, and yet few catch the significance of it. "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship (koinonia) with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (v. 3). The use of the word "fellowship" obscures the real meaning to modern minds, although the first-century disciples would have understood it.

Paul is clearly saying that the eternal life with the Father has now been embodied in a Son. Those who were called as His envoys have been made shareholders in this eternal life. The purpose of their testimony was that those who heard might share in the same common life with them, since the life in which they participated was with the Father and the Son. The Spirit not only operates upon our hearts through the good news to bring us into the life-sharing relationship, but dwells in our hearts in order to maintain that life within us. Just as there is no physical life without the spirit of man, so there is no spiritual life without the Spirit of God. "The Spirit is life because of righteousness" (Romans 8:10; KJV). The activating principle of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus makes us free from the law of sin and death.

Much is involved in the phrase, "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus." This frees us from condemnation, and liberates us from fear, including even the fear of death. The life is in the Son. On this matter there can be no quibbling. "In Him was life; and the life was the light of men" (John 1:4). "I am the way, and the truth, and the life" (John 14:6). It follows, then, that one who has the Son has life, and this is exactly what we are taught (1 John 5:11, 12).

To share in the life of the Spirit is to participate in eternal life, a transcendent personal relationship with God and Christ.

The one God, the one Lord, and the one Spirit join in bestowing upon us grace, love, and eternal life. No greater gifts could possibly be offered to men in the flesh. No greater responsibility could be ours than to cherish and use these gifts to the glory of the Father. No more beautiful expression or benediction could be employed in closing a letter than that in which Paul closes his epistle to the Corinthians.

In this chapter it was pointed out that the Holy Spirit is in constant association with the Father and the Son. While different functions are peculiar to each, there is a divine harmony apparent in their relationships. It is not essential to faith that we understand all of the intricate workings of God, or that we comprehend in its fulness the spiritual realm. We have the testimony of God, and upon the basis of that evidence, we accept the personality and divinity of the Spirit.

Where Is the Spirit?

Contents

We have arrived at that point in our study of the Holy Spirit where we can investigate His actions toward men and the effect of their attitudes upon those actions. Many questions arise in the minds of those who seriously ponder these matters. How has the Spirit acted toward the unsaved to bring them into covenant relationship with God? Can such persons resist the Spirit, or are they plastic in His grasp, and changed without their own consent? What about His actions toward those who have been reconciled to God, delivered from the domain of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son? Can they subdue and sublimate the Spirit, or render Him ineffective in their lives? In this last relationship we will learn that the Father has not abandoned us. We are not left simply to our own devices, but possess a divine Assistant, dwelling within our bodies and strengthening us in the warfare against evil. This is the basis of our hope.

When the apostle Paul was warning against immorality he predicated his solemn charge upon two grounds: the immoral man sins against his own body, and the Holy Spirit abides in that body. To sin against the body is to sin against the abode God has purchased and ordained for the Spirit. "Shun immorality. Every other sin which a man commits is outside the body; but the immoral man sins against his own body. Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God? You are not your own; you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body" (1 Corinthians 6:18-20).

The Greeks had two words for "temple." Both are used in the Scriptures, but a distinction is made between them. Hieron designated the whole sacred enclosure and its precincts, including the outer courts, porches, and subordinate buildings. The other word *naos, the one here employed, referred only to the Holy Place and Holy of Holies, the heart of the hallowed complex, and the dwelling-place of the Most High. Jesus taught inside the hieron in Jerusalem, but never entered the *naos. Access to this was restricted to members of the priesthood, the tribe of Levi.

The only sanctuary God has on earth today is the consecrated human heart. He does not dwell in temples made with hands, and when men speak of material buildings as sanctuaries they use language that is not a part of the New Covenant concept. The heart of a man, like the heart of the temple, is the naos where God meets with him, and where the Spirit abides. It is interesting to remember that the word hieron is not once used metaphorically to designate the present dwelling of God. It is not the surroundings, but the heart, which is sanctified.

The temple of old in Jerusalem was erected as a place in which God's glory was manifested. During its dedication, "the house of the Lord, was filled with a cloud, so that the priests could not stand to minister because of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house of God" (2 Chronicles 5:13, 14). That same glory floods the inner recesses of the bodies of the sanctified today, those who have been bought with a price, and they should glorify God in their bodies and spirits.

Under the first covenant, the worshiper had to go up to the house of the Lord. Now he is the house of the Lord. Then, each man had to take his offering to the priest, but now each man is a priest bringing an offering. Then, the Spirit was given to a select few to reveal God's will, now the Spirit is bestowed upon all those persons who have responded to that revelation.

That the Spirit sustains a personal relationship is indicated by the fact the He may be grieved. "And do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God, in whom you were sealed for the day of redemption" (Ephesians 4:30). Grief, a feeling or emotion, involves mental anguish, sorrow, or regret. That the Spirit can suffer from our offences or grieve because of our actions is proof of His personality. One cannot grieve a mere influence.

How can the Spirit be grieved? The context intimates that He may be offended by hurtful, vile, or filthy language. The preceding statement is, "Let no evil talk come out of your mouths, but only such as is good for edifying, as fits the occasion, that it may impart grace to those who hear" (v. 29). The succeeding statement shows we may grieve Him by our attitude toward the other saints. "Let all bitterness and wrath and anger and clamor and slander be put away from you, with all malice" (v. 31).

The Spirit dwells in every person who is a member of the one body, and one member's speaking evil of or insulting another constitutes an assault upon the abode of the Spirit. In view of the anger, clamor, and slander, so prevalent in our day in communities of the saved, it is apparent that the Spirit must be often and deeply grieved. To employ filthy and obscene speech is to bring sadness to the Spirit, one of whose purposes in our lives is to cleanse and purify the inner temple.

In addition to one's grieving the Spirit, it is possible to lie to Him. This is evident in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, and is attested to by the apostle Peter. The original congregation of saints in Jerusalem included many widows within its fold. All of the members were Jews, among whom the synagogues always cared for their widows with special concern. A voluntary arrangement was introduced among the saints whereby those who wanted to could sell their real estate and chattels and deposit the receipts with the apostles. The apostles then purchased and distributed a daily allotment of food, paid for from the fund that was created under this agreement.

There was no compulsion to sell, and even those who did so were not obligated to bring the price and deliver it to the apostles. Ananias and his wife, perhaps motivated by a desire for praise, entered into a conspiracy. They would sell their land for a certain sum, retaining part of it for themselves while giving the remainder in such a way that it would create the impression it was the full amount (Acts 5:1-10). Ananias came into the place where the apostles were, only to be greeted by Peter with the question, "'Ananias, why has Satan filled your heart to lie to the Holy Spirit and to keep back part of the proceeds of the land?'" (Acts 5:3). He then informed the culprit that he had not lied to men, but to God. When he heard this accusation, Ananias dropped to the floor dead.

His wife, Sapphira, came in three hours later, not having been informed of the death of her husband. She was asked if the sum contributed was the full payment received for the land. She declared that it was, whereupon Peter asked, "'How is it that you have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord?'" (Acts 5:9). Peter did not accuse them of lying about the Spirit, but to the Spirit. In so doing they tempted, or tried, the Spirit, and paid for it with their lives. If one can grieve, falsify to, and try the patience and knowledge of the Spirit, surely the Spirit is a divine personality.

The Holy Spirit can be resisted as He strives through the testimony revealed to men of God to bring the hearers into subjection to the divine will. This is clearly shown in the situation surrounding the death of Stephen, the first martyr to the Christian faith. The story is recorded in Acts 6 and 7. Stephen was a Hellenist, described as a man full of faith and the Holy Spirit. He did great wonders and miracles in Jerusalem in confirmation of his message concerning the Messiah. His effectiveness in making converts aroused the bitter ire of other foreign-born Jews living in the city and maintaining their synagogues. Their public disputes with him ended in a debacle for their cause and served only to impress the hearers with his wisdom and power. Unable to vanquish him in a debate, they resorted to other means, hiring men to accuse him of blasphemy against Moses and God. This crime was punishable by death, until Rome removed the right to execute from Palestinian nationals. In the tension then existing, however, a mob was formed, which surrounded and captured Stephen and hustled him away to the place where the Sanhedrin met, under the presidency of the high priest. False witnesses were paid to make accusation to the effect that they had heard him constantly blaspheme the holy city and the law. In support of this it was alleged that Stephen had distinctly announced more than once that Jesus of Nazareth would destroy the place and alter the law Moses had given. In accordance with the legal procedure of the council, the high priest asked the accused man, "Are these allegations true?"

Stephen made a masterful speech in defense. In reply to the first charge he affirmed that wherever God met with man it was a holy place, in proof of which he cited numerous cases to show that the greatest events in Jewish history took place outside of Palestine and Jerusalem. God appeared to Abraham in Chaldea, and to Joseph in Egypt. He called Moses at the burning bush in Midian, and distinctly told him to remove his shoes because the place was holy ground. The law itself was given at Sinai in the wilderness, not in Jerusalem.

Stephen further reminded them that when Solomon dedicated the temple he declared, "Yet the Most High does not dwell in houses made with hands" (Acts 7:48). The Lord had asserted, "Heaven is my throne, and earth my footstool" (v. 49). So the universe was hallowed, and one spot was no more sacred than another except as the lives of men made it so.

In answering the charge that he had blasphemed the law, Stephen recalled that even while Moses was up in the mount to receive the law, their fathers made a calf and offered sacrifices to it, rejoicing in the works of their hands (v. 41). He accused those present of receiving a law by the disposition of angels which they had never kept and were even then disobeying.

The climax of the address was reached in the impassioned words, "'You stiff-necked people, uncircumcised in heart and ears, you always resist the Holy Spirit. As your fathers did, so do you'" (Acts 7:51). To enforce the truth of this charge he demanded that they name one prophet who had not been persecuted by their ancestors. He declared that the fathers had killed those who had predicted the coming of the Messiah, and the very ones now sitting before him had betrayed and murdered that Messiah when He came.

The sequel is well known. Members of what ordinarily was a stately gathering completely lost their composure. Screaming to drown out any further words from the speaker, and placing their hands over their ears, they converged upon him to silence him. Shoving him along, they hastened him outside the city limits, and, temporarily forgetting the ban on killing imposed by their Roman overlords, they stoned him to death.

It is apparent that stubborn disregard for the words spoken by the ambassadors of the Spirit constitutes resistance to the Spirit. This was true in ancient times when God's men spoke as the Holy Spirit motivated them. "In many and various ways God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets" (Hebrews 1:1). This same God had also revealed to his "holy apostles and prophets" the mystery of Christ (Ephesians 3:5). To resist this message with unconsecrated heart and ears is to resist the Holy Spirit.

Some students of the Scriptures have suggested that the book we call "Acts of the Apostles" should have been named

"Acts of the Holy Spirit." True, it does not contain all the acts of all the apostles, nor even all the acts of some of the apostles. It does record some of the acts of some of the apostles, but these men acted under the guidance and supervision of the Spirit. The direct assistance of the Spirit was not limited to the twelve. A good example is the case of Philip. He was one of the seven selected to relieve the apostles of daily distributing food to the many widows in the community of saints in Jerusalem. When violent persecution broke out against the church after the death of Stephen, it became necessary for the disciples to flee for safety to the country districts of Judea and Samaria, where they proclaimed with zeal the good news.

Philip entered into one of the cities of Samaria and announced the news of the Messiah with such accompanying demonstrations of power that the crowds listened eagerly to what Philip said, and there was great joy in that city (Acts 8:5-8). Under normal human arrangements Philip would have remained there to consolidate his remarkable success, but God had other plans for him.

Accordingly, the angel of the Lord instructed Philip to leave the city and travel southward to the road that led from Jerusalem toward Gaza. This former Philistine stronghold had long since been deserted. When he arrived at the highway junction, Philip caught sight of an Ethiopian reading from a scroll while riding in his chariot. At this point the Holy Spirit entered the picture by instructing Philip to "Go and join this chariot." Philip did so, and was used of the Spirit to clarify Scriptural matters that the Ethiopian government official did not understand.

When the man was satisfied that Jesus was the Messiah of whom the prophets had spoken, he asked what was to prevent him from being baptized. He ordered the chariot to stop, the two of them went down into the water, and Philip baptized him. The record is explicit at this point. "When they came up out of the water, the Spirit of the Lord caught up Philip; and the eunuch saw him no more" (Acts 8:39). One cannot help wondering about the reaction of the man when his recent companion disappeared, but he recovered and went happily on his way.

This indicates that the Spirit, who knows the hearts of men, operated to bring together one who knew the message and the other who needed it, was ready for it, and was honest enough to accept it. When the task was accomplished in a certain place or with a certain person, the messenger was removed. Philip, snatched away suddenly from the presence of the Ethiopian royal treasurer, appeared next in Azotus, passing through and preaching in all the cities until he reached Caesarea (Acts 8:40).

An even more interesting account of the direct activity of the Spirit in bringing together one who knew the good news and those who were eager to hear it is recorded in Acts 10. One cannot fully appreciate this account unless he remembers that until this time the good news has been shared with Jews and proselytes only. Even the Samaritans, although they were generally despised by the orthodox Jews, were circumcised, and they revered the Pentateuch, the writings of Moses.

Now the time had come to fulfill the divine goal of uniting Jews and Gentiles in one body through the Spirit. The first non-Jew chosen was Cornelius, a Roman centurion in the Italian cohort. We are told that Cornelius was a religious man, acknowledged as good and just by the whole Jewish nation (Acts 10:22). The Jew chosen to take the message was Simon Peter, a strict adherent of kosher regulations throughout his life.

After thorough investigation of the details, the story is exceptionally interesting. Cornelius, stationed at Caesarea, the headquarters for the Roman occupational forces, prayed regularly. One afternoon, while engaged in private devotions, he saw an angel who informed him that his prayers and acts of charity were recognized by God. He was told to send to Joppa for a man named Simon, who was also called Peter.

As soon as the angel vanished, Cornelius began to carry out the order. He summoned two household servants and a military orderly and sent them to Joppa to bring Peter back with them.

At noontime the next day, while the three men were entering the city, Peter went up on the roof to pray. He became hungry, and while the household staff was preparing food he fell into a trance. In these words Luke describes what Peter envisioned: He saw "heaven opened, and something descending, like a great sheet, let down by four corners upon the earth. In it were all kinds of animals and reptiles and birds of the air. And there came a voice to him, 'Rise, Peter; kill and eat.' But Peter said, 'No, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean'" (Acts 10:11-14).

The voice came twice more and Peter made the same protest. Then the whole thing was taken up again into the sky. Immediately Peter came out of the trance, bewildered about the implications of the vision. At this very time, the three messengers, who had been inquiring about the location of the house came to the front entrance and called out to ask if Simon Peter was there. The Holy Spirit told Peter to arise from where he was sitting and trying to figure out the vision, and go down to the ground floor. He further told Peter to accompany the three men who were asking for him, and to go without reluctance. He said, "I have sent them." In this instance the Spirit specifically sent messengers to locate a man with the message, then dispatched him with the messengers.

This did not end the direct involvement of the Spirit in the case of Cornelius. When Peter arrived at the home of Cornelius, he found relatives and friends of Cornelius awaiting him. After proper introduction Peter began to speak to them and now Peter recognized the meaning of the vision on the housetop. He knew now that it indicated that God was no respecter of persons, that national and ethnic differences no longer had any relevance. As Peter began to speak about Jesus of Nazareth, and reached the point where he said, "Whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins" (v. 43; KJV), the Holy Spirit fell upon all those who heard.

Peter brought with him six Jewish brethren, who were utterly astonished when they heard the Gentiles begin to speak in tongues and to praise and glorify God. They realized that the Holy Spirit had been present and poured out upon the Gentiles as a gift. Peter asked, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" (v. 47; KJV). He commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord. Henceforth, there would be one body, composed of both Jews and Gentiles.

It is indicated by what we have thus far studied that the Spirit personally directed how and when men should act in the formative stage of the community of the redeemed. He sometimes directed an envoy to contact one who was ready for the saving truth, and other occasions sent men to find a proclaimer of the good news. At other times He barred the way into certain localities for those who had planned to infiltrate those places with the message.

One example of this will suffice. When Paul and Silas traveled through Syria and Cilicia, strengthening the congregations, they crossed over the Taurus Range, into the plains of Asia Minor. It was their intent, having labored in Phrygia and Galatia, to enter the province designated as Asia, but Luke records that they were forbidden by the Holy Spirit to do so (Acts 16:6). In view of this they skirted the area and started northward expecting to go into Bithynia, a region where a number of Diasporan Jews were to be found. Again they were thwarted because the Holy Spirit would not permit them to enter (Acts 16:7).

We can only surmise the reason for the circumvention of these plans. We do know that they came to Troas, where Paul had a vision in which a European citizen appeared and asked him to come into Macedonia and help them. A new continent was thus opened to the apostolic proclamation. The whole Grecian peninsula heard the message, and men and women rejoiced in the hope of the knowledge of Christ Jesus.

While we are thinking in terms of the action of the Spirit and the result of the attitudes of people toward such action, we should give attention to two other matters: quenching and blaspheming the Spirit. The second of these is in a category requiring special attention and will be reserved for the next chapter. We will conclude this segment of our study with a few observations about quenching the Holy Spirit.

The pointed admonition, "Do not quench the Spirit," occurs in 1 Thessalonians 5:19. The context may indicate that it relates to an attempt to restrain or inhibit those who possess special gifts of the Spirit. It may likewise refer to quelling the Spirit within oneself, not allowing Him free rein or control. The statement occurs just before another in the same vein which says, "Despise not prophesyings." Prophecy was one of the special gifts mentioned in 1 Corinthians 12:10.

The word "quench" is ordinarily employed to signify smothering or extinguishing a fire. It is an appropriate term in view of the fact that the Spirit is sometimes spoken of as a flame or fire, and, paradoxically, as water. Thus the Spirit may be both kindled and poured out, depending upon the metaphor used at the time. A good example is found in 2 Timothy 1:6 where the young evangelist is told to stir up the gift of God which he possessed. The verb, in common use in the days of Paul, meant to rekindle, or renew a blaze, by poking and rearranging coals.

A fire may be quenched by any one of several methods. One may pour water upon it until it turns into dead coals and no longer flames up. Few of us need to be reminded of the occasions when we have seen someone, with intensity of purpose and zeal, completely squelched by constant rejection of his ideas and proposals. Many young Christians, and not a few older ones, have been driven to indifference by the constant reminder, "It will not work."

Again, a fire may be quenched by smothering it with noncombustible materials. In the parable of the sower, Jesus speaks of the seed falling among thorns. The quality of the seed was as high as that upon good ground, but the problem was that the thorns sprang up and choked it. The thorns are identified as the anxieties and pressures of the age in which we live, the deceitfulness of riches, and the lust of other things. It has often been assumed that the thicket of briers represented what is sometimes referred to as "the pleasures of life." It is true that one may become obsessed with recreation and sports, and we even use the word "fan," which is an abbreviation for fanatic, to describe such a person. But Jesus did not have this in mind at all.

Many of His hearers were hard pressed to survive in a land occupied by their Roman military masters. Few indeed had time to play or indulge in idle pastime. The "cares of this world" refer to the over-anxiety for food and clothing, and for the security mistakenly thought to reside in things. A subtile form of doubt besets those who think they have faith, when their faith is a trust in their own power and ability to become a success by piling up treasures on earth. Jesus condemned this lack of real faith. Nothing else tends to stifle the Spirit in one's life as does the attitude of those who would be rich in this world's goods.

A third way to quench a fire is simply to neglect it. One does not expect a fireplace to flame up, glow, and send forth heat from the fuel supplied it a week ago. There must be constant replenishment or else the fire will go out. One of the chief causes of failure is the "neglect of so great salvation," as the writer of Hebrews refers to it. Unless we regularly read the Word of God and pray, we will fail to survive. Yesterday's worship is like yesterday's warmth. It was welcome and stimulating at the time, but it will not warm the heart today.

A man who had once been a faithful follower of Jesus, but who had lapsed into unconcern and indifference, said, "I did not really deny the faith. I simply allowed it to slip away from me." The Badlands National Monument is an example of what can happen through erosion. Gradually through the centuries, land that once sustained an abundance of animal life by its growth in rich topsoil, began to erode until now it is a startling monument of waste and unproductiveness. So it is with many lives that once strengthened others, but are now badlands of apathy and ungodliness.

To quench the Spirit is to allow the purpose and meaning of life to burn low within. The personality becomes cold and hardened, and only the ashes remain to remind the world of a once warm spiritual being.

What Is the Sin Against the Spirit?

Contents

A perennial question for all who speak about the Holy Spirit is that of blasphemy, or sin against the Holy Spirit. The words of Jesus concerning all kinds of transgressions have been picked to pieces in order to identify what is popularly referred to as "the unpardonable sin." The result is that modern radio preachers have come up with a number of different "sins" to which this designation is applied. It is obvious they cannot all be correct, and it is possible none of them are. The consistent listener might almost be led to think the unforgivable sin is one's failure to send a contribution to the preachers.

When Jesus used the expression, "blasphemy against the Spirit," He did so in contrast with "every sin and blasphemy." His words were, "'Every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven'" (Matthew 12:31). Blasphemy is a specific sin against the Spirit as contrasted with every other sin. Integrity in interpretation demands that this fact govern any attempt at exegesis.

A widely-read expositor once took the indefensible position that deliberate murder of a Christian constituted the sin against the Holy Spirit. He reasoned that the body of such a person was the temple of the Holy Spirit. The man made out an elaborate case and arranged a quantity of Scriptures in defense of his position, but several things are wrong with it. Blasphemy has nothing to do with an act of murder. Furthermore, murder can be forgiven, and was, even when perpetrated against the only begotten Son of God. On the cross Jesus prayed for those who were taking His life: "'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do'" (Luke 23:34). If their sin was unforgivable, such a prayer would have been a farce. The fact is, the prayer was answered a little more than seven weeks later, on the Day of Pentecost, in the city of Jerusalem. Peter confronted the Jews who were present, saying, "This Jesus, who did many miracles and wonders among you, you crucified and killed through lawless and merciless men" (Acts 2:22, 23). Yet, when those who heard this were stabbed by their consciences and asked what they must do, Peter replied, "'Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit'" (v. 38). The prayer of Jesus for the forgiveness of His murderers was answered when the sinners complied with the terms of forgiveness as laid down by the Father.

A preacher, who had sought without success to counsel a person of suicidal tendencies, wrote a booklet advancing the idea that suicide was the unpardonable sin. His reasoning was that the sin was premeditated, and in the commission of it the sinner cut off all opportunities for repentance. For that reason he placed himself outside the pale of forgiveness. But this is certainly not the sin about which Jesus was speaking. If suicide is an unpardonable sin, there are two such sins, rather than just one. Suicide is the taking of human life, but the degree of culpability for the act will have to be assessed by God who knows the hearts of men. Certainly the perpetrator, who is also the victim, cannot be judged by a human tribunal, although men are prone to make posthumous statements about such situations. Only God can know the mental state at the time when one takes his life. There is no ground for saying a person who commits suicide cannot be forgiven. He may be, but if this is so, it will not be because of the impossibility of forgiveness due to the nature of the act.

Perhaps the most common of all the opinions about one's sinning against the Spirit is that it is resistance against the call of the Spirit until death overtakes the sinner. There is a fallacy in this kind of rationalization, however. Certainly the Spirit operates upon the heart of the sinner through the message proclaimed, but there is a difference between resisting and blaspheming. While it is dangerous indeed to reject an appeal to commit one's life to the lordship of Jesus, the sin is not unforgivable, but unforgiven. If it were unforgivable, each person would be afforded but one opportunity to obey the gospel, and if he refused, he could never be forgiven. One who stubbornly persists in rejecting the call of God's grace will die in an unforgiven state because he dies in his sins. But his sins and stubbornness could have been forgiven at any time.

Blasphemy against the Spirit is not forgivable. It is unique, and its uniqueness lies in its nature and the object of the blasphemy. Why, then, do men ascribe so many and divergent actions to it? The answer is simple. They lift a statement out of its setting and, by isolating it from its Scriptural background, they can arbitrarily make it mean anything that seems rational to themselves. This is responsible for most of the misunderstanding in the religious realm.

None of the words of Jesus were spoken in a vacuum. None of His acts were performed by accident. Every passage of Scripture was originally given in a three-fold context of time (history), place (geography), and revelation. To ignore this context is to handle the Word of God unfairly and to reach unwarranted and unjustifiable conclusions. Let us consider what has become a thorny problem in exegesis from the Scriptural framework in which it appears.

At the time Jesus made the statement regarding the sin against the Holy Spirit, He was at the peak of His acclaim by the masses. "A great multitude from Galilee followed him, and from Judaea, and from Jerusalem, and from Idumaea, and from beyond Jordan; and they about Tyre and Sidon, a great multitude, when they had heard what great things he did, came unto him" (Mark 3:7, 8; KJV). He told the disciples to keep a boat ready, to prevent His being crushed by the crowd. The record says, "For he had healed many; insomuch that they pressed upon him for to touch him, as many as had plagues" (v. 10). Mark especially refers to the fact that when He confronted those who were possessed by demons, the evil spirits would fall at His feet and cry aloud, "You are the Son of God."

All of this had a profound impact upon the common people and they refused to be dismissed. They surged around Jesus, wondering about and discussing His claims. When Jesus entered a house, the crowd pressed in until it was impossible for the disciples to eat. To add to the general excitement, a rumor was conveyed to Nazareth that Jesus had lost His mental faculties and was acting like a crazed person. "When his friends heard of it, they went out to lay hold on him: for they said, He is beside himself" (v. 21).

Among the more interested observers of this growing influence were the Pharisees and Sadducees. Their motives for trying to check it were different, however. The Sadducees were political opportunists, compromising with Rome and seeking to curb any movement that might develop into a revolution. Such would bring down swift punishment by the Roman legions, with a consequent loss of official positions, which were always tenuous in an occupied territory.

The Pharisees were the watchdogs of orthodoxy. Their concern was that the rabble (as they regarded the people) should not be led away from the body of rabbinical tradition by which their every move in life was regulated. Jesus was attached to no sect. He was neither Pharisee, Sadducee, nor Essene. He was not a product of any rabbinical school. He was from Nazareth, a despicable city away from the great centers of learning and culture. As the Pharisees saw Him, He was a mere carpenter, a descendant of peasant stock, and a rabble-rousing miracle worker. Their chief concern was to keep Him from securing too large a following. They were willing to go to any lengths to do this. They knew the superstition and fears of the masses. Many of these no doubt resulted from an unwholesome mixture of Chaldean and Persian ideas (acquired during the exile) and legendary traditions of the rabbis.

It would hardly serve our immediate purpose to detail the often absurd fears of the people in the days of our Lord upon the earth. The Shedim, or evil spirits, lurked ever near, occupying the atmosphere, awaiting the moment to plague the unfaithful and forgetful. Whether the term Shedim is from a primitive root meaning "to fly about" or "to rebel" is now a question, but in those days men were never free from the concern that an evil spirit might move in upon them at any moment. The rabbis cautioned against certain things considered to be especially dangerous because of demons. It was unwise to walk between two palm trees growing more than six feet apart. It was improvident to borrow drinking water from a passerby, or to walk over water that had been poured out, or spilled upon the ground. The last danger could be averted by sprinkling dust upon the earth, or removing one's shoes and walking through barefoot.

Now we must give attention to another word with which our analysis must reckon: Beelzebul. There is no doubt that this is the correct term, rather than Beelzebub, for every passage of the New Covenant Scriptures in which it appears. It is probable that early translators sought to accommodate it to the Philistine term for the god of flies. Because of a somewhat kindred word in Hebrew, which means "to fertilize land with dung," some scholars have assumed that Beelzebul was "lord of dung," or, ruler of the unclean. Alfred Edersheim, the Jewish scholar, has pointed out that Zibbul actually means sacrificing to idols. Beelzebul would therefore be the same as lord or chief of idolatrous sacrificing, the worst and chief of all demons, presiding over and inciting to idolatry. Idolatry was specifically forbidden by the first two Commandments of the Decalogue. To seduce to idolatry or false worship was regarded as the ultimate in disrespect for God. To accuse one of operating by the authority or under the power of Beelzebul was to league him with the very spirit of malevolence, as opposed to all righteousness and moral goodness.

With this bit of background of the circumstances under which Jesus operated, we are ready to investigate the events that called forth His denunciation of those who blasphemed against the Holy Spirit. For the purpose of bringing consistency into the interpretation, enabling one to check the Scriptural language, the discussion will be limited mainly to the language of the *Revised Standard Version. Other renderings are used, if they make for greater clarity.

The argument is centered primarily around the accounts found in Matthew 12:22-32 and Mark 3:22-30. I am assuming that these two passages cover the same incident and speech. Those who disagree will grant that my dealing with the text itself, which is the present concern, will be fair.

The incident began when a blind and dumb demonic was brought to Jesus. Jesus healed the man in the presence of the people, who attested that the demoniac both spoke and saw. This kind of sign could not be denied, and it created astonishment in the hearts of the beholders. In their amazement they began to ask one another, "'Can this be the Son of David?'" (Matthew 12:23). Because of this, the Pharisees, jealous for themselves and the law, said, "'It is only by Beelzebul, the prince of demons, that this man casts out demons'" (v. 24). They could not deny that a miracle had occurred, but they could belittle it. It is obvious that they were not true to their own convictions, but spoke these words to keep the superstitious people from following Jesus. One of their own number, who was a ruler among them, had come to Jesus after dark, and confessed, "'Rabbi, we know that you are a teacher come from God; for no one can do these signs that you do, unless God is with him'" (John 3:2). The Pharisees knew that Jesus was not in league with the prince of demons. This was a ruse intended to counteract the influence of the Son of God with the common people.

Jesus demonstrated the absurdity of their accusation by three arguments. The first showed the folly of a power that would be antagonistic against itself. He said, "'Every kingdom divided against itself is laid waste, and no city or house divided against itself will stand; and if Satan casts out Satan, he is divided against himself; how then will his kingdom stand?'" (Matthew 12:25, 26). One can but imagine the chagrin of the lawyers when this fallacy was pointed out to them publicly.

The second argument dealt with the inconsistency manifested in claiming that Jesus operated under the authority of Beelzebul in expelling demons, while students of the Pharisaic school also claimed to cast them out. The word "sons" here is employed for disciples or students. For example, the "sons" of the prophets were students of the prophets, who sought to learn from and imitate them.

In Judaism of that day, many teachings existed about the exorcising of evil spirits. Many persons believed that pronunciation of the "ineffable name" of God would drive demons forth, and there were various combinations of terms to be recited to put the Shedim to flight. Jesus did not enter into a debate as to the legitimacy of the claims of the disciples of the Pharisees. It was the contention of the Pharisees that their students could drive out demons, so the question was, if it required authority from the prince of demons to do so, were they operating in league with demons also. Jesus said, "'They shall be your judges'" (v. 27).

On the other hand, to admit that the Spirit of God drove out the demons was to admit that the kingdom of God had come upon them. The Jews believed a kingdom of darkness was presided over by the prince of demons. If Jesus had been operating under the authority of that prince, the kingdom of darkness was predominant, but if He manifested the Spirit of God, the rule of Heaven was triumphing over Satan, laying his kingdom waste.

The third argument had to do with the relative strength required to subdue a man before plundering his house and dispossessing him. "'Or how can one enter a strong man's house and plunder his goods, unless he first binds the strong man? Then indeed he may plunder his house'" (v. 29). In this example the strong man is Satan. His goods are represented by the demons infesting the bodies of unfortunate victims, such as the one who had been afflicted by blindness and loss of speech. The argument of Jesus is clear. Before He could cast out demons He would have needed to subdue Satan and gain control of his holdings and property. Satan would no more surrender his stronghold than a man would willingly let a marauder come upon his premises and throw his possessions into the street. The observers' admission that Jesus was driving out demons was also an admission that He had gained superiority over Satan.

These arguments presented a real dilemma to the Pharisees. If Jesus operated under the power of Beelzebul, Satan was fighting against his own forces, and his kingdom would disintegrate. If not, Jesus had entered in, bound Satan, and was despoiling his kingdom. The kingdom of Satan was doomed and the superiority of Jesus was admitted, regardless of which position His opposers assumed.

At this point, Jesus inserted a rather peculiar statement, according to Matthew. Its relevance is not seen at first glance. Jesus said, "'He who is not with me is against me, and he who does not gather with me scatters'" (v. 30). A little thought will reveal that He was pointing out that there are but two kingdoms in the universe, by nature hostile toward each other. There was no cessation of warfare between them and no compromise. The Son of God and the son of perdition had nothing in common. There was no concord between Christ and Belial, as Paul phrases it in 2 Corinthians 6:15. Jesus had nothing to do with demons, or with the prince of demons, except to defeat their every intent and purpose.

We are now ready for the statement relating to the sin of blaspheming against the Holy Spirit. "'Therefore I tell you, every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven. And whoever says a word against the Son of man will be forgiven; but whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come'" (Matthew 12:31, 32).

Without speaking it is impossible to commit the sin of blasphemy. Blasphemy is a sin of the tongue and not merely of the heart. Regardless of how wrong one may be in his thinking, blasphemy must be openly expressed. Our word "blasphemy" is not a translation. It is a transliteration of the Greek original which means "to speak reproachfully, to slander, calumniate, rail at, or revile." To blaspheme is to speak injuriously of that which is high or holy. Blasphemy is never justifiable, but it is forgivable upon proper repentance when directed against any other person or thing than the Holy Spirit. This is so, even if it involved Jesus. "'Whoever says a word against the Son of man will be forgiven'" (v. 32).

What is the unforgivable sin? According to the context, it is accrediting to Satan the power by which Jesus performed His wonderful works. It is saying that Jesus possessed an evil spirit rather than the Holy Spirit. This is made quite clear by Mark, who writes that Jesus uttered His warning about blasphemy against the Spirit, "For they had said, 'He has an unclean spirit'" (Mark 3:30). There may be more to the matter than a mere statement, however, for the motivation must not be forgotten.

If those who saw Jesus perform His wonderful works had actually believed, sincerely, that He was using the power of Satan to dislodge demons, they would not have been guilty of blaspheming against the Holy Spirit. Their verbal conclusion would not have constituted this sin. They would have been sadly mistaken and the conclusion would have been irrational; yet, with increasing knowledge they could have changed their minds and obtained forgiveness for their error.

The blasphemy against the Spirit is to deliberately attribute to Satan the power by which Jesus performed His miracles, against all evidence and for the purpose of deflecting the hearts of humble men and women from faith in Him. The utterance of the slander is simply the result of a malevolent heart, conspiring to defeat the very purpose for which Jesus came in the flesh. It is a willful decision to scatter what He has come to gather, and the statement is a lie born of the will to deceive. This raises several questions.

Why is this unprincipled calumniation of the Spirit so heinous? What places it in a category by itself as the only sin for which forgiveness is not provided? Why is it worse than every other sin and blasphemy, including speaking against the Son of man? A little reflection on the purpose of the Spirit in producing the miracles of Jesus may help to explain the matter.

In general, Jesus performed two kinds of works— intellectual and physical— to excite wonder and to produce faith in Him as the Messiah. The first consisted of predictions as to the future, and faith in this case was deferred until the event came to pass. When an occurrence transpired and the mind recalled that Jesus had previously predicted it exactly as it happened, faith was kindled in His claim to have divine prescience. "'I tell you this now, before it takes place, that when it does take place you may believe that I am he'" (John 13:19).

Physical miracles were of the kind to incite immediate recognition of supernatural power. Thus the statement, "And when they saw these things, they believed" expresses the idea that the validation of the act was in its nature. It was visual, and the impact was immediate. Physical miracles had a two-fold motivation, resulting from compassion for the suffering and the need for a criterion by which to establish the divinity of a mission. The relief of physical pain or infirmity was intended to provide an incentive to believe.

Belief in Jesus was not a mere exercise of consciousness, but a matter of life and death. He said to the Jews, "'I told you that you would die in your sins, for you will die in your sins unless you believe that I am he'" (8:24). Jesus also appealed to His works as visual testimony to occasion faith: "'But the testimony which I have is greater than that of John; for the works which the Father has granted me to accomplish, these very works which I am doing, bear me witness that the Father has sent me'" (5:36). Again, "'If I am not doing the works of my Father, then do not believe me; but if I do them, even though you do not believe me, believe the works, that you may know and understand that the Father is in me and I am in the Father'" (10:37, 38).

John 20:30, 31 is pregnant with meaning: "Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book; but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name." It is evident that the Spirit exercised selectivity in placing on record the various miracles of which we may read. Out of the great number of signs Jesus did, a sufficient number were selected to convince any honest heart that He was the Messiah and God's Son. A dishonest heart would not believe in Him regardless of the amount of proof produced.

The signs Jesus did by the Holy Spirit were designed to make believers in Him. A deliberate attempt to frustrate faith by false accusations as to the source of power would therefore be a sin of the deepest dye. It would amount to a malicious conspiracy to deprive men of eternal life because of personal jealousy and hostility. One might honestly question the claims of Jesus, and might verbalize doubts about the authenticity and genuineness of Jesus' words as recorded. This is not unforgivable. Further research and study could well demonstrate one's error and bring about real reformation. To behold the signs done to produce faith, and against all observation, knowledge, and conscience, assign that power to Satan for the specific purpose of destroying faith is to condemn mankind once and for all to eternal death.

Why is there no forgiveness for this malign act? The simplest answer is that God has placed it outside the pale of divine forgiveness. It is beyond the limit set for grace. It is the one crime against divine majesty that is outside the circle. This does not exhaust the subject, however. The kind of heart that would engage in such reprehensible conduct will not repent. It is the heart of stone or flint that would willingly see the world of mankind destroyed to justify its own cruelty and gratify its own inhumanity.

The question always arises, "What if one in this condition should repent?" This need not trouble us. One who is dead to love for all truth, and has crucified in his consciousness all respect for evidence will not believe. Faith is the belief of testimony, and one who has examined the testimony and defiantly assigned it to the realm of the damned has no ground left for honest faith. He has sinned away his day of grace!

Can men commit the unpardonable sin today? The answer, I think, is that it is possible, but not very probable. That it is possible can be deduced from the words of Jesus, "'Whoever speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come'" (Matthew 12:32). Among the Jews who were present when these words were spoken, the expression

"the age to come," referred to the Messianic age, the time when, according to their thinking, the Messiah would sit upon His throne and exercise universal dominion. There is no reason to believe that Jesus employed the term in any other than the accepted sense, just as there is no reason to think that He endorsed the traditional ideas with which the rabbis had invested it.

"This age" refers to the dispensation in which Jesus lived upon the earth. "The age to come" refers to the dispensation in which we now live. There would be little value in applying this latter expression to the age following the general resurrection from the dead, for no unforgiven sins will be forgiven then. It is my conviction that one can commit the sin in this age and if so, it is as unforgivable now as it was when Jesus said it.

We should not allow the matter to rest here without making a few comments about an attempted current application of the remarks of Jesus. In our own time an interest has been aroused in the work of the Holy Spirit, with the result that many persons claim to have received special gifts of the Spirit, to enable them to perform signs and wonders. Radio stations specializing in "gospel broadcasting" have one program after another, from sunrise to sunset, in which men use their alleged gifts as drawing-cards to solicit contributions and plead for offerings to keep them on the air.

A frequent tactic with which to ward off any criticism and to stifle any protest is to threaten that those who question the sincerity of the speakers may be guilty of blaspheming against the Holy Spirit. There is no attempt here to enter into the controversy as to whether or not the "charismatic gifts" are for this generation. That is a study that lies outside the scope of the volume. Honest doubts about the qualifications, objectives, and character of some of the "radio evangelists" is not sinning against the Spirit. By no stretch of the imagination can honest investigation of their claims be remotely connected to what Jesus said.

During my lifetime I have found certain individuals who were deeply troubled by the thought that they might have committed the sin against the Holy Spirit, and were condemned to a state of hopelessness here and of condemnation hereafter. Without fail, I have found that the real trouble was ignorance of what Jesus was talking about. Frequently the problem resulted from misinformation derived from an overzealous exhorter who sought to frighten the person into a public response to his call. A simplistic, but relatively safe, criterion is that anyone who is worried about having blasphemed the Spirit has not done so, for the kind of person Jesus described would never worry about it.

I have canvassed rather extensively what I regard as the Scriptural teaching related to the blasphemy against the Spirit. It seems apparent that the sin does not refer to an attitude toward a mere influence, impersonal force or energy, but consists of the slander of a divine personality through which God's purpose is accomplished in the universe of His creation. Yet, if I stop the discussion here, at least two other passages will go unexplained. Many have equated these with the unforgivable sin of which Jesus spoke. Having written at this length on the theme, it seems injudicious to ignore the other problem passages, so I will deal with them as peripheral questions, not specifically related to the central concern of this work, and yet deserving of scrutiny and attention.

APOSTASY

The first passage is found in Hebrews 6:4-8 and reads as follows: "For it is impossible to restore again to repentance those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, and have become partakers of the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the age to come, if they then commit apostasy, since they crucify the Son of God on their own account and hold him up to contempt. For land which has drunk the rain that often falls upon it, and brings forth vegetation useful to those for whose sake it is cultivated, receives a blessing from God. But if it bears thorns and thistles, it is worthless and near to being cursed; its end is to be burned."

On the basis of the statement of the impossibility of restoring to repentance those who are in the category here described, thousands of persons think of apostasy as the unforgivable sin. Again, the problem lies in ignoring the context. Scriptural context may be either immediate and direct, or remote. The first has to do with the setting adjacent to a statement, either preceding or following it, or both. The remote context has to do with the aim and purpose of a letter or section that governs the relationship of all that appears in the entire frame of reference.

A careful study of the entire Hebrew letter will reveal that it was written to Palestinian Jews, as the title indicates. It was written during a time when the temple was still standing in Jerusalem and the priests were daily ministering within its precincts. The addressees had accepted Jesus as the Messiah, but because of the appeal of the pomp and pageantry of the temple ritual, or because of persecution and opposition, were defecting to Judaism and abandoning the faith of the gospel. The whole purpose of this letter was to strengthen them to stand firm, "For we share in Christ, if only we hold our first confidence firm to the end" (Hebrews 3:14).

The method of encouragement was to point out that in Christ we have something far better than was found under Moses and in the Old Covenant. The word "better" occurs thirteen times, and in each instance points up the superiority of some feature in Christ over what Judaism had to offer. It must be remembered that the first-century Jewish believer who forgot the Lord and returned to his previous relationship, discounted the value of the blood of Christ. He once again placed his trust in inferior animal sacrifices, the blood of bulls and goats, which could never take away sins (10:4).

There is a difference between one's "leaving the church" or "going back into the world," as the phraseology of our day often states it, and one's going back into dead works from which the conscience has been purified. Modern "drop-outs" frequently affirm that they believe in Jesus as much as they ever did, but, because of the weakness of the flesh, they cannot live up to the responsibility of being a Christian. The letter to the Hebrews was not addressed to individuals like this, but to those who have "spurned the Son of God, and profaned the blood of the covenant by which they were sanctified and outraged the Spirit of grace" (10:29).

With this preliminary survey we are prepared to look at the passage under discussion. These Hebrews had once been enlightened, which in this instance refers to the illumination of God's purpose in Christ. "In him was life, and the life was the light of men" (John 1:4). They had left the moonlight age with its shadows, symbols, and types, and were translated into the sunlight dispensation of reality and fulfillment. The situation was like one's leaving a storm cellar lighted by a single flickering candle and coming into a house aglow with fluorescent lighting.

The Christians had "tasted the heavenly gift." The word "taste," as used in the Scriptures, does not mean simply to sample. The term means to experience or share in something. The "heavenly gift" does not refer to the Spirit, which is expressly mentioned in the following statement. It no doubt has to do with that quality of life gained through reception of the Lord Jesus Christ, Heaven's greatest gift to humanity.

They had "become partakers of the Holy Spirit." The promise of God to His people through the prophets was that He would grant them His Spirit to dwell in them. We discussed at length the assurance Jesus gave before His departure from earth that He would send another Helper. Accordingly, those who heard the word of truth, the gospel of salvation, and believed in Jesus, were said to be "sealed with the promised Holy Spirit" (Ephesians 1:13). Under the legal dispensation of Moses, the Spirit invested certain men with the gift of prophetic utterance, leaving the great body of people without direct association with the Spirit. In the gospel age the Spirit dwells in all who are in Christ, and the Hebrews who had been the first to hear the good news had been so blessed.

They had "tasted the goodness of the word of God." The gospel, a message of joy and hope, brought comfort to the sick and assurance to the dying. It did not require dead sacrifices nor enjoin the killing of animals. Rather, it emphasized the giving of the body of the believer as a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, as a rational and understandable service. The contrast was vividly stated in one verse of the Hebrew letter. "For if the sprinkling of defiled persons with the blood of goats and bulls and with the ashes of a heifer sanctifies for the purification of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish to God, purify your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (Hebrews 9:13, 14).

The Christians had experienced "the powers of the age to come" (Hebrews 6:5). Again, this refers to the Jewish concept of the Messianic age. The writer to the Hebrews regarded that age as having arrived. The Son of God was sitting at the right hand of the Father. Angels, archangels, authorities, and powers were made subject to Him. God had highly exalted Him and given Him a name above every name. He was made head of the community of the called-out ones. The "age to come" had arrived!

The writer declares that if those who have participated in all of these blessings should now "commit apostasy," it is impossible to restore them to repentance. The word rendered "apostasy" is from a term meaning to fall away. It refers to an abandonment of the faith, a denial of the validity of the facts upon which belief is founded, an utter desertion of the truth of the gospel. Such desertion is not the result of ignorance, but is a deliberate step taken with eyes wide open to the truth.

Those who fall away crucify the Son of God afresh and hold Him in contempt. How do they do this? The answer is simple. Jesus was condemned to be crucified because He testified that He was the Messiah. Those who lived upon earth in His day preferred their legalistic ritual with the earthly gifts and animal sacrifices. They considered Jesus a threat to their traditions. Men's forsaking Him and going back to the shadows of the law was like crucifying Jesus anew and making it appear that His death was empty and useless.

Defection from the faith under such circumstances gave the enemies of the cross an excuse for rejoicing and an opportunity for ridicule. It weakened the morale of the saints. The very name of Jesus became the butt of scurrilous remarks and was slandered in the eyes of the heathen populace.

Those who forsook Jesus to return to legalistic bondage were likened to cultivated land. A farm that drinks in the rain and repays the tillage of its fields with fruitful crops is blessed of God because of its abundant yield. Sterile or barren ground, or land that produces only a matted growth of thorns and thistles, is fit only for execration and will be burned over to destroy its noxious growth. This last is an apt picture of those who have received every blessing from Heaven, only to use the strength to disgrace and disparage the cause for which Jesus died.

Apostasy, as serious as it may be, is not the blasphemy against the Spirit. One may fall away without overtly slandering the Spirit. The record does not say that such a person cannot repent, rather that it is impossible for another to lead him to repentance. The reason is understood when we remember that every act is the result of motivation. The apostate has listened to and examined every motive leading to repentance. He has experienced every blessing and benefit accruing from relationship with Christ. When he turns his back upon all of these, no other appeal remains that can restore him.

We must retain a clear distinction between an apostate and an ordinary backslider. One may become a drop-out without renouncing Jesus. It is possible to become negligent and to forsake responsibility without denying the validity of the claims of God upon one's life, or the efficacy of the blood of Christ as a cleansing agent for sin. Expositors need to be careful that they do not discourage those who could resume the yoke of Christ by making it appear that they are in such a state they cannot do so.

THE SIN UNTO DEATH

Another passage that presents some real problems is 1 John 5:16, 17. Here John mentions the "sin unto death." TheRevised Standard Version designates it a "mortal" sin. Many persons have concluded that this is the sin against the Holy Spirit, of which Jesus spoke. I do not believe the two are identical, and I shall briefly discuss why I do not.

"If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it. All unrighteousness is sin: and there is a sin not unto death" (KJV). In verse 15 John had given assurance that we will be heard in our petitions to God because of our faith in His Son. John then qualifies this by distinguishing between a "sin unto death" and one not "unto death." This has occasioned much conjecture upon the part of commentators. Many different views have been expressed. Albert Barnes regarded the "sin unto death" as the unpardonable sin. This view was also shared by Philip Doddridge. A lengthy dissent was registered to their view, however, by Dr. James Macknight in his Apostolical Epistles.

Dr. Macknight held that in the early age of Christianity, God punished some men for their sins directly with physical disease or infirmity, and in aggravated cases, with death. His position was that if someone in that age who was possessed of the gift of healing saw one smitten of God and could determine that the punishment of death was not assessed, he could pray for that person and God would honor the gift by granting life to the one so smitten.

There can be little doubt that God punished certain sins with death. This was true in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, who conspired together to lie about the amount of money they received for the sale of their property (Acts 5:1-10). It is also true that, because of irregularities in observation of the Lord's Supper, some at Corinth were smitten with sickness and others suffered death (1 Corinthians 11:30). Here Paul declares that those who eat and drink with the wrong motive, eat and drink punishment to themselves. He added, "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." Here is the full text of Dr. Macknight's treatment of the passage under consideration:

> Because it was necessary to the successful propagation of the gospel, that its professors in the first age should be remarkably holy, God so ordered it that the open miscarriages of individuals, were often punished with visible temporal judgments. So Paul told the Corinthians, who had been guilty of great irregularities in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, 1 Corinthians 11:30, "For this cause many of you are sick, and some of you are dead." These judgments, being public, had no doubt a great influence in restraining the first Corinthians from sin. On the other hand to encourage those to repent who by their sins had brought on themselves mortal diseases, there were in the first age, persons, who being endowed > with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, (1 Corinthians 12:9), were moved by the Holy Ghost to heal the sick, who had repented of the sins which had brought on them the diseases under which they were laboring. We may therefore believe, that when John directed any one, who saw his brother sinning a sin not unto death, to ask God to give him life, he did not mean any ordinary Christian, but any spiritual man who was endowed with the gift of healing diseases; and that the brother for whom the spiritual man was to ask life, was not every brother who had sinned, but the brother only who had been punished for his sin with some mortal disease, but who having repented of his sin, it was not a sin unto death: and that the life to be asked for such a brother was not eternal life, but a miraculous recovery from the mortal disease under which he was laboring.[9]

W. E. Vine concurs in the view expressed by Macknight. In his book, The Epistles of John, he writes as follows:

> The phrase "unto death" signifies "tending towards death," rather than the actual condition of being in death. Accordingly, this would seem to rule out the view that the state referred to is that in which a child of God has lost all communion with the Lord, for that would involve a condition of spiritual death, already experienced, instead of that which tends toward it.
>
> As to the subject of death, the only conclusion that seems possible is that the reference is to physical death. That is spoken of as the result of certain sins, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, and that of the moral delinquent in 1 Corinthians 5, and again in the case of those who partake of the Lord's Supper unworthily (1 Corinthians 11:30), where sleep refers to physical death.[10]

To me this seems to harmonize best with the circumstances and with the Scriptures. If God visited sickness upon a brother because he had sinned, and another had the power of discernment by which he could determine that the divine decree did not involve death as a part of the punishment, he could pray for the sick man and life would be granted to the man as a result of the petition. He would not have to continue in his punishment. "The prayer of faith will save the sick man, and the Lord will raise him up; and if he has committed sins, he will be forgiven" (James 5:15).

On the other hand, if the sin was such that God decreed death, or capital punishment, prayer would be unavailing. "There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it" (1 John 5:16; KJV). Of course, it would have been useless for Peter to have prayed for Ananias and Sapphira. Three hours after Ananias died for his guilt, Peter told Sapphira she would suffer the same fate because she was equally involved in the sin. God has no double standard.

I do not think the record means to imply that there was a specific sin "unto death," any more than there was a specific sin "not unto death." The difference lay, not in the overt act, but in the motivation and nature of the one committing the sin. Ananias and Sapphira died because of a lie growing out of a conspiracy. The Corinthians died because of their partisan debasement of the Lord's Supper. Many commentators think that "the destruction of the flesh" referred to in the case of the blatant fornicator (1 Corinthians 5:5) meant a death decree when he was turned over to Satan.

Does God still directly visit sickness and death upon men and women who are guilty of kindred sins? Although my answer will not satisfy everyone who reads this book, I am not hesitant to say I do not believe that He does. In the primitive era of the community of the called-out ones, a directness of dealing was essential. This directness is not now essential to the fulfillment of the divine purpose. At that time there were no New Covenant Scriptures to circulate as guidelines for spiritual and moral behavior, nor to remind men that they would be "reserved unto the judgment of that great day."

Every social institution requires certain measures in its inception and foundational era, that it may later outgrow or discard. Kingdoms and nations mature as do the individuals who compose them. As succeeding generations develop an increasing sense of responsibility, methods of punishing derelictions of duty may change. "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever" does not mean God limits His methods today to what He did in previous centuries. He is no longer obligated to relieve the hunger of five thousand persons with five loaves and two fish. Neither should we think Him obligated to grant men and women the same gifts as He did in the formative stages of the church. Indeed, this is one sign that few "miracle workers" lay claim to performing, although it would be a tremendous asset to missionaries in famine-stricken areas.

I do not consider the sin "unto death" as being the blasphemy against the Spirit. I cannot conceive of the sin against the Spirit as being a reflection against, or a rejection of, a mere influence in the world. The Scriptures seem to indicate that blasphemy is an assault upon and a false accusation of a divine Person, so grave in nature as to place the one who commits it outside the domain of God's forgiveness.

What Is Life in the Spirit?

Contents

Whatever we may conclude about the nature of the Spirit as recorded in Scripture, if our personal lives are not transformed, our study becomes only an academic matter in which there is no spiritual profit. Contemplation of the blessings conferred through the indwelling of the Spirit is thrilling! While space will not permit an exhaustive treatise of the theme, I want to share with you some of the things we may read in the New Covenant letters.

Ephesians 1:13, 14 informs us that we are sealed by the Spirit, and the Spirit is God's guarantee that we shall come into our inheritance. These two verses are pregnant with hope for the followers of Jesus. The full text says, "In him you also, who have heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation, and have believed in him, were sealed with the promised Holy Spirit, which is the guarantee of our inheritance until we acquire possession of it."

Here we learn that only believers in Christ receive the Spirit as a seal. Only believers will share in the inheritance. This agrees with the words of Jesus, who said the world cannot receive the Spirit because it does not see Him or know Him (John 14:17). In the same verse He declares, concerning His disciples, "You know him, for he dwells with you, and will be in you." Companionship and intimacy are indicated by this expression.

Belief follows the hearing of the word of truth, here defined as the gospel of salvation. In Romans 10:15, 16, the gospel is classified as good news, or glad tidings, and verse 17 says, "So faith comes from what is heard, and what is heard comes by the preaching of Christ." To preach Christ is to proclaim the historical facts related to what He did for men who were lost. Paul declares that the gospel he preached, by which men were saved, was simply that "Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures" (1 Corinthians 15:3, 4).

The response of the honest mind to testimony rendered credible is belief of that testimony, faith in what is affirmed. The gospel of Christ is testimony about a Person. It is designed to establish the fact that that Person is the Messiah promised by the prophets. Faith in Christ is belief that He is who He claimed to be. It is more than an acknowledgment of the historicity of the facts, or mental assent to their accuracy. A detached intellectual admission of the factuality is not sufficient. Faith embraces a relationship with the object of belief. Those who receive the Spirit are those who have "believed in him."

The Spirit leads men to salvation by means of a message. It is a message preached by men, heard by men, and believed by men. No theory of salvation by direct operation on the sinner's heart, apart from the Word proclaimed, is given any credence in the Scriptures. There is no historical validation for any person's coming to Christ where missionaries have not taken the message. The Spirit has never created believers except through the announcement of the good news by "earthen vessels." When men react to the testimony by believing in Christ and pledging allegiance to Him, the Spirit moves into the heart where Jesus dwells by faith. There He takes up His abode to act as a seal. The word "seal" is from sphragis, a seal or signet that indicated ownership or authenticity. This is important and should not be casually dismissed. Sometimes a seal was in the form of a ring on which was engraved an initial or other identifying mark for stamping documents. We still speak of a "signet ring," which is one bearing the initial of the wearer.

In the days of the apostles, a seal was also used for branding slaves, often on the forehead and in the right hand. Such a brand identified the slave as the possession of the owner. Such a use of the word is found in Revelation 7:2, where an angel appeared from the east with "the seal of the living God." He halted all proceedings until he had sealed the servants of God upon their foreheads and thus marked them as belonging to Him. In Revelation 9:4 mention is made of the suffering endured by those who do not have the seal of God upon their foreheads.

The promised Holy Spirit abiding within the Christian is proof of God's ownership of his person. "But you are not in the flesh, you are in the Spirit, if the Spirit of God really dwells in you. Any one who does not have the Spirit of Christ does not belong to him" (Romans 8:9). The validation of one's claim to be dwelling on the spiritual plane is the indwelling Spirit. The proof that one belongs to Jesus is the seal of the Spirit. One who is conscious that the inner chamber of his being is occupied by this royal Guest need never feel lonely or forsaken. In a remarkable chapter devoted to our relationship to the Spirit, the apostle reaches the height of human thought in three tremendous questions: "What then shall we say to this? If God is for us, who is against us? He who did not spare his own Son but gave him up for us all, will he not also give us all things with him?" (vv. 31, 32).

The Spirit does not simply mark us as being the possession of God, but also acts as a guarantee of our inheritance. With a little thought the reason becomes apparent. The Spirit does not dwell in any except God's children. The Spirit within is proof that the person is a child of God, and an heir of the Father's bounty. In the flesh it is impossible to receive the full measure of the inheritance, but the Spirit is given as a bond of assurance that God will not withhold anything from us.

In our day the word "inheritance" is used for a patrimony received upon the death of a father, but that is not the meaning indicated in the New Covenant Scriptures. Here the word strictly means to receive by lot, and then to receive and possess as one's own. In Matthew 19:29 Jesus speaks of eternal life as an inheritance. This was the life made possible in the eternal kingdom of God, when all that offends or causes sin shall have been eliminated. It is more than unbroken existence. It is also unending joy or bliss.

In Ephesians 5:5 Paul lists certain characters who have no such inheritance in God's kingdom. Those who are walking in the Spirit have such an inheritance awaiting, but they cannot now enjoy it to the fullest because of the limitations of the flesh. The present life is material, subject to decay and mortification. "I tell you this, brethren: flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable" (1 Corinthians 15:50).

The indwelling Spirit is the divine guarantee that we shall be changed and brought into the glorious experience of eternal existence. We are not going to be frustrated and defeated. We will not be forsaken. "But our commonwealth is in heaven, and from it we await a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself" (Philippians 3:20, 21).

The word rendered "guarantee" in modern versions, and "earnest" in the *King James Version, is *arrabon. It was a business term, probably used by Phoenician traders and pawnbrokers who introduced it among the Greeks. It referred to earnest money or other valuable consideration deposited by a prospective purchaser, and forfeited by him if he did not fulfill the agreement. Eventually it came to mean a pledge to carry out a covenant, and in the New Covenant Scriptures it is used only of God's assurance to believers, and never the reverse. In modern Greek "guarantee" is the word for an engagement ring.

From this it will be seen that, although God cannot bestow upon us the full blessing of eternal life while we are in the physical body, He has given us the Holy Spirit as an earnest or pledge that His covenant is certain. I need have no qualm or fear as to my inheritance because the Spirit is God's pledge of my eternal blessedness. As I now share in the Spirit, so will I share in life forever!

The ultimate purpose of human existence is to share in the glory of God. Peter wrote to the persecuted saints that the God of all grace had called them to His eternal glory in Christ. After they had suffered a little while, eternal glory would be theirs (1 Peter 5:10). He told the elders who were faithful in their responsibility they would receive "a crown that fadeth not away" (1 Peter 5:4; KJV). Paul wrote to the Corinthians that the momentary affliction they were enduring was preparing for them "an eternal weight of glory beyond all comparison" (2 Corinthians 4:17). What a comfort to the believer!

To guarantee this culmination of the divine plan for our existence the Spirit abides within us. No one need go down under the burdens of life. Sickness, pain, persecution— God knows about them all, and they will pass away, while for God's children there will be an eternal day. God is in us as the hope of glory.

THE INNER STRENGTH

All of us have known individuals who seem to possess an inner reservoir of strength that never runs dry. Perhaps it is a person against whose frail body all the storms of life have been directed. Poverty, ill health, loss of loved ones— all of these combine to defeat every plan for overcoming the negative forces of life. What is the secret of the overcoming life, the triumphant existence? It cannot be a superior education, for many of these persons have little formal education. It cannot be financial power, for they are often in the throes of penury.

Such people are a constant rebuke to those who talk about luck or fortune making the difference between success or failure. In his book, On Being a Real Person, Harry Emerson Fosdick discusses the need for organizing those factors out of which personality can be formed. He points out that we have these factors by nature. After mentioning the various things we need to overcome depression, he deals with the ultimate strength, telling his readers that those whose only method of coping with problems is to rely upon their own strength will eventually face up to a situation where such strength is inadequate and such a method inapplicable.

I know a man who illustrates this very thing. He was once a university instructor, honored and respected by his colleagues, well known for his brilliance. Before he was near retirement age, a series of reverses set in, and these would have ruined a lesser man. His wife was stricken with a lingering disease, and he was forced during a period of many months to watch her die. Left alone, he disposed of his home and moved into an apartment. While he was away on a trip, the building caught fire from faulty wiring, destroying everything he possessed, including his valuable books and manuscripts. These alone represented almost a lifetime of research and writing. Then he became aware of a nervous condition that affected his mobility and disturbed his memory. Finally he had to be placed in a geriatric center where aged patients all about him were awaiting death. Yet, when I went to see him, he was so cheerful and out-going that he actually helped me. He was alert and interested in what I was doing, and made it appear that all the things that happened to him were really blessings in disguise.

When I could stand it no longer I bluntly asked him what was behind his cheerful attitude. (One of the doctors had told me that this man had transformed the hospital by the radiance of his faith and hope.) He told me the story himself.

He always had been a believer in God, but when he came to the realization that he was alone, sick, and would have to make a complete change of life, he decided to approach the problem with the dynamic of faith. He chose a day to fast and prepare his mind for God's will. He sat down to read the entire book of Psalms to let the courage and hope in these ancient songs of praise seep into his being. He underlined Psalm 121:7, 8: "The Lord will keep you from all evil; he will keep your life. The Lord will keep your going out and your coming in from this time forth and for evermore." He chose this for his motto.

Having walked through the aisles of the book, this once-famous university professor got down on his knees and began to supplicate for God's care. He prayed that God would grant him inward power great enough to overcome every obstacle and enable him to be resigned to the divine will. These are his words: "As I prayed I began to sense a new strength in me that was not my own. I felt a kinship with a force from outside, beyond myself. I retired and slept soundly. I awakened refreshed, confident that the Spirit of God would supply my every need. I believe that during that day of reading and meditation I actually made contact with the power of the Spirit to sustain."

I became convinced that I was seeing a living demonstration of that for which Paul petitioned in Ephesians 3:14-19. Accordingly, the passage took on a new and fuller meaning for me, and I have been helped immeasurably by thinking about it seriously and often. Here it is for your contemplation, and the best way to share in its wonderful meaning is to savor each clause slowly and carefully:

"For this reason I bow my knees before the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named, that according to the riches of his glory he may grant you to be strengthened with might through his Spirit in the inner man, and that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith; that you, being rooted and grounded in love, may have power to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge, that you may be filled with all the fulness of God."

The human mind is staggered when it seeks to embrace the meaning of this remarkable statement. Who possesses a vocabulary rich enough to describe what it means to be filled with all the fullness of God? Paul has just written that the faithful are built into the holy temple of the Lord, for a dwelling place for the Spirit, and now he assures them that they are recipients of the divine fullness. All that is God's belongs to the saints while they are here, on the conditions enunciated by the apostle.

The first item of the petition is that believers may be strengthened with might by the Spirit in the inner man. No one who accepts the Scripture as a divine revelation can doubt that the human being consists of both an outer and inner man. In Romans 7:22, 23, Paul identifies the inmost self with the mind or heart. It is possible for one of God's children to grow stronger in the faith even as he grows weaker in the body. The Spirit does not abide in us to keep the flesh always youthful. The passing of years takes a toll of the flesh. The promise is that though our outer nature wears away our inner nature is being renewed every day (2 Corinthians 4:16).

The versatile Greek language was especially endowed with words for "power." Two of these are found in the terms "strengthened" and "might." The first is from kratos, power that is manifested or applied. The root from which it is derived means to perfect or complete, and was connected with creative ability or energy.

"Might" is from dunamis, familiar to us in such English words as dynamic, dynamo, and dynamite. When used in contrast with other synonyms, it generally referred to inherent power. In this instance it signifies the power that is natural to the Spirit of God.

With these facts before us, it is apparent that the apostle was asking God to manifest the divine dynamic, the spirit of creative energy and power in the lives of the saints and to do so on the basis of the riches of His glory. This means nothing less than the fact that believers in Christ Jesus, filled with the Spirit, are furnished the power to do all that God expects of them in the universe. Instead of being weak, vacillating creatures, battered by the winds of fate, they are more victorious than conquerors, through Him who loved us.

Sometimes we speak in awe of the Christian heroes who have arisen in times of crisis to leave their marks upon the world and the church. Almost invariably, these were common men reared in humble circumstances. They met the needs of the hour when they realized that God dwelt in them through His Spirit, providing them the power to offset the evil forces that confronted them. The same Spirit abides in us all. We are not all called to become reformers like Luther and Zwingli, but we are called to serve in our localities and according to our capacities. For this, God provides an inner dynamic that cannot know defeat.

The tragedy of our generation is wasted lives because of late awakening. We discover the royal provision too late to employ it effectively. The creative energy that framed this majestic universe dwells in us and is ours to use. A remarkable statement is found in Ephesians 1:19, 20, in which Paul asserts that the same power God used to raise Jesus from the dead is ours now: "And what is the immeasurable greatness of his power in us who believe, according to the working of his great might which he accomplished in Christ when he raised him from the dead and made him sit at his right hand in the heavenly places."

What a startling difference it would make in our Christian witness today, if we actually believed in the dynamic strength of the indwelling Spirit. Sermons would catch on fire. Churches would march with zeal. Homes would be transformed. How sad it is to see men and women living in spiritual poverty when the Father has deposited a great treasure to our account out of the riches of His glory. We need not beg for this power. It is ours now! We do not have to plead with God to do what He has already done. Having power available in a house will not provide light until we plug in to the power. That is all we need to do now through faith and absolute trust in God.

The apostle prayed "that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith." The word "dwell" is used of abiding relationships. Another word is employed for one who drops in for a casual visit. "Dwell" is used to signify one who moves in as a permanent part of the household. Jesus seeks to become one with us, to establish himself as the guiding factor in life. Faith is the reaching out of the human heart to seal the relationship by which Heaven becomes real to us.

Paul also would have those who are in Christ possess the ability to grasp the potential of that love which is the most powerful force in the universe. In order to do this they must be rooted and grounded in love. Although both of these have to do with foundational matters, they regard the life of the disciple of Christ from different perspectives.

"Rooted" makes us think of our lives as growing and developing plants. This is a common metaphor throughout the Bible! Men are often spoken of as trees planted by the divine hand. Often the trees used in such symbolism are fruit trees, and the kind of soil in which they are planted will help to determine the quality of fruit produced. It is essential that we put down the roots of faith into that love which can stand against all erosive forces. "Love bears all things and endures all things."

"Grounded" makes us consider human life as a building or structure. This picture also occurs frequently in Scripture. A building is as secure as its foundation, and no foundation is more solid than enduring love. The love here mentioned is not an emotion or sentiment, but an act of will. It is never accidental or incidental. It is purposeful and voluntary. And it is always active, never passive.

We must start out with faith and love, and we must never outgrow or abandon either. Everything that is said must be spoken in faith and love. Everything that is done must be performed in faith and love. We must begin by going down into the soil of love. We must continue by growing up in love. The Spirit dwelling within us is a royal guest in a temple making all of this possible. Indeed, the Spirit is the very source of that love, providing a hope that will never end in disappointment or disillusionment. "And hope does not disappoint us, because God's love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given to us" (Romans 5:5).

God's love is not our love for God; it is rather the love that God is (1 John 4:16). The testimony is plain: "Love is of God, and he who loves is born of God and knows God. He who does not love does not know God; for God is love" (4:7, 8). If we would be like God, if we would give evidence that we have been born of God and know God, we must manifest the love of God. We cannot develop or generate this love while we are caught up in the human predicament. The fleshly nature— selfish, egotistical, and egocentric— rebels against genuine concern for the involvement in the needs of others. It always asks, "What is in it for me?" Its philosophy is, "Let him get his like I got mine." The fleshly nature (or selfishness) is the attitude of the priest and Levite, not that of the good Samaritan.

To turn over a new leaf is not enough. We must turn up with a new life. This means that there must be a change from the human nature to the divine, and this is the work of the Spirit. "His divine power has granted to us all things that pertain to life and godliness, through the knowledge of him who called us to his own glory and excellence, by which he has granted to us his precious and very great promises, that through these you may escape from the corruption that is in the world because of passion, and become partakers of the divine nature" (2 Peter 1:3, 4).

If you open your heart and life to the ministrations of the Spirit of God, your changed life will be one of the greatest blessings that you have ever known. You will become more like Jesus, and the divine love flowing through your personality will touch and change and cleanse those around you. Members of your own family, the people with whom you work, your friends and neighbors— all will recognize that you are living on a different plane, and that life has taken on a new perspective. God made you and He wants you to be a vessel fit for the use for which He designed you.

If you are a physician you must become God's practitioner. If you are a truck driver you must become God's truck driver. The Bible knows nothing about "professional ministers." It recognizes the work of "ministering professionals." College teachers, farmers, dentists, taxi drivers, nurses, and housewives must all have the same vocation or calling: the calling of God. What they do to make a living is not their vocation, but their avocation. God calls you to serve where you are, but He does not call you to flounder around helplessly. He furnishes the power by which you can fulfill your purpose.

You do not need to quit what you are doing to "enter the ministry." You entered the ministry when you came into Christ. The power to perform that ministry was yours from the moment Christ, through the Spirit, entered you. Recognition of this will produce a sense of happiness and well-being you never knew before. Open your life to God's will and purpose. Tune your personality to vibrate in unison with the divine. You will find that life will take on a completely new dimension, and your feet will be planted on higher ground.

Perhaps nothing is more detrimental to the cause of Christ than the idea that some of God's people should be urged to enter "full-time service." The very term suggests that the great majority are only part-time servants. This has led to the concept that those who volunteer "full time" must have a greater degree of dedication and commitment than others. Even their behavior and style of life must be different. They must deny themselves certain things counted as luxuries, while others can pile them up. They are expected to live dynamic and energetic lives for Jesus while those who support them can exist in a powerless spiritual condition.

This is foreign to the Scriptures. It is not only unscriptural but antiscriptural. The idea of asking Christians to volunteer for full-time work for Jesus after they have been in Him for ten years is absurd. No one can enlist for part-time work in the kingdom of God. No provision is made for goldbricks or fill-in laborers. In Christ, life is service, and service is life. One who does not enlist full time is preparing to be dead the greater part of the time!

The Spirit dwells in every child of God and dwells in all of them for the same purpose, though not for the same function. The function of each is determined by his ability, talent, or gift, coupled with opportunity. The purpose of the Spirit is to furnish each one the dynamic to accomplish the work for which he is adapted. There are no useless members. God has added each to the body as He pleases.

A mistaken view exists about making a witness for Jesus. Some persons feel they must quit their employment in order to obey God's Word for their lives. If one is working in an endeavor that is sinful in itself, or in which his conscience condemns him, he should get out of it. But one who makes his living in a legitimate business is working for God. The same Word that urges faithfulness to God also says, "Study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you; that ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing" (1 Thessalonians 4:11, 12; KJV).

This is the instruction of the Spirit, and surely He will empower those who heed it. Some may feel called to leave an occupation and preach the Word of God to those who have not heard it. This is good. Others who may not have the ability to do that may remain in the shop or office. One is no more a minister of God than the other. They simply serve in different places, but all must serve in the Spirit.

FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT

Closely akin to this is the teaching of God's revelation on the fruit of the Spirit. The word for fruit is karpos, defined as that which is produced by the inherent energy of a living organism. In a spiritual sense, W. E. Vine says that it is "the visible expression of power working inwardly and invisibly, the character of the fruit being evidence of the character of the power producing it."

In His dissertation on the Spirit as a helper, Jesus inserted the metaphor of the vine and the branches (John 15:1-10). In this appropriate illustration God is the gardener, and Jesus the true vine. The branches are His followers. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples" (John 15:8; KJV). Some things are made clear in the metaphor. One is that the branch is helpless to bear fruit of itself. Jesus said, "The branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine" (v. 4; KJV).

A branch does not produce grapes, but becomes the channel through which fruit is borne. It is the inward strength derived through union with the vine that makes fruit possible. As Jesus put it, "Without me ye can do nothing." The will of God for a human life can never be carried out separated from Jesus Christ. Men deceive themselves when they think they can achieve righteousness on their own. Just as the sap enlivens the vine and produces fruit, so the Spirit results in the fruit that pleases God in a human life.

As recorded in Philippians 1:9, Paul prayed that the love of the brethren would grow ever richer and richer in knowledge and insight of every kind, bringing upon them the gift of true discrimination. By this means they would be able to produce the full fruit of righteousness through Jesus Christ.

One need not be barren and unfruitful. A life of uselessness is a reflection upon God who created us to produce fruit and will make it possible for us to do so if we remain in Him. Jesus once condemned a fig tree, for it had "nothing but leaves." Our excuses are generally attempts to escape from reality and responsibility. We seek to make it appear that everything depends upon ourselves, when it is God who works in us to will and to do His good pleasure if we allow Him to do so.

A farmer taking care of a rock-strewn, hilly acreage in the Missouri Ozarks was reading his Bible one day while his team rested in the shade. For the first time in his life the message got through to him that every Christian had a responsibility to call others to the side of Christ, and that God would work in and with one who boldly testified of his faith. At noon that day he told his wife they must sell out and move. She was startled by this hasty decision. He explained that he had but little formal education and could not do a great deal among local people who knew more than himself. He reasoned that somewhere there were those more ignorant than he, and he could teach them and earn their gratitude.

Each day he prayed for God to show him where he should go. Two years later he found himself in the far north in an Eskimo fishing village. He purchased a boat, staffed it with natives, and on their first trip led them all to faith in Jesus. In a few brief years the people in two villages had become believers and had been trained to carry on for Christ and tell others the story. The one-time farmer now felt the urge to go to "regions beyond."

He entered the African bush country where missionaries had seldom appeared. He and his wife denied themselves the finer things of life to share with others. Although he could never speak the native tongues, he found willing, if sometimes inept, translators who could get the gist of the message through while the teacher drew diagrams in the dust with a stick. He often went into remote villages and leaned against the wheel of an ox wagon and talked through the entire day as his students squatted about him. His wife ministered to the sick and distressed. As a result, they adopted and reared two native babies whose mothers died in childbirth.

I met the aged couple in London while they were en route to the United States on their first visit back home in more than twenty years. I spent several days with them, and my own faith was deepened by this encounter. These saints of God were quite uneducated and would have been turned down by any examining committee or screening board for missionaries. Yet they had reached thousands of persons for Christ and converted whole villages. The work was being carried on in their absence by the two black children they had reared. These children were so thoroughly trained in the Scriptures that, even though hardly sixteen years of age, they could supervise the effort for Christ.

The aged and wrinkled missionary told me that it seemed almost by chance that, on the day his life was transformed into a worker for Christ on that Missouri farm, he connected in his mind two passages from God's Word: "Without me ye can do nothing . . . I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me" (John 15:5; Philippians 4:13; KJV). He never forgot these, and they remained his motto all of his life. He has long since gone to be with the Lord, but his fruit is still being gathered. "I knew that somewhere there were people more ignorant than myself, and if I could find them I could teach them." He found them on two continents and brought forth fruit among them. In spite of my own firm confidence in the Word of God, I always find myself greatly humbled by those who achieve so much regardless of educational handicaps, through simple, trusting faith.

The real productivity of the Spirit is best evidenced in a remarkable statement to the Galatians, in which the apostle contrasts the works of the flesh and the fruit of the Spirit. You will find the record in Galatians 5:1-16. Although several items are listed under each category, the term "works" is plural, while the singular form is used for the fruit of the Spirit. Life in the Spirit does not consist of the exhibition of certain virtues, but of a unified and harmonious existence under God's marvelous grace.

Verse 16 urges the Galatians to "walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh." It is essential that "the flesh" here be properly identified, because there is a tendency to think of it only in connection with sexual sins. This is encouraged by the use of the word "lust" in the Authorized Version. Such a limitation is not justifiable in this chapter. Many of the "works of the flesh" have no connection with sensuality or sex. One may walk in the flesh by engaging in "envy, fits of rage, selfish ambitions, and party intrigues," as certainly as if he indulged in fornication and indecency.

"The flesh" is simply "the lower nature," and the word is so translated in the New English Version. The flesh is man pursuing his own stubborn way, rejecting the guidance of the Spirit, and resisting the lordship of Jesus. It is life undisciplined and unrestrained by the power of God, asserting itself without reference to the divine will or purpose. Men who never committed an act of sexual impropriety may be walking in the flesh as certainly as the most flagrant adulterer.

It is not necessary to list all the things that enslave men and make them victims of the material and perishable. Paul does not consider the catalogue complete, seeing that he closes with the words, "and such like." Of one thing he is certain: Those who do such things will never inherit the kingdom of God. The Spirit is the key to the inheritance, and "they that are Christ's have crucified the (lower nature) with the affections and lusts" (Galatians 5:24; KJV).

The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faith, gentleness, and self-control. The heart pulsates with spiritual vitality in its contemplation of these noble attributes. They are the result of a transformed personality, and they could transform the world. No law exists to rebuke these. They can never be had in excess. There can never be too much love, joy, patience, or kindness. One need not limit goodness or faith. The more gentleness and self-control one has the better he will be, and the greater blessing he will be to those about him. The Spirit will produce this fruit in all who are committed to His power and strength. God be praised!

Slavery or Freedom?

Contents

A book, like human life on earth, must come to an end. This is true whether the book (or the life) is good or bad. If the content of this final chapter achieves its purpose, it will make your life better. The message will substitute faith for frustration and hope for hopelessness. It will take you by the hand and lead you in the path God has marked out through the "garden of prayer." And it will give meaning and power to your existence on earth.

This chapter will be devoted to a discussion of things mentioned in one chapter of the New Covenant Scriptures. Romans 8 can be called the chapter of the Holy Spirit. Every chapter in the Bible is such by origin, but this chapter deserves the designation because of content. It is a marvelous presentation of the blessings to be derived from the indwelling Spirit, an oasis for the earth-dweller who must wander through the desert with a desperate need for refreshment. If Martin Luther was correct in regarding Romans as the Alps of the Bible, this chapter is the highest peak, sublime in its towering majesty.

Recently I talked with a young man, a graduate from college, who had returned after a period of service abroad in the armed forces. He had started out to be a Christian while a mere lad, but when he was thrown into rough company away from home he allowed the temptations of the flesh to overcome him. He was unhappy, filled with remorse because he was living contrary to every principle he had been taught by godly parents. He felt powerless in the grip of sin and loneliness. One night, alone in his quarters, he opened the Bible for want of something to do, and by chance he began reading Romans 8. So powerfully was he impressed that he got up, went outside and walked under the stars, promising God that he would allow the Spirit to take over and command his life from that time on. Reinforced by this indwelling Helper, he returned home stronger than he was when he went away.

There is something tremendous about a chapter that can cleanse and purify lives in this manner. I know that, while I do not comprehend everything involved in this glorious chapter written by Paul, I have grasped enough of it to realize that it holds the divine secret for a power-packed life. I never read it without being elevated in heart. Romans 8 is God's chairlift to take me from the valley to the peak where I can breathe the pure air of Heaven and look down upon the smog.

Here the Spirit of the Lord becomes my friend and companion. Surely one who lives in the same apartment with another should come to know him. The Holy Spirit has moved in to the inner room of my tenement. He has taken down the "empty" sign and become the occupant together with my spirit. Now I am never lonely, for I am never alone. I do not feel forsaken or forlorn! I am happy in the knowledge that the heavenly visitor shares my abode. Let us look at what it really means to entertain this royal guest.

FREEDOM FROM CONDEMNATION

Perhaps no other thought brings a greater sense of despair to man than that of the condemnation hanging over him because of his sin. Life itself becomes a prison cell in which he is a captive awaiting death, and that is the foretaste of everlasting doom. But to be freed from dread, to know that death is conquered— that is a blessing almost indescribable. Yet, the apostle assures us "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Romans 8:1; KJV). Out of Christ, condemnation reigns and man is under the sentence of death. In Christ there is no condemnation. Out of Christ men walk according to the flesh. In Christ they walk according to the Spirit.

To "walk after the flesh" means more than simply to cater to passion. It entails this, but it means to live in such a state that Christ is left out of consideration. He is ignored. Decisions are made, and steps are taken without recourse to the demands of God. No authority is recognized except that of one's own wish and pleasure. On the other hand, to walk after the Spirit is to be ever conscious of the will and direction of God, regardless of the cost.

"For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace" (Romans 8:6; KJV); I think I may have talked about that for years before I really understood the profound truth embodied in it. The carnal mind simply discards God. Denial of the existence of God is not necessary. All that is necessary is to act as though God is not there, and to order one's existence with no thought of the divine will. The carnal mind thinks only in terms of the present. It asks immediate gratification and discounts the idea of any future reckoning. Because it looks forward to nothing, it grasps greedily at the now. It dies today for it has no tomorrow.

The Spirit changes all of that. He provides a happy yesterday because of memory without regret, a glorious today in the experience of God's joyful love, and a wonderful anticipation of tomorrow in a state of blessedness. Peace can be disturbed by the thought of past sins, present suffering, or future punishment. The spiritual mind, being free from all of these, has life and peace.

DEATH OF UNRIGHTEOUSNESS

Anyone who has wrestled with some evil tendency knows the agony of his trying to overcome it while the flesh cries out for gratification. Paul described the condition by saying, "To will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not" (7:18; KJV). God made us, loves us, and knows more about our nature than we do. For that reason He has not left us to grapple alone with the problem.

In the first place, Jesus paid the full obligation we owe to the flesh. The debt of sin was canceled by His blood. "Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh" (8:12). I do not owe sinful human nature one thing. I am free from every debt it once held against me. No sin can have any rightful claim upon my life. I have been bought with a price and so I no longer belong to myself.

In the second place, God has invested me with His Spirit to put to death the evil deeds that once enticed me. Listen! "For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live" (v. 13). We sometimes use the word mortify in these days to indicate embarrassment. We may use such an expression as, "I was mortified by the language he used in my presence." But that is not the meaning of the word in the Scriptures.

Mortus means death. A mortal wound results in death. A mortician prepares the bodies of the dead. A mortuary is a place where the corpses may be viewed. To mortify means to kill. Paul is simply saying that the power of the indwelling Spirit of God enables us to put to death the evil passions and corrupt desires.

In recent years those who had been addicted to drugs have occasionally testified that when they surrendered wholly and completely to Christ and turned their lives over to God, they were able immediately to conquer the dread habit without any physical withdrawal symptoms. This was seriously questioned by men in the medical profession, and research projects were inaugurated in some cases to determine the accuracy of the reports. In several cases it was found that former addicts were telling the truth about their victory. One research team reported, "Our investigation indicated that those who testified to immediate conquest of the addiction when subjected to a religious experience of deep significance were stating a fact. It was as if some powerful inner force was operative, enabling them to overcome the need to which they had been subjected and of which they been victims."

The Holy Spirit is that "powerful inner force" and dwells in men to help them glorify God in both body and spirit. A man who had grown up in a home where profanity was a way of communication, found himself powerless to overcome the habit, for it had become natural to him. When he turned himself over to Jesus, he prayed for divine help. He said that he felt as though his heart had been scrubbed clean and his tongue had been purged. His manner of speech was transformed. The Spirit had put to death the deeds of the body.

Another man had become a compulsive gambler, and had wrecked his home, forcing away his wife and little son. He was led to believe in Jesus by a former gambling companion who had found an answer for his own life in the Son of God. The man who had neglected his home, his business, and all else to sit at the gambling table, now implored not only divine mercy but divine aid. He was serious about it and from the time he gave himself to Christ Jesus he no longer felt the need to engage in games of chance. On the contrary, he became a living example of the rescued life. He was thrilled when I told him that Christians were known in the world of the early Greeks as "the gamblers" because they were willing to risk everything, including life on earth, to follow Jesus as the Lord of life.

It does not seem advisable to leave this line of thought without pointing out the statement immediately following the expression, "If ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live." The very next sentence is "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." The word "for" joins the two sentences and demonstrates that we are able to overcome the baser passions and desires. We have a relationship to the Father in which the Spirit becomes the energizing power enabling us to become more like God.

Think of the implications in the phrase "led by the Spirit of God." The original for "led" is ago. Two things can be said of its usage in the New Covenant Scriptures. First, it generally applies to persons, and has to do with their motivation to act. Second, it implies willingness and cooperation on the part of those who are led. The leading is not by force. It is not against the will. To be led by the Spirit is to surrender to the influence and guidance of the Spirit. This is a proof of divine sonship. Only sons of God will be led by the Spirit, and thus, when one is so led he has a personal relationship with God. This is quite different from the measuring rods employed by men.

Jesus placed the term "son of God" on a higher plane, morally, than a mere tie of relationship with the Father. There are certain characteristics stated as conditions. For example, only peacemakers can be truly regarded as children of God. This is brought out by Jesus in Matthew 5:9. If one belongs to a religious organization and has a good knowledge of Scripture, yet is guilty of sowing discord among brethren or of refusing to labor for peace, he cannot be called a child of God. True children of God wage peace as actively as others wage war.

Again, Jesus postulates love, even for those who despitefully use you and are enemies, as the criterion of sonship. He says, "Love your enemies, and pray for them which persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven" (Matthew 5:44; KJV). Love for those who are hostile toward God and ourselves is not simply the best policy, or the way of kindness and pacifism. Love is an essential of the divine-human relationship. This kind of love is a fruit of the Spirit. Not simply an outgrowth of temperament, it is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. The sons of God are those who are led, directed, motivated by, and filled with the Spirit of God. What a triumph over the flesh when one can walk in the Spirit, that is, when every step he takes is in the atmosphere created by the Spirit. Thus, we glorify God.

WITNESS TO SONSHIP

Romans 8:15-17 is one of the most comforting passages in the revelation of God. It is so filled with beauty and majesty that perhaps most persons who read it will go through life without ever probing its depths. Read it and meditate upon it:

> "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together" (KJV).

The spiritual implications of a term are difficult to understand if one is not familiar with its natural relationships. In our culture, "the spirit of bondage" may be passed over lightly by a modern reader. We have never experienced the agony of physical slavery and cannot fully appreciate "the spirit of slavery" as applied to sin. On the contrary, we may regard the life of sin as a pleasant time of indulgence that we are called upon to give up or "sacrifice" for Jesus Christ. Thus, the life in Christ is actually regarded as a bondage to which we surrender ourselves, more or less reluctantly, in order to secure a reward.

This was not the case with the citizens of Rome. One writer tells us that the period which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was one of horror and degradation unequalled in the history of mankind. Of the state of things in Rome at this time, Canon Farrar writes, "At the lowest extreme of the social scale were millions of slaves without family, without religion, without possessions, who had no recognized rights, and towards whom none had any recognized duties, passing normally from a childhood of degradation to a manhood of hardship, and an old age of unpitied neglect."[11]

The French historian Du Pape declares that it can be fairly well authenticated that there were sixty million slaves in the Roman Empire when the gospel was first proclaimed. We are indebted to Cornelius Tacitus, the Roman historian, born the year Paul began his third preaching tour, for the information that the slaves were so numerous they were divided and registered according to their nationalities. And Seneca, the philosopher, the brother of Gallio before whom Paul was brought (Acts 18:12), writes that every slave was under a constant cloud of suspicion as a potential enemy.

To illustrate the enduring fear associated with slavery, I need mention only one incident recorded by Tacitus. The Roman Senate was debating the murder of Pedanius Secundus by one of his slaves. C. Cassius Longinus arose and gravely argued for enforcement of the Silanian law, which made it mandatory to kill all of the slaves owned by a master who was murdered. One after another of the senators came to the rostrum to vote for this sanguinary law. Remembering that such masters often owned hundreds of slaves and that these were in constant jeopardy by the act of one hothead or brutal criminal one can see how cheaply life was regarded by the patricians or ruling classes.

The citizens of Rome could make an immediate application of Paul's statement to the fear of slavery and degradation of sin. The fact is that his letter was written just the year before the meeting of the Senate described by Tacitus. Nothing was glamorous about slavery. Slaves were sustained only by the faint hope of freedom, or by the certain hope of death.

While we are a long way from the conditions so described, we can still offer a few suggestions about "the spirit of slavery" to sin from which we have been set free by the grace of God.

(1) Slavery to sin destroys human dignity, reducing one to the animal level, making him a victim of passion and inordinate desire. Peter writes, "But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption" (2 Peter 2:12; KJV).

(2) Slavery to sin demands all of our powers and resources, and places every faculty under tribute. Sin reigning in our mortal bodies exacts obedience to the body's desires. It forces us to put all of our parts at its disposal as instruments for wrongdoing (Romans 6:12, 13). Sin is the most cruel taskmaster in the universe.

(3) Slavery to sin reduces us to servitude and then pays off with death. Sin promises everything and provides nothing. "When ye were the servants of sin, ye were free from righteousness. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death" (vv. 20, 21; KJV).

(4) Slavery to sin brings only misery and despair. "We know that the law is spiritual: but I am carnal, sold under sin . . . O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (7:14, 24).

(5) Slavery to sin forces its captives to breathe the polluted and poisonous atmosphere of fear. All of their lifetime they are subject to bondage through fear of death (Hebrews 2:15), and fear brings the dread of approaching judgment (1 John 4:18).

Over against the frightful state conjured up in the mind at mention of this "spirit of slavery" is another term, "the spirit of adoption." No more significant expression could be used to indicate a complete transformation in the Roman mind. From slavery to adoption would be like a Horatio Alger book, From Rags to Riches. Only if we understand the legal adoptive process can we ever grasp what the apostle is saying. Fortunately, there has been preserved in Roman laws a mass of material related to the adoption process, a very serious business in Rome.

Notice the use of the expression, "very serious business" with reference to Roman adoptive procedures. It was made especially serious because of the law called patria potestas. This law gave a father absolute authority over his offspring as long as they lived. It conferred upon the father the right to punish a son regardless of the son's age. He could kill his son and no one could lift a finger against him.

In 450 B.C. a revolt developed among the common people against the patricians. They alleged that the patricians abused the unwritten law and took advantage of them, denying them their civil rights. The magistrates, in order to avoid a revolution, were commissioned to draw up a code, inscribing it upon ten tablets. These were accepted by the popular assembly. Later two more tablets were added to make the great body of laws known as Lex Duodecim Tabularium, the "law of the twelve tablets." The laws became the supreme law of the land.

The patria potestas stemmed from the second stipulation of the fourth tablet. It provided for the control of a father over his children. His right existed during their whole life to imprison, scourge, keep to rustic labor in chains, to sell or slay, even though they may have been high state officials. A son could not own land in his own name as long as his father lived.

We must try to catch the atmosphere in Rome when Paul wrote to the Romans about slavery and adoptions. In order to do this I shall insert a quotation from Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

His testimony is especially valuable because he was a Greek historian living in Rome at the time Augustus issued his decree for the whole Roman Empire to enroll for taxation purposes. Dionysius wrote Roman Antiquities, a twenty-volume history of his adopted city. Nine of these have been preserved in their entirety, and in one of them is this description of the patria potestas:

> The law-giver of the Romans gave virtually full power to the father over his son, whether he thought proper to imprison him, to scourge him, to put him in chains, and keep him at work in the fields or to put him to death; and this even though the son was already engaged in public affairs, though he were numbered among the highest magistrates, and though he were celebrated for his zeal for the commonwealth. Indeed in virtue of this law men of distinction while delivering speeches from the rostra, hostile to the senate and pleasing to the people, and enjoying great popularity on that account, have been dragged down from thence, and carried away by their fathers, to undergo such punishment as these thought fit; and while they were being led away through the forum, none present, neither consul, tribune, nor the very populace which was flattering them, and thought all power inferior to its own, could rescue them.[12]

Adoption involved the transfer of a person from the absolute control of his whole life by one man to the absolute control of his life by another. There had to be a complete surrender of the power of life and death by one and a complete assumption of that power by another. So drastic was this change that the one who was transferred to another patria potestas was looked upon as a wholly new creature. He was said to be born again, or born anew. A whole new existence began for him on the day the transfer of allegiance was ratified. Never again would he be subject in any sense to his former relationship. It was as if he had literally died to his past.

The ceremony of adoption was always public, requiring at least five witnesses. There were two parts to it. The first was called mancipatio. From this we get our word emancipate, which means to transfer ownership. It derives from manus, hand; and capero, to take. In a sale, an article was taken in hand by the new owner. In mancipatio the father, the child, and the prospective father took their places with five witnesses upon the dais in the Forum. One of these, called the librapens(bearer of the scales) held a pair of balances in one hand and a short brass rod in the other.

The prospective father said, "This day I purchase your son for my own." He then placed a coin in one pan of the balance. The father placed the son's hand in the other pan, but before the sale could be completed he removed the boy's hand, and the other removed his coin. This identical procedure was again enacted. But the third time the father did not remove the hand of the son. The scales were struck with the brass rod as a sign that the sale was completed. The coin was given to the boy as a sign that he would inherit from the new father. It was a seal of his relationship. Even to this day, we say, "The third time is the charm."

There remained one more step called vindicatio. In Roman law this meant to affirm and assert one's legal right to a thing. The new father took the adopted son to a magistrate and had his new name properly inscribed in the census tables and the right of patria potestas, of life and death, passed into his hands. All of this is most interesting to me, but it is secondary to the purpose of the apostle Paul. His primary desire is to impress upon the Romans the great blessings that accrue to us in Christ. The privileges that were bestowed by adoption in Rome included:

(1) The one adopted was ushered into a whole new family relationship, with a new father and new brothers and sisters, and this was the direct result of the father's choice. He was a chosen one, an elected person. The word "adoption" means to choose, as our word option indicates.

(2) The one adopted was given a new name, clearly indicative of his new relationship.

(3) The adopted one was permitted to eat at the father's table, a privilege never accorded slaves. In the Greek world such eating together was an expression of koinonia, fellowship, the sharing of the common life of the father and his family.

(4) He became heir of the estate of the father. If there was an elder brother he became a joint heir with him. He shared in both the hardships and rewards of the family, for this was part of their common life, the fellowship.

(5) When one was adopted by Roman law, his past life was literally blotted out. His former name was removed from the roster of citizenship. All debts were canceled, all obligations deleted. The adopted person began a new life with the slate wiped clean. Even his education began anew. Cicero said the aim of this education was to produce "self-control, combined with dutiful affection to parents and kindliness to kindred."

Paul speaks of the Spirit in connection with the cry "Abba, Father." He says that we did not receive the spirit of slavery to promote fear, but the Spirit of adoption to enable us to utter these lovely words. Two passages contain the expression "Abba Father." According to Romans 8:15 the Spirit enables us to say these words. Galatians 4:6 records that the Spirit thus cries out. In both cases our divine sonship is under consideration. We are adopted, that is, given the place of a son. Adoption is from huiothesis, to place as a son. Because we are inducted into the glorious family we are able to cry, "Abba, Father." That is, we are able, through the Spirit, to recognize our real relationship to Christ.

There is more to it than this. The word abba could not have been translated "father." It is an Aramaic word, and was the first expression of a little child in the East. In our country little children say "Da-da" or "Pa-pa" and we must transliterate with "Daddy" and "Papa" to indicate that these are the simple, unaffected, and spontaneous expressions of love in early life. We could not capture this meaning to translate by supplying the word "father."

Paul knew well that the Jews had a strict law forbidding a slave to use the word "abba" in addressing a master or the head of a household. So when he wants to show that we are sons, and not slaves, he makes it clear that the indwelling Spirit identifies us as children of God and makes it possible for us to speak to the Father in a fashion that slaves were not allowed to use. And so close is the union between the Holy Spirit and my own spirit that only the Father can discern which one is calling out to Him.

But the Spirit not only makes it possible for me to cry Abba, but also Father. The first is the cry of emotion and feeling, the tender call of a little child. The second is the form of address of a mature person. W. E. Vine points out that the last word is a wholly different form of address, and that it indicates an intelligent recognition of the relationship sustained with the one so addressed. The word "father" involves confidence and obedience, and when taken with the other word shows a relationship of love and intelligent trust.

But we are told that "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ" (Romans 8:16, 17; KJV). What does this tremendous statement mean? Remember that Paul is contrasting the state of slavery with the superb experience of sonship. I have described for you the public ceremony of adoption. The sale of a slave, having many of the same aspects, also took place in the presence of witnesses and involved a pair of balances and a deposit of money in one of the pans of the balance.

Suppose the father of an adopted child died, and the natural sons hated the one who was adopted and wanted to debar him from his inheritance. They could claim that he was never adopted at all, but was simply purchased as a slave. The adopted son would have to bring a witness to corroborate his own testimony. If he could find the librapens, the scales bearer, that one could say, "I was present, and I know he is a son because I struck the brass ingot and sealed the transaction."

The Holy Spirit exists in us for that very purpose. He is a seal of my redemption. "Now he which stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God; who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (2 Corinthians 12:1, 22; KJV).

The indwelling Spirit is God's guarantee that I am going to inherit every provision of grace. I am not a slave. I am a son. My spirit testifies of this. The Holy Spirit testifies the same. I am even a joint heir with Christ. This establishes the quality of our sonship. Whatever is the lot of Jesus is to be my lot. We are "sharers together" with everything that sonship involves. This is the matter to which the Spirit witnesses.

When Paul affirms that the Spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God, he assures us that the testimony of our spirit and the Holy Spirit is that we are not sold into slavery. We have been adopted in the majestic family of our Father in Heaven. The promise of Jesus that He would not leave us orphans has come true. Two witnesses within proclaim this fact: the spirit of man and the Spirit of God.

HELP IN WEAKNESS

The difference between one's being in Christ Jesus and being on the outside is hope. It is not that those on the outside do not have hope, for all men do. The difference lies in the varying degree of intensity. Those who know the Lord find their hope increasing as they grow older. Those who do not know Him find their hope waning, and frequently being supplanted by two malign evils to personality— dread and despair.

Every rational person realizes that he is not going to get out of the human predicament alive. All of his plans for postponing the inevitable are doomed. His string is going to run out. The thread is going to be snipped. The Christian "sustained by an unfaltering trust" is able to "wrap the drapery of his couch about him and lie down to pleasant dreams." Not so the one who sins away his day of grace and suddenly faces the blackness of hopelessness. Without hope we are of all men most miserable.

What is hope? The simplest definition is "a joyous anticipation of the future." Although hope is related to expectation they are not the same. One may expect bad as well as good, storm as well as sunshine. Only when expectation is accompanied by desire is the ingredient of hope included. We desire some things we do not expect, and expect some things we do not desire, but when we have desire and expectation in equal proportion, we possess hope.

Hope is not a retreat for the cowardly or inadequate. Instead, it is a resilient and powerful quality of the soul, lingering on even when the rationalization argues that it is futile. Long after others have given up the search for one who is lost, a mother keeps the light burning in her heart, reacting to every step on the porch, and every knock on the door. We are Abrahams, hoping "when hope seems hopeless" (Romans 4:18).

My faith and my hope are grounded on the same foundation as was Abraham's. Faith and hope are a firm conviction of the validity of every promise of God, because God makes the visible things out of invisible things. The first is the ultimate in power, the second the ultimate in knowledge. God raised Jesus from the dead. So God can raise men from the dead.

And He has promised me I will share in eternal life on a more magnificent scale than I can imagine now.

The fact is that Jesus made sense out of death by making sense out of life. By showing me how to live He taught me how to die. The last gasp of oxygen into my collapsing lungs is of no real consequence. Lifting the latch is not the important matter, but what lies beyond the door. I am convinced that ineffable joy awaits in the other room. Jesus has begotten in me a living hope. "But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you. To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen" (1 Peter 5:10, 11; KJV).

Beginning with Romans 8:18, Paul places suffering and splendor in proper perspective. Suffering is for a while; splendor is after a while. The whole created universe, now writhing in agony, is standing on tiptoe, as the original Greek means. It is looking down the long road, waiting for the spectacle of triumph when the sons of God come into their own. The people of God give meaning to the whole creation. Man was at the peak of God's creation. His fall subjected the whole domain to despair. His final victory will bring rejoicing to all. Hope is written in shining letters of gold across the face of the whole created order of things.

"For we are saved by hope: but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?" (Romans 8:24; KJV). This does not mean that hope is an agent or cause of our salvation. We are not saved by hope as an operating principle. The point at issue here is that we have been saved, but there is more to come. In our flesh and blood we are not adapted for existence in a celestial realm. We have not yet shared in all to which our salvation makes us heirs. There is something for which our universe is expectant, joyfully and triumphantly expectant.

When hope becomes reality it ceases to function. The sight of the goal renders hope unnecessary. The endurance test is over. The waiting period is ended. Expectancy gives way to experience; anticipation becomes enjoyment. This is the essence of the Christian life. Tears and trials today; smiles and splendor tomorrow.

After pointing out how patient waiting for something develops within us a real sense of endurance, Paul makes a statement to strengthen the weary heart and invigorate once more those who feel they no longer are getting through to Heaven. Every day of our lives we need to meditate and ponder upon this declaration of divine grace:

> Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God (Romans 8:26, 27; KJV).

Hope comes to our aid in counteracting despair and helps us to endure in spite of suffering. But we have another helper, for the Spirit comes to the aid of our weakness. He does so in many departments of life, including prayer.

We are ignorant of many things with regard to prayer. It is far easier to theorize about prayer than it is to practice praying. Often we develop stereotyped words and phrases we repeat monotonously and with little consciousness or real concern. Sometimes we cannot express the real concern. Sometimes we cannot articulate the real burdens or find words in which to couch our deepest longings. All of us have found occasions when we wanted to pray and could not really do so.

For just such emergencies God has given us the indwelling Spirit as an intercessor. We have only one Mediator, one bridge builder, the man Christ Jesus. But we can have many intercessors. Indeed, we are all to make intercession for one another (1 Timothy 2:1). And we have two divine intercessors, one dwelling in us and the other in Heaven. The Holy Spirit intercedes from within (Romans 8:26), and Jesus intercedes at God's right hand (Romans 8:34).

The Spirit translates our inward inexpressible desires into prayer, taking the intangible and inarticulate groanings of the inner man and putting them in the words of heavenly language. Thus we can be sure that we are on a direct line to the throne room in glory if we are in Christ Jesus.

I have often found relief in prayer, especially when I was in deep need of forgiveness and divine understanding. The greatest consolation comes when I realize that all does not depend upon human vocabulary. The Spirit decodes my impulses and desires and transmits them in rational language. God hears and grace takes over. I do not so much need to learn how to pray, although that is important, as I need to learn how to trust.

God searches and penetrates the recesses of my being. He knows my every thought and intent. He also knows the mind of the Spirit. The communion between God and the Spirit is absolute. It is perfect. There is no faulty connection. The line is never shorted out. The Spirit makes intercession for the saints according to the will of God. He pleads for God's own people in God's own way. If nothing else prompted me to be one of the people of God, this alone would be sufficient motivation. I need to be one of the saints because I desperately need the Spirit as an intercessor.

I hold that Jesus is Lord over life. That means the whole life, all of it. I do not accept the fragmented personality that "saves Sunday out" to serve God. One does not turn the grace of God off and on like the faucet on a kitchen sink. God is interested in everything that I do. He watches me mow the lawn, trim the shrubs, and roast wieners. I can do all these to His praise and glory. Certainly He wants me to sit down with the saints at the Lord's Table, but He also wants our kitchen table to be His when my wife and I sit down together and join in thanking Him for His blessings.

The Holy Spirit is a constant companion. He does not remain at home when you go to work. He does not stay behind when you go to the stadium to watch a football game. The beautiful thing about God's whole arrangement is that He can order and arrange everything to work out for our ultimate good. Even our foolish mistakes and blunders can be made to fit into a pattern of life. Sorrow and suffering can be woven into life until they actually enhance the design instead of wrecking it.

I do not think it is by sheer chance that Paul includes in this wonderful chapter on the indwelling Spirit that thrilling statement, "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose" (Romans 8:28; KJV). Praise His wonderful name! Let us all rejoice in God, through the Spirit who fills us and thrills us and gives us the peace that passes human understanding.

I doubt that a lot of authors really know what made them write their books. That may be a good thing, otherwise some writers would never be able to live with their own consciences. This little book is different. I know why I wrote it, although its content represents a viewpoint in direct contradiction to what I would have expressed a few years ago. Like so many others who believe in Christ, as I grew older and was able to form more mature judgments, I became more aware and discerning of the meaning of grace. It was this new insight which made such an inward change in my life and it clamored for expression.

Even at that, I probably would not have written had it not been that I met A. V. Mansur, a retired dry-land farmer who lives in California. Mr. Mansur and his wife are quiet and reserved, living modestly and simply, away from what the poet calls "the madding throng's ignoble strife." But they are meditative and contemplative. Their early life of toil taught them much about our relationship to, and our dependence upon, the Creator of the universe.

A deepening penetration of the revelation of God encouraged Mr. Mansur to feel that in Christ we are freed from enslavement to law, that God no longer relates to His people upon the basis of their conformity to a written code. This demanded a refocusing of the apostolic letters and re-examination of the very nature of the "new covenant," referred to in Hebrews 8:7-13. Fortunately, it was about this time that I began stating my growing convictions along the same lines, and my California friend and brother urged me to place them in a more permanent and useful form. This book is the result.

If you are benefited in your reading of this little thesis, you must give any glory and praise to Him "whom having not seen we love." Certainly the writer and the one who encouraged him to write can take little credit. Neither one can lay claim to any profundity or erudition, and both are content to be simply slaves of Jesus.

In 1706, the philosopher, John Locke, wrote, "Reading furnishes the mind only with materials of knowledge; it is thinking makes what we read ours." This book intends only to share building blocks of thought. It is hoped they will prove helpful in your construction of a life worthy of the divine call.

The God of Covenants

Daniel Webster, who was born in New Hampshire in 1782, became one of the most eloquent orators ever to grace the American scene. His orations helped to launch him upon a career of public service which carried him to the United States Senate, and made him Secretary of State under three presidents.

On one occasion, Mr. Webster was asked to state the most important thought that ever occurred to his mind. His reply was simple and pointed. "The most important thought I ever had," he said, "was that of my individual responsibility to God."

If this was the most important thought to lodge in such a brilliant brain, perhaps all of us should ponder it carefully and honestly. It would be well for us to explore the nature of God's relationship with man as revealed in the Bible. This will help us to understand the mercy of God, and why we are not under law, but under grace.

In the orderly process of creation, when God had formed the material universe, He said, "Come now, let us make man in our own image." It is apparent from subsequent Scriptural disclosures, that this statement was addressed to the Living Word who was with God and was God (John 1:1). Concerning the Word it was said, "All things were made through him, and without him was not anything made that was made" (John 1:3; RSV).

The "image of God" had no reference to man's physical frame. Man bears the image of God because he is a rational, intelligent, and creative personality. It is the spirit, not the clay dwelling of the spirit, which bears the imprint of the divine image. When man was created, God declared that it was not good for man to be alone. By his very nature man is a social being. His personality develops best by association with others of his own kind. So God made a helpmeet worthy of man and presented her to him as a companion.

At the same time the family relationship was instituted by a divine decree. God said, "For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh" (Matthew 19:5; KJV). As a place for the pair to dwell a garden was created eastward in Eden, and man was assigned the task of overseeing it and keeping it trim and neat. It was here that God placed the first limitation upon the primeval pair. He granted them permission to eat of the fruit of every tree in the garden except one. The tree of knowledge of good and evil was off limits. God said, "You shall not eat of it, for the day you eat of it you will die."

The rest of the story is well known. Satan, adopting the form of the serpent, enticed the woman by the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. She ate of the forbidden fruit and gave it to her husband, who also ate of it. Sin thus entered the world. The effect was seen immediately. The man and woman, enveloped in a sense of shame, sought to hide from the presence of God. Several thousand years later Paul summed up the consequences by saying, "Sin came into the world through one man and death through sin, and so death spread to all men because all men sinned" (Romans 5:12; RSV).

In order to preclude the possibility that man would eat of the tree of life and live forever in a state of alienation and disgrace, God ejected Adam and Eve from the paradise in which He had placed them. But even at the beginning there was a ray of hope penetrating the darkness of despair. In pronouncing a sentence of degradation upon the serpent, God said, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel" (KJV). The head of the serpent is the seat of his power. The venom in his fangs produces death. The time would come when the seed of the woman, although bruised by the serpent, would destroy or crush the one who had power over death.

The world of mankind had to pass through stages of development similar to those of the individuals who composed it. The world had its infancy, childhood, and adolescence, before it attained maturity. Just as parents must accommodate their instruction, training, and discipline to the state of their children at a given time, so God likewise had to adjust His requirements to the condition of humanity in progressive phases.

A realization of this fact leads to certain inevitable conclusions. Things that might be condoned in one age could not be continued in another. We smile at the antics of a little child, but realize that the same actions on the part of an older person would be an occasion for regret and reproof. The principle of human responsibility is stated by the apostle Paul to the Athenian philosophers in the statement, "The times of ignorance God overlooked, but now he commands all men everywhere to repent" (Acts 17:30; RSV).

God has never required of man in any age what he is unable to perform. He has always adjusted His mandates to meet the needs and abilities of man in the circumstances in which he is found. A good illustration of this is found in what may be termed "the evolution of the demonstration of worship." Certainly the God who is "over all, through all, and in all," has the right, and even the obligation, of revealing what is acceptable as worship of His majesty at any time.

When man lived in a nomadic culture, he was required to offer sacrifices upon an altar consisting of an earthen mound. When certain geographical spots became hallowed because of significant events, a more permanent altar of field stones was permitted. However, to avoid any temptation to idolatry, all engraving or carving upon the face of the stones was forbidden (Exodus 20:24, 25). Later, when God separated a people from bondage to form a nation, He provided for them a tent, or tabernacle, suitable to their wandering life for forty years in the wilderness.

When this same people settled in a land that was to become their own, God selected a city where He inscribed His name. Here they were permitted to erect a house, the magnificence of which was unsurpassed in its day. In spite of its lavish beauty and splendor, it was to provide only a temporary place for adoration of God. At the dedication service, the king who supervised and financed its erection acknowledged that it could never qualify as a dwelling for God (2 Chronicles 6:18).

When Jesus came into the world to share the human lot, He made it clear that the worship of God was not to be limited by time or place. "'Neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem will you worship the Father. God is spirit, and those who worship him must worship in spirit and truth'" (John 4:21, 24; RSV). God now has no holy places, holy days, or holy things. All of these belong to a childhood age that we should have outgrown. God now has only a holy people. The only sanctuary is a consecrated human heart. The only temple is the one composed of living stones. Those who dedicate piles of brick and stone, and speak in awed tones of "the sanctuary" are spiritually infantile. They have not "put away childish things."

There is but one more step awaiting. There remains a new Jerusalem to be revealed. John, who was given a preview of the city, wrote, "I saw no temple therein" (Revelation 21:22; KJV). No other observation more fully conveys the difference between life on our material planet and that in the eternal state. There is not a city upon earth that does not contain edifices devoted to worship. In the city of the Ultimate there will be no place of worship. There the temple at last becomes divinely personal: "For the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it."

Responsibility is always gauged by man's ability to respond. God has revealed His will progressively, as man was able to grasp it and fulfill it. Human responsibility was thus judged upon the basis of man's place in history at the time. Yet there is one fact about the divine-human relationship which is always the same. This fact is that God has chosen to relate to man on the basis of covenants. He is a covenant-making God. No one who ignores this fact will ever fully grasp God's plan and purpose in any age.

God's covenants with man are always acts of divine grace. They stem from the fact that God is love, and it is the nature of this love to be ever active and outgoing toward its object. There is no obligation owed to sinful man to compel the Creator to continue to act toward him in such a manner as to promote his welfare. The covenants of God grow out of the nature of God, and not out of the nature of man.

A simple covenant is an agreement between two parties. In a human covenant the party of the first part and the party of the second part are equals before the law. This cannot be the case in a divine-human covenant, however. God always must be regarded as supreme. He is sovereign in the universe. He proposes and man accepts. Man is in no position to bargain with God or to sue for better terms.

While God proposes terms of His covenants, He never imposes them. Man is free to refuse the proffered relationship when it is conditional. In most instances a sign or seal of the covenant is provided. Such a visible token serves as a constant reminder of the relationship. Like a wedding ring, it is a symbol of a covenant in force, to both those who were parties to the covenant and those who were not.

As a working basis for continued study, let us summarize with the statement of two facts that are apparent to every person who is informed in the revelation of God. These will be foundational for all else that is deduced from the sacred Scriptures.

1. Covenant Relationship. God has chosen to relate to mankind on the basis of covenants. All of God's covenants with man have been designed to achieve the good of humanity. God has revealed himself as a covenant-making God. He has entered into agreements based upon His perfect character. He has placed himself on record by making immutable promises. The fact that one covenant supersedes another is not attributable to fickleness or caprice, but to the changing condition of the world of mankind. Our relationship to God must be a covenantal one. We must enter such an agreement freely as the party of the second part. It is a profound truth that the infinite Creator respects the sovereignty of the human will, to the extent that the created may reject the Creator. Finite man may refuse the hand that made him, but he cannot refuse the consequences that follow.

2. Rules or Ordinances. God has arranged that all of the blessings and privileges He confers upon men shall be enjoyed in conjunction with ordinances of His own appointment. This is true in both the natural and spiritual realms. Thus we read of the ordinances of the sun, moon, and stars in Jeremiah 31:35, 36. The same word is employed here for "ordinances" as is used for expressions of worship. One might as well try to secure light in the material realm without the sun and moon as to seek for light in the spiritual domain without God's revelation.

The primitive root from which "ordinance" is derived, literally means "to hack." It referred first to the action of cutting messages and directions in the bark of trees. Then it came to refer to the action of carving in stone slabs or pillars by use of a chisel and hammer. It is significant that the words of the Ten Commandments were written in stone tablets by the finger of God, the Holy Spirit. The word finally progressed until it meant "to engrave." Laws and enactments were originally chiseled in stone, and later scratched or engraved in metal plates. Thus, the term eventually came to mean an enactment or appointment, generally by proper authority. God's blessings are in response to God's ordinances.

With this introductory and background material we can examine the initial covenant God introduced and preserved in the Scriptural record. It will be confusing to refer to God's commandment with Noah as "the first covenant." That term was appropriated by a divine writer and applied to a later covenant enacted to create a special nation out of former slaves. That nation was designed to keep alive on earth the concept of monotheism, that is, belief in one God (Cp. Hebrews 8:7, 11). The initial covenant was made with Noah. It was the first in point of time, but not the first in terms of importance to the purpose of God. A study of it, however, will lay the groundwork for investigation of other covenants of God.

The Covenant with Noah

Contents

The word "antediluvian" has been given to the age before the flood. It simply means "preceding the deluge." It was an age saturated with gross iniquity. There were two strains of humanity then in existence. The descendants of Seth called themselves by the name of the Lord. They were "sons of God." The descendants of Cain were loose and dissolute men. The two families mingled in marriage. Their offspring became violent, and as a result, wickedness was great in the earth. Every imagination of the thoughts of human hearts was evil continually, and the Lord was sorry He had made man. It grieved Him in His heart. He declared, "'I will blot out man whom I have created from the face of the ground, man and beast and creeping things and birds of the air, for I am sorry that I have made them'" (Genesis 6:7; RSV).

There was one exception, a man by the name of Noah. He is introduced with two remarkable statements. The first reads, "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord" (v. 8). The second says, "Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God" (vv. 8, 9). This is the first time the word "grace" is used in the Bible, and Noah was the first man to be called "just."

The original Hebrew word for "grace" is one that suggests an active personal principle manifesting itself, not in a mere attitude, but in deed. It is not an abstract quality but a vital demonstration. It may be properly defined as a free bestowal of kindness upon another who does not deserve the blessing, and has no means of adequately paying for it. God looked upon Noah with favor, which manifested itself in the provision for his escape from the determined destruction.

The word "just" is akin to the word for "righteousness," and this is a word of relationship. Noah had kept himself free from the contamination of the social culture. He walked with God instead of with the world. A direct descendant of Seth, he had kept his association pure. He was "blameless in his generation" (RSV). God disclosed to Noah His determination to make an end of all flesh because violence reigned in the earth. Probation was to be extended for 120 years, during which time Noah was to construct an ark.

The means chosen to purge the earth was a cleansing bath of water. Since every nation of antiquity has its tradition of the flood, this may account for the almost universal ritual employment of water as a symbol for purification. After more than a year in the ark, Noah and his family stepped forth into a new world. Noah's first act was to construct an altar. In the role of patriarchal priest he offered sacrifices of every clean beast and bird. The sacrificial odor pleased the Lord, who vowed never again to destroy every living creature as He had done. The lifetime of the earth would be an undisturbed continuity.

Noah and his sons now constituted God's sole representatives for the population of the new world. Accordingly, they were given the identical responsibility conferred originally upon Adam. "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Genesis 1:28; 9:1; KJV).

The first recorded covenant that God made with the world of His creation, was a covenant including every creature in whose nostrils was the breath of life. God informed Noah and his sons that He would establish His covenant with them and their descendants, and with the birds, cattle, and every beast of the earth, that had come out of the ark. The fact that God included all these in a covenant should give us deep concern about endangered species.

The terms of the covenant were plainly announced: "'I establish my covenant with you, that never again shall all flesh be cut off by the waters of a flood, and never again shall there be a flood to destroy the earth'" (Genesis 9:11; RSV). The duration of the covenant was fixed for "all future generations." Thus it was designated "an everlasting covenant" (Genesis 9:16).

The Hebrew word for "everlasting" is olam. It is one of several terms signifying duration. In its origin it signified veiling or concealing from sight. Gradually it came to mean that which extended beyond one's vision, and finally developed the connotation of "age-lasting." To determine the extent of the duration one must study the limitations that appear in the context. In this instance they are clearly given. The covenant is to stand while the earth remains, or while the descendants of Noah in all future generations remain upon the earth.

A visible sign of the covenant was given, which would be observable for its duration. God said, "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth" (Genesis 9:13). God nowhere says that the bow is to bring to man's remembrance that a flood will never again destroy the earth. Instead, God said, "'When I bring clouds over the earth and the bow is seen in the clouds, I will remember my covenant'" (Genesis 9:14, 15; RSV). Thus the bow is not so much a reminder to us of the agreement as it is a sign of God's covenant faithfulness. As such a symbol we may expect it to recur in any circumstances where the divine fidelity is to be displayed. For this reason, the rainbow is used in conjunction with the throne of God (Cp. Revelation 4:3).

Inasmuch as this is the initial or first covenant God made with man, we should study it carefully for any indication of the manner of God's dealings on a covenant basis. We can readily see that He arranged no preceding consultation with man as to the content or terms of the covenant. The proposal was not, therefore, an outgrowth of reasoning between the divine and human minds. The covenant was an arrangement conceived by God alone, in His infinite and infallible mind. It was revealed or disclosed to man. This is important, since we tend to think of a covenant as growing out of mutual arbitration.

History is a record of the footprints of God in the life of humanity. The two most outstanding events of divine interposition in the affairs of the world were the flood and the incarnation. Of such transcendent significance was the first that it stands as a constant rebuke to those skeptics who deny the possibility of a termination of the present world order, based upon a false assumption of continuity in the natural realm since creation (2 Peter 3:3, 4). The second made such an impact that it changed the calendar. It was as if time stood still, then resumed with a new meaning.

In the flood God demonstrated His wrath; in the coming of Jesus He manifested His love. "Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness" (Romans 11:22; KJV). The first event was a visitation of destruction; the second, of salvation. The one was to terminate life; the other that it might be granted more abundantly.

Both covenants were given through a comforter. The first was given through Noah, whose name means "comforter" (Genesis 5:29). The second was given through the Holy Spirit as a Comforter from the Father. Because of the original covenant we need never fear the destruction of all flesh by water; because of the last we need never fear the second death. The covenant with Noah resulted in a rainbow spanning the clouds of the heavens; the covenant of grace has its rainbow round about the throne of Him who will come in the clouds of Heaven. The God of the universe is revealed as a covenant-making God.

Our relationship with God must be on the basis of a covenant. As finite creatures seeking to please Him, we must investigate and become aware of the implications growing out of this fact.

The Covenant with Abraham

Contents

When Noah and his sons came out of the ark they faced a new world. A fresh start had to be made. Accordingly, they were given a repetition of the primal commission. "And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said to them, 'Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth'" (Genesis 9:1; RSV). The oldest ethnographic chart known to man is found in Genesis 10. It details the nations that came from Shem, Ham, and Japheth. It closes with the observation, "These are the families of the sons of Noah, according to their genealogies, in their nations; and from these the nations spread abroad on the earth after the flood" (Genesis 10:32; RSV).

In the next chapter, although certainly not in chronological order, is inserted a rather detailed account of how the dispersion was accomplished. At the time "the whole earth had one language and few words," (Genesis 1:11; RSV). Apparently, under the influence of Nimrod, a descendant of Ham, the people decided to resist being scattered. They resolved to construct a city and erect a high tower as a visible rallying point. In order to do this they fired bricks which they cemented together with bitumen, or asphalt. The place chosen was the plain of Shinar.

The power exerted in working together and in speaking the same things was attested to by God, who declared, "'Behold, they are one people, and they have all one language; and this is only the beginning of what they will do; and nothing that they propose to do will now be impossible for them'" (v. 6; RSV). To overthrow the conspiracy calculated to avoid populating the earth, God said, "'Come, let us go down, and there confuse their language, that they may not understand one another's speech'" (v. 7; RSV). The record adds, "So the Lord scattered them abroad from there over the face of all the earth, and they left off building the city." The "so" shows how it was done. It means "in this manner," or "by this method."

It is well to note that the descendants of Arpachshad and Eber, of the family of Shem, settled in that area along the Euphrates River which came to be designated "the land of the Chaldeans." It was not long until the tribes of mankind, seeking an outlet for the worshiping instinct, degenerated into idolatry, paying homage to both natural and artificial gods. The idea of one God, Maker of Heaven and earth, was fast disappearing beneath the weight of superstition and tradition. It became obvious that, if the concept of monotheism was to survive, it would have to be made the sacred trust of a particular nation, around which such safeguards could be constructed as to segregate it from the rest of humanity, with its contaminating influence.

Thus, when every nation on earth had chosen gods for itself, the God of Heaven chose for himself a nation on earth. To sire this select people, He chose an Arpachshadean from the city of Ur, whose name was Abram. Ab is the Hebrew for "father," and ram is the word for "high" or "chief." The very name signifies that its bearer was a man of destiny, one who was to be an outstanding progenitor.

Abram was the son of Terah, an idol worshiper, whose father, Nahor, had also served other gods (Joshua 24:2). Abram was instructed to leave his country, kindred, and father's house. While he obeyed with alacrity the command to go, he did not at first fully comply with the conditions. He and Sarai, his wife, accompanied his father and nephew, "and they went forth together from Ur of the Chaldeans to go into the land of Canaan; but when they came to Haran, they settled there" (Genesis 11:31; RSV). This delayed Abram until after the decease of his father. Then "Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their possessions which they had gathered, and the persons that they had gotten in Haran; and they set forth to go into the land of Canaan" (12:5; RSV).

They entered Canaan, later called Palestine, or "land of the Philistines" from the north. Since they were a band of nomads, they wandered southward as their animals found grazing to sustain them. Abram built an altar to the Lord, to mark every principal stop. Driven into Egypt by a serious famine, they sojourned there until sustenance was again found in Canaan. "So Abram went up from Egypt, he and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the Negeb" (13:1; RSV).

A quarrel among the herdsmen was settled by an agreement between Abram and Lot to go their several ways. Lot chose the verdant plains of Jordan and removed to Sodom. This divested Abram of the last of his relatives. He was now separated from his kindred. It is appropriate that we note the words of the Lord immediately forthcoming. "The Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever" (13:14, 15; KJV).

Why did the Lord select this one individual from the multitude of men upon the earth, to be the progenitor of His mighty nation? Every nation began with one man whose offspring became a clan, then a tribe, and eventually a nation. What was the outstanding characteristic of Abram that made him the subject of God's choice? Concerning this choice it is affirmed that God "calleth those things which be not as though they were' (Romans 4:17; KJV). James declared, "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts 15:18; KJV). It appears that Abram, of all men on earth in his day, possessed that one quality which commended him to the Lord as the progenitor of a covenant people, whose relationship would be established upon the basis of faith.

In order to bring mankind up to that state of maturity where a covenant based upon faith could be operative and effective, it became necessary to make another covenant with Abram that could provide the background and setting for the last and greatest agreement to be made with man. Thus there were two covenants embraced in the promises to Abram. One was fleshly and temporal, and its token was a sign in the flesh. Its promises were carnal. The other was spiritual and lasting. Its promises were of a better and a more enduring nature. One of these covenants was not a continuation of the other, although the first provided a frame of reference for the second. They were addressed to different persons for different purposes. Unless this is kept in mind, one will become involved in serious error.

A COVENANT AFTER THE FLESH

In his beautiful allegory to the vacillating Galatians, the apostle Paul says, "For these are the two covenants" (4:24; KJV). He distinguishes the subjects of the two by the expressions "born after the flesh" and "by the promise." It is true that he was dealing with the covenants made at literal Mount Sinai and figurative Mount Sion, but the covenant at Sinai was a national one conferred upon the physical seed of Abram. It was merely a ratification on a national basis of the original one given at a time when Abram had not one child. Before the Lord could make a "kingdom of priests," and a "holy nation" (Exodus 19:6; KJV), he had first to provide seed for the primal covenantee. This was a remarkable arrangement in itself, considering that Abram was "about an hundred years old," and reproductively his body and Sarai's womb were dead (Romans 4:19).

When God called Abram, He assured him, "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Genesis 12:2, 3; KJV). Here, at the very beginning, we have the germ of both covenants, and it will be noted that both are to be realized through the seed of Abraham. National greatness and universal blessing— these are the attainments to be achieved.

To those who are of the opinion that these words were spoken to Abram while he sojourned in Haran, we merely remark that Stephen said, "The God of glory appeared unto our father Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charran" (Acts 7:2; KJV). The same speaker also says relative to Canaan, "He promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child" (v. 5; KJV). This last fact presented a concern to both Abram and Sarai, although their reactions were different.

Sarai devised an expedient, suggesting that Abram have sexual congress with Hagar, her Egyptian maidservant, saying, "It may be that I may obtain children by her" (Genesis 16:2; KJV). Hagar bore a son, who was named Ishmael, and he became the illustrious head of twelve tribes, now represented by the Arabs. Later, when Sarai's own son was born, enmity existed between the two. That hostility between their seed still makes the headlines of our metropolitan newspapers regularly.

Abram had concluded that his trusted homeborn servant, Eliezer of Damascus, would be adopted and become his heir, in lieu of natural seed, and he so informed the Lord (Genesis 15:2, 3). But the Lord assured him such was not in the divine plan. His heir would be an offspring of Sarai and himself. Then occurred a demonstration that was remarkable and must have made a lifelong impression upon the patriarch.

Abram was taken outside his tent before dawn and directed to look toward Heaven. He was told that this progeny would be as innumerable as the stars shimmering in the still darkened sky. It was at this juncture the record declares, "And he believed in the Lord; and he counted it to him for righteousness" (15:6; KJV). To this important statement we will have to make frequent allusion. This is the first time the word "believe" occurs in the sacred record. Abraham was indeed "the father of the faithful."

The Lord said to Abram, "I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it" (v. 7). When Abram asked by what means he could be certain of the inheritance, the Lord told him to provide a heifer, a female goat, and a ram, each three years old, also a turtledove and a young pigeon. It will be recognized that these constitute the representative categories of sacrificial birds and animals.

Abram killed all of these and split the animals in two, laying each half over against the other, leaving a passageway between. In Jeremiah 34:18 we are informed that this was a solemn way of ratifying a covenant. The parties to the covenant killed an animal, dividing the carcass lengthwise. They placed the pieces opposite each other and walked between them to meet in the middle, where they took the ritual oath. In effect, the oath was a plea for the one who broke the covenant to suffer the same fate as the slain animal.

Abram kept birds of prey off the slain beasts all day. At sunset he fell into a supernatural trance. He heard the voice of God speaking and saw a smoking furnace and burning lamp pass between the pieces of animals, symbolizing that God was entering into a covenant. The record says, "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land" (Genesis 15:18; KJV). A description of the boundaries and the names of the nations inhabiting the territory was then provided. This closed a memorable day. It began before dawn and lasted until after dark. Abram had learned that his heir would be personally begotten, and that his seed would be granted the whole land of Canaan. All history after this was affected by this covenant.

THE DIVINE PURPOSE

It would be well for us to study God's purpose in the covenant, as it is related to the land inheritance of the fleshly seed of Abram. The divine intent was to constitute a nation for the preservation of the great truth of the existence of one God. That is why the nation began with one who believed in God with such intensity of purpose that his very faith could be "counted unto him for righteousness" in the sight of God.

But the faith of an ancestor was not enough. It was essential to establish the nation that came from his loins in a territory of their own, to segregate them by law, custom, practice, and geography from other nations that were steeped in polytheism. It is difficult, if not impossible, to build a strong central power out of nomadic herdsmen, whose tendency is to be ever on the move and who prefer dwelling in the desert to living in the city.

Accordingly, God ordained for these people to become slaves in the most enlightened nation of that day. Here the wanderlust was burned out of them. They were taught by compulsion to make bricks. They learned the discipline of daily toil. They were forced to construct great cities such as Pithom and Raamses. So effective was the attempt to make them a settled people that when they were finally led forth into the wilderness, they longingly sought to return to the land of slavery.

Since every nation in that day was idolatrous, during the period of serfdom the descendants of Abraham were exposed to idolatrous practices. These were made abhorrent by virtue of an edict of the Pharaoh that all of their male children should be sacrificed to the maw of the chief god, the Nile River. Moreover, when the time of deliverance came, great catastrophes fell upon both the heathen inhabitants and their gods of lower animal life. The superiority of the God of Israel was clearly demonstrated. God promised, "'I will pass through the land of Egypt that night, and I will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and on all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the Lord'" (Exodus 12:12; RSV). Deliverance began with fearful judgment from the Lord upon the helpless gods of mighty Egypt. This night, which was memorialized for all future generations by a feast, served as a constant rebuke against idolatry.

The land of Canaan was peculiarly adapted to the divine purpose. It was selected from the lands of the earth, as Abram had been from the inhabitants of the earth, and as Israel was from the nations. As the seed of Abram became the people of God, so Palestine became the land of the Lord (Psalm 85:1; Isaiah 8:8). The land could not even be sold on a permanent basis. It did not belong to man to convey. As Israel became a holy people, so this territory became "the holy land" (Zechariah 2:12).

This territory was situated in a strategic position to accomplish the will of God. It was bounded on the north by the towering Lebanon Range, on the east by the Jordan River, on the south by the Wilderness of Sin, and on the west by the Mediterranean Sea. Even more remotely sealed in by the Arabian Desert, it provided for the compact dwelling of a people around the center of their worship. Yet it was also on the main trade routes, along which flowed the commerce of the ancient world.

The purpose of God with regard to the seed of Abraham was to keep intact the notion of one God. The ultimate design was to bring all nations to an acknowledgment of this truth through the coming of the Son of God, and also through Him to extend salvation unto all the earth. Israel was to be the nation of the Messiah in that it preserved the ideal of one God and thus prepared the world for the advent of Him who was "the only begotten Son of God."

Having taken this brief glance into the future of Abraham's seed in order to understand the purpose of God, let us now return to the actual covenant as God made it with Abram. The party of the first part in the covenant was God himself. The party of the second part was Abram and the coming seed, still not begotten when the covenant was made.

In Genesis 17 is recorded the validation of the physical covenant. Abram was now ninety-nine years old. Almost twenty-five years had elapsed since he forsook the land of the Chaldeans. Previously the Lord had appeared under the title of Jehovah. He now introduces himself as El Shaddai, God Almighty. This was assurance that whatever He promised He had the power to perform. In view of the majesty of His name, He began by instructing Abram, "Walk before me, and be thou blameless." The Lord said, "As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations" (Genesis 17:4; KJV). This was the fifth time God promised to make Abram the father of an innumerable progeny.

Frequently in history God memorialized an event of great significance by bestowing a new name, or by altering a previously existing one. In this instance the name of Abram was changed to Abraham. It was pointed out that "Abram" is formed by combining ab, father; and ram, chief. To this was now added hamon, meaning "multitude." The abbreviated form of Abramhamon, or Abraham, means "chief father of a multitude." The change in the form of address was accompanied by the words, "I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee"

(17:7, 8; KJV). It was for this reason that Simon Peter referred to God as "the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers" (Acts 3:13; KJV).

Further, God promised to give to Abraham and to his seed after him the land in which he was a foreigner, or all the land of Canaan. He declared it would be an everlasting possession of his seed and further declared, "I will be their God." All covenants that God makes with man are based upon what He has done for man. It was thus enjoined upon Abraham and his posterity to keep the covenant inviolable.

"This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you and thy seed after thee; every man child among you shall be circumcised" (Genesis 17:10; KJV). The seed by which the ova is fertilized, thus causing conception, is manufactured within the body of the male. It is deposited in the body of the female through the external organ of procreation. Thus, this organ was regarded as the very instrument of life, the channel of the physical seed. It was provided that the foreskin of this organ would be clipped or cut off. This left a permanent indication of covenant relationship that was directly connected with the begetting of offspring, who were in turn to be brought into covenant relationship. The operation was to be performed when the male child was eight days old.

A SACRED COVENANT

The Lord declared, "My covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant" (v. 13). So sacred did the mark of circumcision become that when one took a solemn oath affecting future seed, he was required to place his hand on the procreative organ. This is exactly as one today may place his hand on a copy of the Holy Bible when taking a judicial or executive oath. Thus when Abraham was preparing to dispatch his faithful servant to secure a wife for Isaac, he said, "Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell, but thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac" (Genesis 24:2-4; KJV).

It was furthermore declared, "And the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant" (17:14). It is evident that the blessings of the covenant applied to the individual, only when he had obeyed the ordinance of circumcision. The ordinance was not the covenant, but it was essential to bring one into the privileges and prerogatives of the covenant.

It was not enough simply to be born into the physical family of Abraham. If one so born was not circumcised, either through neglect or irreverence, he was cut off because he had broken the covenant.

Isaac was circumcised when he was eight days old, as God had commanded Abraham (21:4). In turn, he circumcised his own sons. Jacob, who was the father of twelve sons, did likewise with his offspring. As a result of this mark in the flesh, the nomadic tribes that descended from Abraham felt a kinship with God which was not felt by the Canaanites around them.

The writer to the Hebrews puts it in the framework of faith: "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went. By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise: for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (11:8-10; KJV).

How strange it is that these wanderers who lived in tents in the wilderness had a dream of inhabiting a city constructed by divine power. With a mark in their flesh serving as a constant reminder of the covenant, they regarded themselves as heirs of a promise spoken from Heaven. It is said of them, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Hebrews 11:13; KJV).

Perhaps those who are the seed of Abraham, whether in flesh or faith, are doomed to be always strangers and pilgrims on the earth, always looking for a city that has foundations. Perhaps there are always promises that must be seen afar off, of which we must be persuaded, and which we must embrace. But God had to create a nation on earth through which His Son could come, that the kingdom of Heaven might be received through His coming.

The First Testament

When God called Abram, it was His original intent to make of his seed a great nation. To accomplish His purpose He allowed the descendants of Abram to be cradled and conditioned in the most advanced culture of that day. Because of its fortunate situation on either side of the River Nile, Egypt had become "the breadbasket of the world." In order to transport the circumcised desert-wanderers into Egypt, divine providence employed famine, human jealousy and hostility, lies, and perfidy. It was a supreme demonstration that God can take even the vagaries and errors of humankind and direct them to the fulfillment of His ultimate design.

In Egypt the descendants of Jacob were first accorded royal treatment, but later reduced to the status of slaves. In spite of dire bondage with its hardships, the people thrived under protection from on high. The seventy souls who went down into that country with Jacob multiplied in number until they probably exceeded two million. When the proper time came, they were freed from bondage and started on the way to the land that was to be peculiarly theirs, according to promise. Without realizing it, the ruling Pharaoh had been an instrument in training the slaves to develop the very qualities essential to their attainment of nationhood. The family of the Messiah was ready to become the nation of the Messiah.

God reveals himself in a manner adapted to the state of things existing when the revelation is given. Since the cardinal purpose was to make a nation to keep alive in the minds of men the existence of one true God, it was necessary to impress upon all nations the significance of His selection of Israel as a nation separate from all others. At that time when "every nation made gods of their own" (Cp. 2 Kings 17:29), the feeling was universal that the power of a god could be determined by two factors. One was the state of the people over whose fate he was alleged to preside, and the other was the works of wonder performed in their behalf. If a nation prospered materially, was strong in battle, and triumphed over others, it was conceded that the god of such a nation was a powerful deity.

To gain a proper degree of respect and reverence for himself and the chosen people, God accepted this criterion and proceeded to demonstrate His superiority. Since His people were slaves in Egypt, the first manifestation of power was against that nation and its gods. He selected as an ambassador one who had been reared and educated in the king's palace, but who had become a political exile under charge of homicide. God sent him to the royal court with a positive ultimatum to the Pharaoh to let His people go. When the haughty monarch denied any knowledge of the God of Israel, it became necessary for God to show His divinity. To be effective to mankind, any proof divine power must be supernatural and capable of being fully perceived.

Ten different demonstrations were manifested in Egypt. The first three were simply to prove that Jehovah was the Lord. "And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I stretch forth my hand upon Egypt" (Exodus 7:5; KJV). The next three were to demonstrate that He was also God in Egypt and that the deities of the land were impotent before Him. To this end He drew a line of demarcation between Goshen, the province where Israel dwelt, and the rest of Egypt. "I will sever in that day the land of Goshen, in which my people dwell, that no swarms of flies shall be there; to the end thou mayest know that I am the Lord in the midst of the earth. And I will put a division between my people and thy people: to morrow shall this sign be" (Exodus 8:22, 23; KJV). Goshen was unaffected by the succeeding disasters that paralyzed the remainder of the country.

The third series of three catastrophic events advanced one more step. They proved that there was none like Him in all the earth. "'This time I will send all my plagues upon your heart, and upon your servants and your people, that you may know there is none like me in all the earth. For by now I could have put forth my hand and struck you and your people with pestilence, and you would have been cut off from the earth; but for this purpose have I let you live, to show you my power, so that my name may be declared throughout all the earth.'" (Exodus 9:14-16; RSV).

At the very birth of the nation, the final blow to Egypt was destined to prove that this God was a master of all gods. He proposed to deliver these bondslaves without revolt, clash of arms, or loss of a single life among them. At this time Egypt was the mightiest nation on earth. The Pharaoh was feared above every other earthly monarch. On the night appointed for Israel's deliverance, the slaves demanded of their masters jewelry of silver and gold. God moved upon the hearts of the Egyptians to grant this request. Another factor entering into the transaction was the reputation that Moses had gained in the eyes of the Egyptians, by reason of the mighty works done through him (Exodus 11:3).

At midnight the death angel passed through the land with terrible execution. He smote all of the firstborn, "from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the firstborn of cattle" (Exodus 12:29; KJV). Yet, "against any of the people of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue" (11:7). There was a great cry of anguish in Egypt, for there was not a house in which there was not one dead. The agonized Pharaoh did not wait until morning. He summoned Moses and Aaron by night and said, "Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel; and go, serve the Lord, as ye have said. Also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said, and be gone; and bless me also" (12:31, 32).

When the full realization of what he had done dawned upon the Pharaoh, he changed his mind, and decided to pursue the Israelites and return them to slavery. The Israelites trembled when they saw the approaching Egyptians, but Moses said, "'Fear not, stand firm, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will work for you today; for the Egyptians whom you see today, you shall never see again. The Lord will fight for you, and you have only to be still'" (Exodus 14:13, 14; RSV). Lifting his rod over the waters of the Red Sea, he caused them to part by the power of God. The people of Israel marched through the sea on dry ground, and the Egyptian cavalry, attempting to follow, were all drowned.

So mighty was this feat that many years later Moses asked, "'Has any god ever attempted to go and take a nation for himself from the midst of another nation, by trials, by signs, by wonders, and by war, by a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? To you it was shown, that you might know that the Lord is God; there is no other besides him'" (Deuteronomy 4:34, 35; RSV). The expression, "take a nation for himself," is a key phrase in any study of the relationship of God to Israel. In fulfilling His design God showed His superiority to the gods of the most prosperous and flourishing nation of the day.

THE NATIONAL CONSTITUTION

It is one thing to lead a group of slaves from the land of bondage, and a wholly different matter to weld them into a nation. To accomplish the latter, the first thing required is some system of laws or a constitution, by which the people shall be governed. In a theocracy such a constitution would have to be in the nature of an announced covenant. Accordingly, after God had freed the people of Israel, He did not allow them to take the direct route to Canaan, which would have led them by the way of the Philistine garrisons. Instead, God turned them southward toward Mount Sinai, and around the base of this peak they established their camp. Here God made known His intention to submit to the people en masse the question of whether or not they would be willing to enter into the covenant relationship with Him, accepting such responsibility as would be entailed. Thus, the Creator preserved the dignity and respected the will of creatures made in His own image, although He was under no obligation to deal with them on this exalted level.

Moses, the mediator, was summoned to come up into the mountain, and he ascended in the presence of all the people. The proposal of God was committed to Moses to convey to the entire multitude. It was conditioned upon the one great act of deliverance in which the Egyptians had suffered frightful retribution and Israel had been miraculously reclaimed. Moses was told, "'Thus you shall say to the house of Jacob, and tell the people of Israel: You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself"' (Exodus 19:3, 4; RSV). This was deemed of sufficient power to make Israel recognize an indebtedness to God and to inspire them to trust in His might for the future. With them, nationhood began, not in a resolution of human determination, but in a mighty act of God. For that reason the proposal was made, "'Now therefore, if you will obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my own possession among all peoples; for all the earth is mine, and you shall be to me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. These are the words which you shall speak to the children of Israel"' (vv. 5, 6; RSV).

Since there was no central means of communication available, and no mass media through which one person might speak to more than two million persons, Moses summoned the elders and relayed to them the message of God. He asked them to ascertain the will of the people and report back to him the results of their poll. The people unanimously agreed, saying, "'All that the Lord has spoken we will do'" (v. 8). Moses reported their decision to God, who informed him that He would personally address the people on the third day in a manner that they could not forget. As a preliminary for the occasion, the mountain was to be regarded as sacred. A boundary line must be drawn, across which the people were not to set foot. The death sentence was decreed for any man or animal crossing the line. During the interval the people were to wash their garments and abstain from all sexual relations. The blast of a heavenly trumpet would signal the beginning of the announcement of the covenant.

On the morning of the third day there were thunders and lightnings. A thick cloud dropped down to enshroud the mountain. A loud trumpet blast echoed among the peaks. Sinai was enveloped in smoke, and the entire mountain shook and trembled. The startled people were brought forth to stand and gaze at the awesome spectacle while wondering what the future held for them. Moses spoke, and God answered in the rumbling of thunder.

Moses never forgot the inaugural ceremony for the covenant. Shortly before his death he addressed the people in these words, "'For ask now of the days that are past, which were before you, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from one end of heaven to the other, whether such a great thing as this has ever happened or was ever heard of. Did any people ever hear the voice of a god speaking out of the midst of the fire, as you have heard, and still live? Out of heaven he let you hear his voice, that he might discipline you; and on earth he let you see his great fire, and you heard his words out of the midst of the fire'" (Deuteronomy 4:32, 33; 36; RSV).

Analysis of the Covenant

Contents

The eager student of God's revelation should have an overwhelming desire, an unquenchable passion, to ascertain the truth. He should not be deterred in his search for this "golden fleece" by his own past conclusions or by present popular error. This is said because of certain statements that will be made. Though based upon Scriptural testimony, these will challenge a view so deeply entrenched that even to question it will appear like heresy. Yet, it is not too much to say that our whole personal relationship to God may be directly affected by what is written in the remainder of this volume.

All of us realize that the words "testament" and "covenant" are used interchangeably in the Authorized Version. Thus the apostle Paul speaks of "the reading of the old testament" in 2 Corinthians 3:14, and the writer of Hebrews calls it a "covenant" in Hebrews 8:9. The original word is the same in both instances. In your copy of the sacred Scriptures, the title page probably bears this statement: "The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments." This statement is correct, but not in the sense it is intended. There are not thirty-nine books in "the old testament." There are not twenty-seven books in the "new testament." In fact, the new covenant, or new testament, was never written with pen and ink at all. The record given by the Spirit states this very clearly.

Because men have labeled the thirty-nine books constituting the Jewish Scriptures the "Old Testament," virtually the whole world has been led to believe that this entire compilation constituted the covenant with God. No idea could be more incorrect. None is fraught with greater possibility for error in understanding the unfolding of God's purpose. Laboring under this delusion, many people have completely missed the purpose of God, which is conveyed in "the new covenant." They have merely substituted one legalistic written code for another as the basis of their service to God and communion with one another.

Any understanding of the "new covenant" must be attained through a proper concept of the old. If the second is not to be like the first, a correct survey of the first will prepare for a rational investigation of the second. What was the nature of the "old covenant"? Why was it given? What did it embrace? What were its bounds and limitations? A proper evaluation of these matters will make it possible for us to place "the Jacob's staff" of our spiritual survey at the exact spot from which to look at the "better covenant, which was established upon better promises" (8:6; KJV).

Let us remember that nowhere in all the sacred writings does God ever suggest that all of the Holy Scriptures from Moses to Malachi constitute "the old testament," or covenant. No inspired writer ever hinted that the "old testament" contains thirty-nine books. Some of these books recount the history and chronicles of the covenant people. One is a collection of songs and psalms used in the praise service of the covenant people. Some contain the literature and proverbs collected by the covenant people. Many are prophetic warnings and promises made to people of the covenant. But the history of such a covenant people is no more a part of their constitution than a book on American history is part of the Constitution of the United States. Such a history may refer to our Constitution, detail our departures from its principles, and urge our return to its original spirit, but it is not the Constitution or our national covenant.

A nation is a social unit, created when a number of clans or tribes associate themselves together for mutual progress and protection. In the very nature of things, the first requirement is a compact, or agreement. Such an agreement is called a covenant, or constitution. When God calls a nation out for himself, it is evident that such a nation must constitute a theocracy. Being such and not a democracy, God must announce the terms of the relationship involved.

The preamble of the constitution was a proclamation of what God had done for them. God never enjoins a covenant upon the human family except upon the basis of prior deeds in their behalf. In this instance, the preface would serve for all ages to identify the people involved and the God whom they were to serve. In solemn tones, the words were uttered, "'I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage'" (Exodus 20:2; RSV). The covenant was made possible by a divine act of deliverance. Freedom was accorded by what God did for them, not by what they did for God.

There followed Ten Commandments, which with the preamble constituted what the inspired writers call "the old covenant" or "the first testament." Since a nation is a social unit, its people sustain a dual relationship— to God and one another. The Ten Commandments are divided into two classes, the first four pertaining to man's responsibility to God; the last six to man's responsibility to man.

PERTAINING TO GOD

The initial Commandment was the keystone in the arch of national purpose. It struck at the very heart of polytheism, and forever made monotheism the foundation of covenant relationship on the part of Israel. "'You shall have no other gods before me'" (Exodus 20:3; RSV). This made the worship of idols an act of treason, a revolt against the sovereign power, and an overt manifestation of conspiracy to overthrow the nation by subverting it from its original purpose and intent. By statute it was made a capital offense.

The second and third statements were made against treasonable intent. Knowing the tendency of man to worship what he creates, it was forbidden to make any graven image or the likeness of any creature in the universe. To bow down before the work of the sculptor or graver, or to give any homage thereto, was also a capital offense. The third Commandment was designed to forbid any lessening of respect or awe for the name of Jehovah. "'You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain'" (v. 7; RSV). To "take the name of the Lord" was to call upon God to witness a promise or vow. This was generally done by saying, "As the Lord liveth I will do this or that." To do so in vain meant to take such an oath in the name of God without any intention of fulfilling it. "Men indeed swear by a greater than themselves, and in all their disputes an oath is final for confirmation" (Hebrews 6:16; RSV). Since this was the final appeal for confirmation, reverence for the name of God would soon disappear if He were called upon to sanction a falsehood or empty promise.

The fourth Commandment stipulated the percentage of time to be accorded the Lawgiver and King. One day in seven was to be assigned to Him in honor of two great events. His creative work ended, and He rested on the seventh day. On the same day He brought the people out of Egypt. By hallowing the seventh day they would be commemorating the creation of the earth and the creation of a nation to honor the God of the universe. The method of consecration was the same that God himself originally employed: rest, or relaxation, and absolute cessation from creativity.

PERTAINING TO OTHERS

Before we mention the fifth Commandment, a few words are in order about the method of perpetuating the knowledge of the covenant. There was no provision made for propagandizing people of other nations. No recruiting program was inaugurated. If one who dwelt among the people desired to enroll with them, he could do so by allowing himself and other males in the family to be circumcised. This was voluntary. There was no solicitation for him to do so. It is true that after they had been scattered among all nations, the descendants of Abraham, having burdened their law with cumbersome traditions, enlisted Gentiles whom they transformed into fanatical zealots worse than themselves, but this was not the original intent.

Carrying forward the patriarchal procedure, the fathers were directly charged with the responsibility of instructing their children. The solemn duty was enjoined immediately following the Shema, the watchword of Israel. After pronouncing it Moses said, "And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk to them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (Deuteronomy 6:6, 7; KJV). Each home was to be a school upon whose gates and doorposts these things were written.

This implies that the Torah, as Israel used the term to designate the "Law of Moses," was simple enough in essence for the fathers to expound and for the children to understand. It was only when professional teachers arose and eventually divided into representatives and defenders of various schools of thought that the word became obscured by vain janglings. Inasmuch as the parents were ordained as the sacred teachers, it is not surprising that the next Commandment, following those relating to the proper attitude toward God enjoined reverence for them. "Honour thy father and thy mother" (Exodus 20:12; KJV). The parent stood in the room of God to the offspring, giving them the Torah as God gave it to mankind originally.

The remainder of the Ten Commandments constituted the great moral or ethical code intended to set the people apart from the degenerate worshipers of other gods. Taken together they compose "the old testament" or covenant. All other laws, statutes, and judgments, grew out of a relationship to these. While other laws carried a penalty for violation, the national existence was not necessarily impaired or destroyed by disregard for them. But the Ten Commandments constituted the national covenant, the constitution. Upon this covenant the nation had been formed, and by that covenant it would continue to exist. A disregard for the covenant would bring about the dissolution of national sovereignty, unless the breach was repaired firmly and decisively.

The books of history, poetry, and prophecy, are not part of the covenant. They are Scriptures, or writings, which grew out of the relationship created by the covenant, but they are not "the first testament," as God employs that term. That which established covenant relationship and created the nation was one thing. The sacred books written to the covenant people, or nationals, constituted a wholly different thing. Because we have familiarly and thoughtlessly spoken of the thirty-nine books as composing "the old testament" and have subscribed to this popular error, it is necessary to reexamine the Scriptures related to this matter.

But one may ask what difference it makes. This is the refuge of those who would rather continue in error than discover truth. We have already established that God's entire relationship with man has been revealed as being on a covenantal basis. Does it make a difference whether we have a correct or an incorrect view of what constitutes a covenant of God? Can any professed follower of our Lord be respected who ridicules, derides, or scoffs at a matter so grave that it strikes at the very root of our approach to Deity? Is one deserving of reverence as an instructor in holy things who deliberately chooses to ignore truth and continues to teach error? Such may be worthy of those who would place a sect above all else. Surely it has no place in the life or thought of men and women who love the truth more than life itself.

There is an even more serious and sobering aspect. The covenantal relationship of old was a school of instruction for those who live under "the new covenant." If we mistake the nature of the "old covenant," its scope and breadth, we can as easily be wrong about the new. If this happens, we may ignore the ongoing purpose of God and merely substitute one system of legality for another as the ground of justification. By doing this we will again bind a yoke upon men "which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear" (Acts 15:10; KJV).

It is easy to develop a pharisaical attitude about the New Covenant Scriptures as about the Old. If we condition our relationship with God on the basis of knowing a compilation of sacred writings, rather than faith in Jesus, we actually make the Bible our God. As a result, we become inconsistent and insecure. Every interpretation, exegesis, or opinion that disagrees with our own is considered treason. Our problem is that we make the basis of our hope an agreement with men, not a covenant with God. One may be wrong about many things who is in a covenant relationship, but the covenant is not broken by his error. God's covenants are made with a variety of men. They do not all think alike, nor can they all do so.

The Covenant of Law

Contents

The terms "old testament" and "old covenant" are used interchangeably in the sacred Scriptures. The "old covenant" was written upon two tablets of stone. On the basis of that covenant the chosen people had been called out of slavery to constitute a nation. Nothing that had been said prior to the giving of the two stone tablets was a part of the covenant. Nothing that was written subsequently was a part of it. Certainly all that God had said before and all He said afterward sustained a relationship to the covenant, but the covenant itself was a distinct instrument. Of this, Moses is our first and best witness, for he received the original draft of the constitution.

Thirty-eight years later, in the plains of Moab, Moses rehearsed in the ears of the surviving children of the original covenantees, a summary of the things that transpired: "And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness. And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone" (Deuteronomy 4:11-13; KJV).

More explicit yet is the account in Deuteronomy 5: "The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day" (vv. 2, 3). Certainly, then, the first sixty-nine chapters of the Bible are not a part of "the first covenant" mentioned in Hebrews 8:7, for they deal with the fathers previous to the encounter at Sinai, and the Lord did not make the covenant with the fathers.

Just as Moses eliminates from the covenant the sacred writings dealing with prior history, he also eliminates all future writings from it. He repeats the Ten Commandments as the covenant, then concludes: "These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them to me" (v. 22). Although God "added no more," men have added some thirty-seven books of history, chronicles, poetry, songs, wise sayings, prophecies, and apocalyptic writings to the covenant made at Horeb. When they speak of "the old testament," they include all of these in their concept.

Even worse than this, they carry that same concept over to "the new covenant." They make our very relationship to God and one another dependent upon their idea, denying that anyone who disagrees with their theological slant can be in covenant with God. This defeats the very purpose of God and negates the reconciliation effected by the cross. If God deals with us as a covenant-making God, and men confuse the covenant with writings addressed to the covenant people, our relationship is not conditioned upon faith but upon our intellectual apprehension of abstract matters.

We respectfully submit that a consideration of the following points will help all of us to realize that "the first testament" did not include all of the Scriptures now called the Old Testament.

1. The two tables of stone are distinctly said to be the tables of the covenant (Deuteronomy 9:11). They are called the "tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant" (v. 9).

2. The sacred chest, or coffer, containing the tablets of stone was called "the ark of the covenant" (Numbers 10:33; Deuteronomy 10:8). When Solomon erected the temple, he said, "In it have I put the ark, wherein is the covenant of the Lord, that he made with the children of Israel" (2 Chronicles 6:11). The ark had disappeared before many of the books of prophecy were even written. Not one of the books of prophecy was ever in the ark, because not one was a part of the covenant.

3. The covenant was distinctly said to have been made and given in Horeb (Deuteronomy 5:2). The apostle Paul identified this as Mount Sinai in Arabia (Galatians 4:24, 25). But most of the rest of the Old Covenant Scriptures were written in Palestine, Babylon, or Persia.

4. The covenant was said to have been made when God "took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt" (Jeremiah 31:32). The Scriptures were written much later and in many other places.

5. Certainly the prophecy of Jeremiah was no part of the "first testament," for by the time Jeremiah wrote, the people had already broken the covenant of God. The prophet predicted that a new covenant would be made (Jeremiah 31:31).

The words of "the old testament" which God made with Israel were first announced orally by the voice of God. These words embraced the Ten Commandments and the preamble that identified God. The finger of God then wrote the words upon two stone tablets (Deuteronomy 9:10). The covenant was limited to the content of the oral message that was subsequently engraved upon the two tablets, for *the Lord added no more.

When the people had heard the words of God, they were so frightened that the heads of the tribes approached Moses and besought him, "Go thou near, and hear all that the Lord our God shall say: and speak thou unto us all that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee; and we will hear it, and do it" (Deuteronomy 5:27; KJV). The Lord agreed to this arrangement. He instructed Moses to go and tell the people to return to their tents. However, He told Moses, "Stand thou here by me, and I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them" (v. 31). There was a difference between the covenant and the various statutes, commands, and ordinances. The covenant established the nation's relationship as the elect of God, and the other commands regulated the people within that relationship. The apostle Paul recognized this distinction when he wrote, "They are Israelites, and to them belong the sonship, the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the worship, and the promises" (Romans 9:4; RSV).

The covenant made at Sinai, through which national theocratic status was conferred upon Israel, was of such a nature as to require a definite written code to accomplish its design. The law is personified as a "child-conductor" or "custodian" (Galatians 3:24; RSV). It was a guardian or trustee (Galatians 4:2; RSV). Those who were under its jurisdiction were regarded as children, or minors, thus possessing no more freedom than slaves (Galatians 4:1). Now, just as no one would entrust a child to the care of another who was immature, so the nation at its inception required a law that was complete. A foundation is not constructed gradually, after a structure has been erected. A nation founded upon law must have the law to produce the nation. Accordingly, the Lord revealed to the original mediator the law in its fullness.

The first covenant was a legalistic arrangement. It was designed to keep its subjects in confinement and under restraint, and so the covenant itself was legalistic. It consisted of law. The covenant given through Moses was law, but not all the laws given through Moses were part of the covenant. This will explain such statements as that of Paul, "I had not known sin, but by the law: for I had not known lust, except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet" (Romans 7:7; KJV). This statement is a part of the covenant. It is one of the Ten Commandments. But the covenant was the groundwork of a legal system. Because of this, other portions of the Scriptures which grew out of this legal covenant are referred to as "law." They are parts of a legal system.

It is important that we understand the nature of a system of law as opposed to a system of faith for justification before God. If we fail to do so, we may simply substitute one law for another, and this would be a fatal error. Any person who seeks to be justified by law must keep that law to perfection. If one proposes to establish a relationship based upon deeds of law, he must maintain a meticulous and unvarying obedience to every command, regardless of how minute it may seem. His very life will depend upon such obedience, for he is trading his deeds for life. "The law does not rest on faith, for 'He who does them shall live by them'" (Galatians 3:12; RSV). To put that in reverse, it simply teaches that a man can live under the law only if he does absolutely everything the law requires. The slightest deviation brings condemnation and death.

One cannot set up in his heart a system of justification by law, and then expect God's grace to rescue him in his failures. Grace operates through faith and not by law. If we are now under any kind of a written code, seeking for justification, our only hope (if hope it may be called) is to live in constant fear and dread, and keep every provision of that written code without fail.

This being true, the question naturally arises, "Why then the law?" Why did God institute a covenant consisting of a written code? The question is not new. It was first propounded by an avid student of the law in Galatians 3:19. The inspired answer is found at the same place: "It was added because of transgressions, till the offspring should come to whom the promise had been made" (RSV). The "offspring" is identified in the context as Jesus Christ. The law was added to the promise made to Abraham, and was intended to act as a custodian to guard and guide the people in their immaturity until they could be brought to Christ.

But justification did not come by the law, "for if justification were through the law, then Christ died to no purpose" (Galatians 2:21; RSV). It is plainly said, "by works of the law shall no one be justified" (2:16; RSV). Again, "It is evident that no man is justified before God by the law" (3:11). No written code can ever produce life. The law in its ultimate could produce only death. Since justification by law demands absolute conformity to the minutest degree, and since no man could fulfill the law's demand to this extent, "The very commandment which promised life proved to be death to me" (Romans 7:10; RSV); "For if a law had been given which could make alive then righteousness would indeed be by the law" (Galatians 3:21).

Weakness of the Law

Contents

We must not fall into the error of thinking that the law given to and by Moses had built-in imperfections because of its origin or agency of transmission. It originated with God, and Moses was such an outstanding person that God said He spoke to him "face to face, as a man speaks to his friend." The perfect God did not give an imperfect law. The law was perfectly adapted to the purpose for which it was intended. Its inability to justify lay in the fact that it was a law, a written code, not that it was the law of God.

So long as man is in the flesh, in his human nature, he cannot be justified by such a written code, regardless of its origin. The weakness is not in the code but in the flesh. Just as law places restraints on what man is allowed to do in the flesh, so the nature of man places restrictions on what the law is able to accomplish. There are things that law cannot do with us because we are in the flesh.

The law given by Moses was of divine origin. It was not unholy or unjust, for "It was ordained by angels through an intermediary" (Galatians 3:19; RSV). It was not an unspiritual arrangement, for "we know that the law is spiritual" (Romans 7:14; RSV). We can only conclude, "The law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good" (Romans 7:12). How could that which came from God, was furnished by angels, was holy, just, good, and spiritual, fail to produce life? The answer is that its failure is not in its source or character. It failed simply because man is what he is. The very essence of man's justification by law is absolute and unvarying conformity. This requires man's perfect knowledge and understanding from the very moment he comes under the law. If he makes one mistake he becomes guilty under the law, and all of his good deeds in the future can never purge that guilt. Man is incapable of such perfection.

The law cannot justify, because it arouses carnal desires or passions. We must deal with man as he is. Filled with curiosity, the urge to experiment, and the ambition to learn by experience, man is lured to destruction by that which is forbidden. The very commandment intended to restrain all too often incites. The law identifies sin, points it out, and locates it as surely as a "Wet Paint" sign on a park bench warns the passerby. The apostle says, "If it had not been for the law, I should not have known sin. I should not have known what it is to covet if the law had not said, 'You shall not covet.' But sin, finding opportunity in the commandment, wrought in me all kinds of covetousness" (Romans 7:7, 8; RSV). The tragic feature is that the penalty is death. There is no mercy in law, only justice! "For sin, finding opportunity in the commandment, deceived me and by it killed me" (7:11; RSV). This is the inexorable fate of the legalist, one who seeks to be justified by law. He cannot escape it. His own testimony as to his imperfection will condemn him.

The law could not give life. It is not within the province of any written code to do so. But the law could and did bring knowledge of sin. "For no human being will be justified in his sight by works of the law, since through the law comes knowledge of sin" (3:20; RSV). The plain force of this passage is that the greater one's knowledge of law, the more he realizes his own sinfulness and human weakness. The word "law" has many shades of meaning in the sacred Scriptures. Ignorance of this leads to some absurd and false conclusions. The strict and proper meaning is "a rule of conduct, prescribed by superior authority." In the final analysis, the character of the authority determines the objective of the law. God is holy, and He desires that we be holy. His nature is the criterion for our measurement. When we apply the law to our conduct, we are made to see our own failures and shortcomings. The more we learn of the law the greater becomes our sense of guilt and inadequacy.

The law could and did bring wrath: "For the law brings wrath, but where there is no law there is no transgression" (4:15; RSV). The law provided for the conscience a standard external to itself. If there were no law, there would be no sense of transgression and no guilt. With a code of laws before him, man can determine the utter futility of trying to become perfect by law-keeping, and thus be led to see the need of a Savior.

The law made nothing complete, or perfect. In that respect it was weak and useless. This is affirmed by the writer to the Hebrews: "On the one hand, a former commandment is set aside because of its weakness and uselessness (for the law made nothing perfect)" (Hebrews 7:18, 19; RSV). But this did not militate against the law in fulfilling its assigned role. Its purpose was to hold man in restraint until Christ came. Justification was not to be found in the law, but in the love that manifested itself in the Son of God.

The covenant, which bound Israel to the true and living God in a relationship of intimacy that was comparable to marriage, was repeatedly violated by the nation. That constant violation demonstrated that a covenant consisting of a written code could never make man guiltless before God. For this reason, Jeremiah, the priestly prophet, predicted the advent of a new covenant, which would be of a different nature. Written codes are external, but the new covenant was to be internal. It was not to be written upon stone tablets or papyrus sheets, but upon human hearts.

"Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband unto them, saith the Lord: but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel; After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be my people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more" (Jeremiah 31:31-34; KJV).

As a prelude to our discussion of that new covenant which God has made with us in Christ, let us consider an analysis of this prophetic promise.

The covenant to come was to be a new one. It was not to be an extension of the old, nor was it to be a renewed application or imposition of the terms of any previous agreement. The first covenant was made when the fathers were delivered from slavery in Egypt; the new one would be made when men were delivered from the bondage of sin. The new covenant would be unlike the former one. The former covenant was the constitution for a physical nation upon earth; the second was for a spiritual kingdom made up of those called out from every nation upon the earth.

The legal code ordained at Horeb did not succeed in binding the people to God. Instead, they lived by their lusts and trusted in the fact that they had the law in their possession. They worshiped the tables of the covenant and the ark in which they were contained. In time of battle they carried it to the field of conflict, exactly as other nations bore their images of worship and in which they trusted for victory. The nation broke the covenant, even though God was faithful as a husband. The nation chose other gods, but God chose no other nation.

The new covenant was not to be a written code. Its sanctuary was not to be the room behind the second veil of an earthly temple, but the inner being of a consecrated person. God placed the tablets of stone in the Holy of Holies under the Shekinah, the glory of His presence. Now His law, His principle of action, is not enshrined in a book but within the spirit of man. The body is the temple of God. The inner man is the holy of holies. Here God's glory is seen and experienced through the indwelling Spirit. Once God put His law in a sacred chest created by men. Now His love, as a divine law, is enshrined in a spiritual treasure-house of His own creation. He said, "I will put my law in their inward parts." The covenant is not chiseled in stone. It is not written upon paper. It is not printed but imprinted. It is engraved on the heart.

The new covenant is individual in nature. It is secure in the inner being, that is, in the heart of the faithful person. One does not belong to God because he belongs to a covenant people. He belongs to the covenant people because he belongs to God. He does not arrive at a covenantal status by subscribing to a code, but by surrender to the Christ. God is the God of those who have bared the walls of their hearts to the inscription written by the finger of God. Those who have covenanted with Him are His people. Any person upon this earth who has entered into the covenantal relationship with God is a child of God, and that covenant pledges his allegiance to God. So long as life continues he must have no other gods.

The old covenant, based upon the flesh of Abraham, was entered at birth. It was ratified on the eighth day of the life of the male child, by circumcision, a cutting of his flesh. The child knew nothing about the covenant. He did not know God. He was first introduced into the covenant and then taught to know the Lord. The new covenant was to be different. It was not to be based upon the flesh, but upon the spirit. It was to be the result of a personal choice, an individual acceptance of God. It would not be necessary to teach those under the new covenant to know God, for they had to know Him to be in the covenant.

There is nothing in Jeremiah's prophecy to suggest or intimate that brothers and neighbors would not teach each other under the new covenant how to live a life above reproach. It is simply that they will not need to teach those in the covenant to know the Lord. The promise is that all who are in the new relationship will have had their iniquity forgiven. God will remember their transgressions no more.

We have come to the place in the study to give attention to the new and different covenant. We have the assurance that it is "a better covenant, which was established upon better promises" (Hebrews 8:6; KJV).

The Time of Reformation

Contents

In a wonderful treatise contained in three chapters of Hebrews (8, 9, 10), the writer summarizes what he had previously written about the superiority of the new covenant over the old. He begins the section with the words, "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum" (KJV). Twice in this limited framework he refers to the promise of God through Jeremiah, that He intended to make "a new covenant" (8:8-12; 10:15-17). Of special significance is the catalog of observances and ordinances under the "old covenant," which were "imposed on them until the time of reformation" (9:10).

The next four words are, "But Christ being come." The covenant of law was temporary and transitory. It was to exist only until the time for the great change had come. It was a time of reformation, which was to be ushered in by the coming of Christ. He was to be "the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises" (8:6). It is this "better covenant" which creates and cements our relationship to God, and we should turn our attention to God's revelation concerning it with a great deal of eagerness.

The advent of Jesus to the earth constituted the watershed of human history. Jesus is the "Great Divide." He is the "new covenant," the Word of God, which became flesh and "dwelt among us, . . . full of grace and truth." All who receive Him receive of the fullness that is in Him. They become partakers of grace and truth. "For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17; KJV).

The casual reader may overlook the profound significance of this statement. The law was given by Moses. The medium was not the message. Moses was not the law. The law was external to Moses. It was even written by another and handed to him. The law outlived Moses. It survived his death. But grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. They were not given by Him as the law was given by Moses. He was full of grace and truth. When Jesus came, grace and truth came. These constituted His "fullness," His nature, His essence.

Law is always external. It is always imposed from outside. It can never make man good. It can only make him wish he had been good. The coming of Jesus brought an end to law as a basis of anyone's relationship to God. Law, as a written code, was suspended and superseded by grace and truth. We are no longer governed by a written code. We are not under law, but under grace.

Jesus did not simply eliminate the law of Moses as a futile manner of attempting to secure righteousness. He did away with the "law principle." He did not substitute one written code for another. Instead of giving us a law, He gave himself. It is not by trust in deeds of law, but by faith in Him as a person that we secure and sustain a right relationship with the Father. Law has gone and faith has come. Moses stands in history as the giver of law. Jesus stands in history as the giver of life!

Law confines, restricts, and inhibits. It is a police power that keeps man down by keeping him under. It is a prison compound in which man is shut up. It is a custodian charged with guarding him and delivering him safely to his destination. No man is free under law. Law and liberty are antithetical to one another. The role of law is described in poignant terms in Galatians 3:23-26. Obviously, Paul is here speaking of the law given by Moses, the law that was announced 430 years after the covenant made with Abraham (3:17). But what he has to say will apply to any written code, as we shall see.

Paul uses the expressions "before faith came" (v. 23) and "after that faith is come" (v. 25). The period "before faith came" is identified as the time when men were kept under the law. The word "kept" means guarded, or under surveillance, as by *keepers of a prison. Certainly there were men of faith under the law but there is a difference between men coming to faith, and faith coming to men. The first is a personal trust in God. The last is a principle of justification in Christ, which came as a historical event. That faith had not come while man was under a written code. He was "shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed" (v. 23).

If the law was helpless to justify, or make men righteous, what was its function? The answer is simple. "Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith" (v. 24). Unfortunately, this rendering in the King James Version can be misleading because of the meaning we attach to "schoolmaster." We think of such a person as a teacher in school, but that is not the meaning of the original at all.

The word paidagogos was applied to a trusted slave who was made the guardian of a boy and charged with his upbringing. When a lad in a Roman or Greek household reached a certain age he was consigned to the keeping of such a slave. That slave was expected to control and direct the boy's life, regulate his conduct, and supervise his behavior until he reached the age of puberty. The word literally means a "child-conductor." Our best English equivalent is "custodian."

The law was like a custodian, to guard and guide God's people until they were safely delivered to Jesus, so they could be justified by faith in Him. After faith came we "are no longer under a custodian." If we are under another written code, we are under a custodian. If we make the New Covenant Scriptures a code of laws we constitute them a custodian. It is one of those very Scriptures which here declares that we are no longer under a custodian. We are not in custody, we are in Christ. The custodian is dead.

If our covenantal relationship with God is not established on the basis of a legal code, what is its nature? Fortunately we are not left in ignorance on this important matter. In 2 Corinthians 3, the apostle Paul describes the two covenants and graphically portrays the difference between them. Every person who is interested in establishing a right relationship with God should pay special attention to what is here revealed. That this is a contrast between the two covenants is evident. In the sixth verse Paul speaks of "the new testament." In the fourteenth verse he speaks of "the old testament."

The chapter begins with two questions. These were probably provoked by false apostles at Corinth who resented Paul and questioned the validity of his apostleship. "Do we begin again to commend ourselves? or need we, as some others, epistles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you?" At the time when the apostle asked this question, letters of introduction, recommendation, and approval were common. Travel was wide-spread, and those who went from place to place carried documents that were signed by well-known political and business figures. These documents served to make the traveler's way easier when going into other countries.

There is every reason to believe that the primitive saints adopted the practice, writing letters of commendation which made it possible for the bearer to be received without question. Such a letter was sent by the congregation at Jerusalem regarding Judas and Silas (Acts 15:22-31). When Apollos prepared to go from Ephesus to Greece, "the brethren wrote, exhorting the disciples to receive him" (Acts 18:27). The letter to Philemon was such a letter.

There was nothing wrong with letters of commendation, but the apostle did not need such a letter to Corinth from other congregations, nor did he require a letter from them to others. The saints at Corinth constituted his endorsement. They were his credentials. "Ye are our epistle written in our hearts, known and read of all men" (2 Corinthians 3:2; KJV). The Corinthian saints were an epistle of Christ and the only letter of commendation required by Paul. "Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (12:12). What was engraved upon their hearts by his apostolic labor could be read by all men who would certainly know that an apostle of Christ had planted the congregation.

"Forasmuch as ye are manifestly declared to be the epistle of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart" (3:3; KJV). Here we have the contrast between the "old covenant" and the "new." The saints are the living letters of the living God. They are the epistles of Christ. Jesus is the author, the apostles His transcribers. They ministered the epistle because God had made them "able ministers of the new testament" (v. 6).

The new covenant was not written with ink. It is not a written code. It does not consist of the Gospels, the book of Acts, the epistles, and Revelation. Every one of these books was written with ink. John's epistles were written with paper and ink (2 John 12) and with pen and ink (3 John 13). These were written to a covenant people, but they are not part of the covenant. That covenant was engraved by the Spirit of God, "not in tables of stone, but in fleshy tables of the heart."

This is exactly what God promised through Jeremiah. "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people" (Hebrews 8:10; KJV). The new covenant is not an external code.

It cannot be read on tablets of stone or in a book written with pen and ink. In spite of the plain statements of God's Word that we are not under law, and that the new covenant was not written with ink, it is difficult for many persons to see how God's laws can be put into the mind or written in the heart, if we are not under law.

The answer lies in the fact that the word "law" has a wide range of meanings. When we read that we are not under law, the apostle is not telling us that we are no longer under the sovereignty of God, but that we are no longer under a written code or legalistic system. We can no longer strive for justification, or seek to arrive at guiltlessness, by observance of such a code laid down or imposed from without. Law, in its primal meaning, is a principle of action. It is the basis, or foundation, the motivating dynamic that governs our whole course of conduct.

God does not write numbered statutes and commandments upon our hearts as the Romans engraved laws upon the twelve bronze tablets in the Forum, or as His finger carved the Ten Commandments upon two tablets of stone at Sinai. Instead, He infuses our hearts with a divine principle of action, and this spontaneously and automatically responds in harmony with His will. Incorporated within that principle, which involves the divine nature or essence, is the fulfillment of all the commands of God, not as a way of life, but as "the life of the Way."

It is for this reason Paul writes, in contrasting the old covenant with the new, that God made the apostles the qualified ambassadors or administrative agents of the "new testament" or covenant. That covenant was not based upon a written code, but upon the Spirit, because a written code can only terminate in death. Instead, the Spirit gives life. Law says, "Do these things and you shall live." The Spirit says, "You live, so do these things." The law starts with man as he is, inducing him to seek to achieve life by his effort. "For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, That the man which doeth those things shall live by them" (Romans 10:5; KJV).

In plain language this means that under a regime of law, life is dependent upon human performance. Law must be kept meticulously or it is not kept at all. The slightest infraction results in death. The "fly in the ointment" is the fact that man in the flesh cannot keep law perfectly. It is an impossibility, not because of the weakness of the law, but because of the weakness of the flesh. A system based upon law-keeping can never produce righteousness or justification. "Therefore by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight: for by the law is the knowledge of sin" (Romans 3:20). No flesh! Law can make men aware of their weakness and sin. It can produce a sense of failure and guilt upon the part of those who seek to submit to it. Never can it produce guiltlessness in any person who is in the flesh!

Life is not a product of law. No written code, regardless of its origin, can ever produce life. If life could result from law-keeping, it was a heinous act for God to send Christ to die for our sins. He should have sent the law, or given the written code that could produce life. Paul writes, "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law" (Galatians 3:21). He also writes, "If righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain" (2:21).

The Spirit does not start with man as he is, but when that man trusts in the righteousness of God, which is through faith in Christ Jesus, the Spirit makes of him a new creation. He is dead, and his life is "hid with Christ in God" (Colossians 3:3; KJV). Christ becomes his life, for he has no life of his own. His life is not dependent upon obedience to laws, but because he has been transformed he keeps the commands of Christ who is his life. His service is not an attempt to keep the law, but to conform to the Spirit. He is not in the flesh but in the Spirit, because the Spirit of Christ abides in him.

Those who are in Christ are dead to the principles of legalistic righteousness. The custodian who held them is dead. His nerveless grasp has been broken from their necks. Now they are delivered and freed from a written code. That basis of justification is deceased, declared invalid by God's marvelous grace. The purpose is that all of us should serve in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of a written code. This, I think, is what Paul is saying in Romans 7:6: "Now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held; that we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter" (KJV). There is no intimation that service to God is relaxed because the principle of legalistic rectitude is dead. We serve, but it is in newness of spirit. Just because we have matured and the custodian is dead, these facts do not lessen our responsibility. Our very maturity increases that responsibility.

At this point we must inquire as to the principle that is put in our mind and written in our heart, which constitutes the new covenant rule of action. Paul's letters to the Romans and the Galatians are two great dissertations on the difference between law and faith as grounds of justification. It is in these letters the apostle plainly enunciates the one great quality that embraces and fulfills all law.

First let us look at the Roman letter. In it we are told, "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Romans 13:8-10; KJV).

Obviously, the whole purpose of any law given by God is to establish a right relationship with himself and with men. But law cannot accomplish this because law can only make one conscious of failure and guilt. It cannot make him guiltless. Law is external. Love is internal. When one is justified by faith, which is the only way he can be justified, he attains peace with God through the Lord Jesus Christ. Through Jesus he gains access to grace, in which state he can rejoice in hope of the glory of God. This hope never disappoints the one who is at one with God, "because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us" (Romans 5:5).

The first covenant was one of law, the second is one of love. The only debt I can owe another, which it is impossible to settle in full, is that of love. I must never borrow from another what I cannot repay. I do not love God's children because I am in debt to them, but because I am in debt to Him. "Let us love one another: for love is of God" (1 John 4:7); "Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another" (v. 11). One should emphasize the word "so" in this statement.

Love fulfills the law. The apostle specifically mentions five Commandments, forbidding adultery, murder, stealing, false testimony, and covetousness. We generally think of these as moral regulations, but lest the legalistic mind try to find an exception, he writes, "And if there be any other commandment." No law can be given to cover every facet of human behavior or every contingency. Faith in Jesus lifts us out of the area of written codes and shows us "the more excellent way."

Love fulfills the law because it works no ill to another. The love that is here contemplated is the unceasing, undying, uninhibited concern for another's good, manifesting itself in positive action to promote that good. That active and beneficent good will stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object. It is the application of the new God-nature to all human circumstances, problems of association and relationship. Such a broad scope as this can never be captured or confined by a written code, any more than such a code can contain the very essence of God.

For fifteen hundred years God sought to hold His people together by law, until faith could come. Law is a police force, drawing a circle and building a fence beyond which the inmates must not go, under penalty of death or banishment. When Jesus came, law was abandoned as basis of unity, and love was installed in its place. Love is a magnetic force, holding men together by drawing them to a common center. That center is the person of Jesus, who announced, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me."

Jesus did not confine us with another law. He did not build another fence. He did not provide another yoke of bondage. Instead, He set us free, He freed us, not only from the law given by Moses, but the law principle that is helpless because of the flesh. We are told, "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Galatians 5:1; KJV). Any man who postulates his hope of glory upon conformity to a written code is signing his own death warrant. He is building his own scaffold and knotting his own hangman's noose. It makes no difference whether he conceives of the written code as originating with God or man.

"For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another. For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (5:13, 14; KJV). Here the apostle says the same thing to the emotional Gauls that he wrote to the Romans. In doing so, he defines the true use of liberty. Those who are freed from definitive written codes full of "thou shalt nots" are sometimes inclined to take advantage of their liberty. Because there is no wall to debar their progress, they may strain and break the cord of love that holds them to the center— the cross.

We have been called to liberty, but it is not our achievement. We did not escape from prison, we were liberated. We did not disentangle ourselves from the yoke; it was lifted from us. We have been called, so we have a vocation of liberty. We dare not use our God-given liberty to serve the flesh. The custodian died only after delivering us to Jesus. We are not free to do as we please; we are now free to do what will please Him. Liberty and service occur in the same context. "Ye have been called unto liberty . . . by love serve one another" (v. 13).

The new covenant has been inscribed on the walls of the heart. It has not been written with ink but with the Spirit. It does not consist of a compilation of legal propositions, but of one word: love! Correctly understood, that word involves all that law was intended to accomplish but could not. It lifts man out of the very domain of law. It places him in a realm where he can bear the fruits of the Spirit. "Against such there is no law" (v. 23). No law!

Love fulfills the law *because it removes stumbling blocks. Love takes away every occasion for stumbling; that is, it creates no hazard, obstacle, or obstruction to cause anyone to trip or fall. Love is light, hatred is darkness. "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him" (1 John 2:10).

Love fulfills the law *because it gives assurance of life. Love assures us that we have crossed the frontier separating death from life. No written code could ever do this. Under a written code one can never be sure he has gone far enough or done enough to be counted worthy of life. He can never be certain there is not something he should have known and did not know, or something he should have done and did not do. Under the law of love, "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren" (1 John 3:14). Love for the brethren is not the ferry that transports us from death to life. That ferry is faith. But the ability to "love the brethren" is on the opposite side of the border from death. When we have achieved that goal we know we are across the line, because love is the proof of the indwelling Spirit. "And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him" (v. 19).

Love is the fulfilling of the law because God dwells within us. "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us" (4:12; KJV). When God gave the old covenant it was deposited in a sacred ark. It was kept in an earthly sanctuary constructed by the hands of men. Today we are the only sanctuary God has on earth. The covenant cannot be borne upon the shoulders of a special caste. It is enshrined in the hearts of believers. We are the temple of God. Our bodies are His tabernacle. We cannot carry the covenant in our hands. It is not a book we can lay on the library table or place on the shelf. The new covenant is a pact of love. It exhibits itself in love for one another. It is the love of God perfected, fulfilled, and matured.

Under the new covenant God dwells in us and we dwell in Him, because He has given us His Spirit (v. 13). The Spirit is life-giving because He is love-giving. We live because we love, and we love because we live. There is no life apart from love. God is love, and His love is manifested toward us because He "sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him" (v. 9). As John adds, "Herein is love," so we may add, "Herein is life."

The first covenant was announced at a physical mount; the new covenant at a spiritual peak in man's history. When the first was announced, those who heard it were cautioned not to draw near or to cross a boundary. When the second was given, they were invited to "Draw near with a true heart in full assurance" (Hebrews 10:22). The first was engraved upon stone, and was as inflexible as the material upon which it was carved. The second was written upon the hearts of believers, and was as warm as the faith that led them to receive Jesus. The first bound the recipients to God upon the threat that the iniquities of the fathers would be visited upon the children to the third and fourth generations. The second drew the respondents by the promise that their sins would be remembered no more forever. Truly it is a "better covenant, based upon better promises"!

The Freedom of Maturity

Contents

It is extremely difficult for many consecrated believers in Christ to accept the implications of the material in the preceding chapter. There are several reasons why this is so. For one thing, it cuts across the traditional pattern of teaching. We have always been told that "the new testament" consists of twenty-seven books. It seems almost heretical for one to say this is not true. To refute it seems to deny God's Word, even though God nowhere said or implied that such was the case.

It cannot be denied that thousands of people in the world, both Jews and Greeks, were in covenant relationship with God before one word of the New Covenant Scriptures was ever written. Many who died for the faith had never seen an apostolic letter. Many had no idea there would ever be a compilation of such letters. They simply believed that Jesus was the Messiah and God's Son, and pledged allegiance to Him. They renounced any thought of their own righteousness as having been attained by works of the law, and simply put their trust in the righteousness of God through faith in Christ Jesus.

The divine agreement, the covenant that established their relationship with the Father of all mercy, was inscribed by the Holy Spirit upon the walls of the inner chambers of their being. It was written in terms of love, a dynamic so powerful that it not only transformed their lives but completely altered the world in which they lived. The New Covenant Scriptures, now entitled the New Testament, grew out of their covenantal relationship, not vice versa.

As time went on, the Holy Spirit motivated certain ones to make a record of the divine breakthrough on the human plane. A former tax-collector told the story primarily for the Jews. A young man who grew up in Jerusalem, a close friend of Simon Peter, wrote it for the Romans and the Latin world. A Greek physician interviewed eyewitnesses and then compiled and collated the information he had received for presentation to a Greek state official. To this he later added and certified an account of the struggle of the message of hope to free itself, first from the bonds of Jewish legalism, and second from the toils of Greek philosophy. The account ends with the proclamation free and the proclaimer in prison. Much later, a former fisherman, who survived all of the other apostles, wrote a supplementary account to offset the effects of one of the most subtle foes that ever sought to infiltrate the faith.

As communities of believers were beset with problems growing out of the humanity of the covenant people, the apostles wrote letters to them, furnishing guidelines for rethinking their conduct. Sometimes these grew out of reports received from persons who were familiar with the saints in a given locality. Other times they were replies to letters that had asked for information. In still other circumstances the apostles wrote simply because the situation warranted it. One of these was a letter commending a runaway slave to his master, to whose home he was returning. Another was addressed to a people who were being seduced from the liberty they enjoyed in Jesus.

Those who received the letters did not regard them as legal documents. The writers who penned them had no consciousness of creating a code of laws. They merely wrote letters of deep affection to people whom they loved, without any thought of writing a Bible. Paul, who wrote most of the letters, disclaimed any thought of domination over the faith of the recipients. He said, "Not for that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand" (2 Corinthians 1:24; KJV).

During the life span of the apostles, the letters were scattered among isolated communities, although they were occasionally shared with other believers in the same general region (Colossians 4:16). It was not until long after the death of John, and after a good deal of debate about the validity of some of the letters, that the canon was completed and the New Covenant Scriptures were collected as we now have them.

It is true that our relationship to God is a covenantal relationship. There is a great deal of difference, however, between the covenant or agreement and the letters written to the covenant people. The covenant is entered by faith in Jesus as the fulfillment of the promises of God. It results from a response to the good news that Christ "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Timothy 1:10). The gospel was fully proclaimed on Pentecost. Not another word was ever added to it. Those who responded to it, by reformation of life and baptism, entered into the covenant with God, even though they never saw an apostolic letter and certainly never saw a copy of the New Covenant Scriptures.

The gospel is not a legalistic arrangement by which we earn God's favor. It is the good news of God's marvelous grace growing out of the love which God is. The New Covenant Scriptures are not a legalistic code, for we are not under law but under grace. The Scriptures are a collection of "love letters," written in familiar terms. They do not represent the will of God imposed, but the mind of God exposed. They act as guidelines, showing how Christ would react under conditions faced by saints on earth. They are instructional material intended to inform subjects how to prepare for the coming of their King.

Another reason for the reluctance of many people to accept what was said about the covenants is that they would rather be under law than under grace. It is for this reason they make grace into law and convert the love letters of the apostles into a written code. They are frightened by the freedom that makes them personally responsible for their decisions. They prefer to have things "spelled out" and have a law-book. Then they can go and "look it up" to see how far they can go and still remain within the limits. It is easier to qualify as a good lawyer than as a great lover. It is easier to lay down the law than to live up to love.

This is indicative of emotional and spiritual immaturity. An adolescent outwardly demands freedom but inwardly craves restraint. He wants his parents to lay down laws, even though he professes outward rebellion against their regulations. The reason for this inner turmoil is his association of love with law. Enforcement of law, even though it galls him to comply, indicates to his still immature mind that his parents are shielding and protecting him from the big world he is still afraid to face alone. He would rather be behind walls with a sense of security than to be forced to face life openly and on his own.

In the Roman world in which the apostles lived, a son was turned over to others who were charged with his rearing. Even though the boy was destined to become heir to his father's estate and title of nobility, he was under such a tight reign and subjected to such strict discipline that he was little better off than a slave. Every action was ordered by others. His life was regimented each hour of the day. He made no independent decisions. All of this continued until he reached the age of puberty, when his father publicly presented him as a citizen to the populace.

The whole course of a youth's life was changed from that moment onward. No longer was he under the hand of disciplinarians who could flog him into compliance with their will. Publicly recognized as a son by the father, he could now move among men as a man. This did not mean he was a law unto himself. He was bound by ties of respect to his family. His actions brought honor or dishonor to the family name. His concern had to be for others. He had to measure his behavior in the light of his influence.

Paul uses this familiar way of life to illustrate God's plan for His people through the ages. After describing the law as a custodian charged with delivering us to Christ, and pointing out that once this was accomplished we were no longer under a custodian, he introduces the example drawn from social life: "Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father" (Galatians 4:1, 2; KJV).

Notice now his application to the people of God: "Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world" (v. 3). In their childhood age, God's chosen people were treated as children. At Mount Sinai they were placed under the tutelage of a custodian. That custodian was the written code. This stern disciplinarian actually reduced the children to a status comparable to that of household slaves. The written code is here referred to as "the elements of this world." The term refers to the fundamental or primary principles upon which any system is founded. In the literary world it was applied to the alphabet, which was basic to all writing. In the natural world it was applied to atoms out of which all matter was composed. In the social world it was applied to fundamentals of moral and ethical behavior.

"But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons" (vv. 4, 5). Under Roman law the father decided the time when he would deliver the son from his custodians, and publicly acknowledge him as a son of the family and a citizen of the commonwealth. In the spiritual realm, it was God who ordained the time when faith should come.

When the time arrived for the world's attainment of sonship, God sent His Son. It was important that our deliverance be wrought by the Son, because in Him we could see what was entailed in divine sonship. The Son of God became the Son of man so that the sons of men could become the sons of God. Note that God did not send a new or better legal code to deliver us. Instead, He sent His Son. In Christ we do not sustain a legal relationship to the Father, but a personal one. God sent a person to inaugurate that relationship.

In His entrance into our world to share our lot, Jesus was made of a woman. He was not the seed of man. He was not begotten by Joseph, although He was conceived by Mary. He was made under the law, and He fulfilled it. He was the only person who ever did so. He was tempted in all points as we are, but He was without sin. Because He had no sin for which to suffer, He could suffer for our sins. God laid upon Him the iniquity of us all. He delivered us from the curse of the law by having been made a curse for us.

It is through Christ's sacrifice that we receive the adoption of sons. "And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ" (vv. 6, 7). God did not hand us another law, a written code to govern us as sons. Such a code belonged to the days of childish immaturity. He sent forth the Spirit of His Son, that is, the Spirit of sonship. The Holy Spirit's indwelling presence marks us out as belonging to the divine family.

The Spirit within brings out the consciousness of a father-son relationship. It is not based upon legalistic compliance but upon acceptance through mutuality of love. "We love him, because he first loved us," wrote John (1 John 4:19). In the joy of acceptance, expressed by the word "adoption," the inner being cries out "Abba, Father." The first term expresses the initial exclamation of the little child for the parent, conveying affection and dependence. The last is the mature recognition of warm relationship.

God has delivered us from the status of slaves. He no longer treats us as minors. The coming of Jesus was the signal for the coming of age of the people of God. The fullness of the time was the time of their fullness. Unfortunately, many people are not able to accept the sense of responsibility involved in the freedom of sonship. In their spiritual adolescence they seek to convert the very love letters addressed to them into a legalistic arrangement, which would thrust them back into slavery.

Only a little thought is required to demonstrate that the new covenant cannot be postulated upon such a written code. When a community is founded upon law, the law must be enunciated first. Those who are to constitute the community must consent to it and pledge their allegiance to it. If the procedure were the reverse of this, the community could have imposed upon it regulations that the members would abhor, and to which they could not subscribe in good conscience. As was stated, we do not erect a structure and then construct a foundation; we first lay the foundation.

The nation of Israel is a good example. It was God's design to create for himself a nation that would preserve the concept of monotheism until the Messiah should come. He would be identified as the Son of the one God who made Heaven and earth. Accordingly, God called His people out of slavery in Egypt and led them across the Red Sea. Instead of taking them by the ancient caravan route, which gave direct access to the land of Canaan but led through hostile Philistine territory, He conducted them southward to Mount Sinai, or Horeb. He called Moses to come up into the mountain in the presence of all the people and gave him instructions to relay to the multitude. The people were to wash their clothes so they could appear clean in the presence of the Lord. They were to abstain from sexual relationship with their wives. They were not to touch the mountain, under the penalty of death. A boundary line was drawn around the base of the mountain so no man or beast could make physical contact with it. Then, "Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God" (Exodus 19:17; KJV).

When the assembly heard the voice of God thundering from the peak, they were frightened. They requested that Moses be allowed to go and receive the message of God and relay it to them. "And Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the Lord hath said will we do" (Exodus 24:3).

Moses wrote all the words God had spoken, and arose very early in the morning to construct an altar in the shadow of the hill. Young men were dispatched to offer a sacrifice upon the altar. Moses caught half of the blood in a basin and sprinkled the remainder upon the altar to sanctify it. He then took the book of the covenant and read it in the hearing of the people. They responded to the reading by saying, "All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient" (v. 7). Moses thereupon took the blood in the basin and sprinkled it upon the people and the book, saying, "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words" (v. 8).

The sprinkling of the book consecrated it to the people, while the sprinkling of the people consecrated them to the book. The covenant founded upon law was inaugurated, and from thenceforth the nation was bound to keep all the words of that law or die. To violate a covenant with God is a tragic renunciation of a promise. To break a covenant with Him is to become a traitor to the Eternal God.

In the case of the "new covenant," which God specifically declared was not to be like the one made with the fathers when they were led forth from Egypt, there was no written code announced and read. Ours is a personal relationship with Jesus, through whom grace and truth came. Instead of writing a book and sprinkling it with blood, Peter publicly announced the facts concerning the life, death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. He ended by saying, "This same Jesus God raised up and made Him both Lord and Christ." The application of the blood of the new covenant was figuratively to the hearts of the believers.

The New Covenant Scriptures could not have constituted a legal code upon which the church was erected, simply because they were not yet written. They were written many years later. It is true that those who were baptized "continued stedfastly in the teaching of the apostles," also in the sharing of the common life in Christ, in the breaking of bread, and in prayers, but this was in no sense a ritualistic performance based upon legal specifications. It was the natural expression of hearts filled with the Holy Spirit after being cleansed and purged by divine forgiveness.

A written code was the foundation of the nation composed of those called out from slavery in Egypt. The foundation of the kingdom composed of those called out of bondage to sin was a simple fact, the greatest in all history. That fact is that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God. When Simon Peter openly testified to it, Jesus pronounced a blessing upon him and declared that his statement was a Heaven-revealed truth. He said, "Upon this rock I will build my church." On that fact He would plant the called-out ones. The church is composed of those who are not under law, but under grace. Their hope is not derived from righteousness based upon law, but from righteousness of faith in Christ.

At one time in my life I thought the New Covenant Scriptures, consisting of the apostolic letters of love and sharing, constituted a blueprint for the church, exactly as the legal code given at Sinai did for the nation of Israel. I did not stop to realize that a blueprint must be in the hands of the construction superintendent and the carpenters before the building is started. I freely quoted what God said to Moses when he was about to make the tabernacle, and applied it to ourselves. The instruction to Moses was "See that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount" (Hebrews 8:5; KJV).

In spite of what may be said about "pattern theology" and a "divine blueprint," the New Covenant Scriptures do not constitute either a pattern or blueprint by which the church was constructed. If they do, the church was not built by the blueprint, because it was in existence a good many years before a single epistle was written. Each letter was addressed to only one community of believers. Not one area had all of the Scriptures available to it for many decades. There were congregations that lived and perished who never saw one segment of "the blueprint," and did not know that such existed.

The writer of Hebrews contrasts the old covenant and the new. Unfortunately, many readers think he is comparing them and pointing out similarities. Reference is made to the time when Moses was instructed to build the tabernacle after having been shown a pattern of the tent and all of its furnishings. Many readers assume that when God said, "See that you make all things according to the pattern," He was, by implication, telling us also to build the church according to a blueprint supplied to and by the apostles. This analogy breaks down for several reasons, including the following:

1. Moses was given a preview of the tabernacle because it was to be built by men who had never seen such a structure. It is specifically stated, however, that the true tabernacle was one "which the Lord pitched, and not man" (8:2). Since it was not pitched by man, it was unnecessary to provide a blueprint for man.

2. Since the priests offered gifts according to the law and served "unto the example and shadow of heavenly things," it is sometimes argued that we are under a written blueprint to provide the antitype. In that eventuality our blueprint would have been the pattern shown to Moses, not the New Covenant Scriptures at all. Our task would be to "spiritualize" the pattern shown to Moses and to erect the true tabernacle accordingly. In that case the true tabernacle would be pitched by man, and not the Lord, in contravention of the plain Scriptural statement.

3. The very next sentence after the quotation relating to the "pattern shown to Moses" (v. 5), begins with the words, "But now." When these words occur in Scripture, they indicate a change in God's dealings with mankind. It is true that under the first covenant Moses was shown a replica of the tabernacle and instructed to make everything according to it. The writer of Hebrews continues, "But now hath he [Christ] obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also he is the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises" (v. 6).

Under the new covenant God did not provide a pattern or blueprint of a structure. Instead, He gave His Son, and it is the Son who is our pattern, or example. Speaking about the persecution and hardship that are to be endured by one who is identified with Jesus, Peter writes, "For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps" (1 Peter 2:21; KJV).

The temple of God today is composed of living stones, of individuals who are cleansed and purified by the blood of Christ. The only sanctuary is a consecrated human heart, and for this the blueprint is the life of Jesus. The first covenant began with a book; the new covenant began with a baby. The first created holy days and holy places, the second created holy persons. The first covenant, like the first Adam, was of the earth, earthy; the second covenant, like the second Adam, was the Lord from Heaven.

Our hope lies in conformity to the Christ, not in conformity to a code. We do not walk in statutes but in the Spirit. We are free from the demands of the flesh which made law necessary. The flesh has no claim upon us, since Jesus died in the flesh. Those who continue to walk after the flesh shall die. We are not in the flesh but in the Spirit, if it is true that the Spirit of Christ dwells in us. When the dominion of the flesh was destroyed and we were liberated, we were freed from the bondage in which we were once held. To form a new written code from the letters that the apostles wrote to congregations and individuals, would be to forge anew the fetters that would bring us once again into captivity to law.

Answering Objections

Contents

It would be both unfair and unwise to pretend that there are no objections to the position advocated in this volume. The fact is that serious questions are raised, and many of these come from sincere students of the divine revelation. They love truth and are eager seekers after it. They do not want to be misled or diverted into a false path. Their questions deserve careful consideration and demand honest answers.

First, let us give attention to those passages of the apostolic letters which seem to indicate we are still under law. Paul clearly states, "By works of the law no flesh shall be justified in his [God's] sight" (Romans 3:20). He also declares that we are "not under the law, but under grace" (6:14). If the very letters Paul wrote constitute a written code, and compose part of the framework of a legalistic system, it is obvious that we are still under law. The apostle then contradicts himself.

It will help us to keep in mind that the word "law" covers a wide spectrum of thought. The term itself is from an Old English form that refers to something laid or fixed, without reference to the source of the action. Our modern word "lay" is directly related to it, and we still use the expression, "lay down the law," when we speak of someone disclosing his wishes in an authoritative fashion.

In the New Covenant Scriptures the Greek word is nomos, and this refers to any rule of action, including that which motivates or impels one to engage in certain actions. Perhaps the term "controlling principle" sums up the wide scope of meanings. In this sense all are under law as the natural consequence of being rational, or having the power to reason. Paul affirms, "When Gentiles who have not the law do by nature what the law requires, they are a law to themselves, even though they do not have the law. They show that what the law requires is written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness and their conflicting thoughts accuse or perhaps excuse them on that day when, according to my gospel, God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus" (Romans 2:14-16; RSV).

In this same connection he asserts, "So, if a man who is uncircumcised keeps the precepts of the law, will not his uncircumcision be regarded as circumcision? Then those who are physically uncircumcised but keep the law will condemn you who have the written code and circumcision but break the law" (vv. 26, 27; RSV). A clear distinction is thus made between the written code and the principles of conduct observed as a natural result of our status as human beings, which provides us with both the power to think and the restraint of conscience. Every sane person acts through motivation or impulse, and the principles governing his action can be properly called law. It is obvious that those who have crucified the old man of sin and who are made partakers of the divine nature will act as directed and motivated by that nature, being a part of "the new humanity."

The question that concerns us is whether or not under the benign dominion of grace we are still under a legalistic system. Do the New Covenant Scriptures constitute a written code in the sense that the writings of Moses constituted such a code? Are we justified by conformity to a written code? Is grace simply the substitution of a new written code of laws for another that was declared invalid? This is precisely what a great many people think, and it is the reason why every use of the word "law" is interpreted by them to indicate that we are still under a legalistic system.

A good case in point is found in Romans 3:27, where Paul speaks of "the law of faith." Simple attention to the context should demonstrate that the apostle is not referring to a written code. Certainly the collection of New Covenant Scriptures cannot possibly constitute "the law of faith" of which he speaks.

Paul affirms that the righteousness of God to which the law and the prophets testified is now seen to be achieved without the law, and this is through faith in Jesus Christ (vv. 21-23). Upon this basis it is available to all who believe in Him, and there is no difference or distinction, since all have sinned and fallen short of the glory of God.

Paul further makes it clear that justification is by grace, which is a gift, freely given through the wonderful redemption in Christ Jesus. No longer does man identify with law in a vain hope of attaining righteousness, but with Christ Jesus who is our righteousness.

Paul anticipates the question, "Where is boasting then?" (v. 27). The answer is that it is excluded. It is obvious that if one attained to righteousness by his own efforts, through proper understanding and implementation of all the demands of law, he would have grounds to boast of his accomplishment. On the other hand, if righteousness is a gift based wholly upon what another has done for him, and which he could not do for himself, he has no reason for pride or boasting. The apostle writes, "Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? of works? Nay: but by the law of faith" (v. 27; KJV).

It is regrettable that the King James Version has the rendering "law," since the apostle is dealing with the principle of justification. There are but two conceivable bases upon which justification can be predicated. One is the perfect keeping of law, and the other is absolute trust in a perfect Redeemer. The first is impossible for men in the flesh, the second negates human pride and boasting. The Revised Standard Version is correct in rendering the passage, "Then what becomes of our boasting? It is excluded. On what principle? On the principle of works? No, but on the principle of faith." The next verse states the conclusion, "For we hold that a man is justified by faith apart from works of law."

Certainly the "law of faith," as the term is employed in the King James Version, has no relation to a written code. The Romans who received the letter never saw a copy of the New Covenant Scriptures. To postulate to them that they were to be justified by conformity to such a compilation of letters would have confused them as much as it does those in our generation who have inserted their own interpretation of Paul's words. The principle of faith in the righteousness of Jesus Christ is one thing; the letters addressed to those who are in Him constitute a wholly different thing.

Romans 8 also causes concern for those who think of a written code every time they see the word "law." The apostle Paul writes, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (vv. 1, 2).

Those who equate "the law of sin and death" with the legalistic code given at Sinai tend to think of "the law of the Spirit of life" as being the New Covenant Scriptures. This is another example of reading into the Scriptures an opinion reflecting a postapostolic conclusion. The apostle stated in the previous chapter that we were freed from the demands of the law, having died to that which held us captive. Now we serve God, not under the old written code, but in the new life of the Spirit. One who is in Christ Jesus is freed from condemnation. There is no condemnation in Christ. He atoned for our sins on the cross, redeemed us from iniquity, and removed our guilt.

It is true that the Spirit inspired and empowered those who wrote the Scriptures, but it is not the Scriptures to which the apostle here alludes. He is saying that the principle of "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" has set us free and delivered us from the dominion of sin and death. Life in Christ is the natural order for the redeemed ones. The law of the Spirit is not a book but life in Christ Jesus. Those to whom Paul wrote were walking according to that law of the Spirit long before they received the letter he penned.

Properly understood, this explains the term "law of God" in the seventh verse, where Paul said, "The carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." The carnal mind is the mind of the flesh, the rational part of man under the dominating principle of the corrupt nature. Such a mind is not merely apathetic to the will of God, but antagonistic and hostile. The alienation that results from the lower nature breeds enmity against God.

In 1 Corinthians 9:21 the apostle declares he is "not without law to God, but under the law of Christ" (KJV). Those persons who regard the New Covenant Scriptures as a written code project that idea into the expression, "under the law to Christ." This is the result of forgetting or ignoring the context of the passage and Paul's purpose of writing it.

In the preceding verses the apostle had outlined his reasons for not accepting financial support from the Corinthians, a right he abdicated rather than suffer under the accusation that he was proclaiming the gospel for personal gain. His complete adherence to the will of Christ made him free from any claim men might exercise over him. In spite of the fact that he was free from all men, he made himself a slave to all, adapting and accommodating himself to others, so that he might influence them to come to Christ.

"To them that are under the law, as under the law, that I might gain them that are under the law" (v. 20). This refers to the law given by Moses. When Paul labored among those who were scrupulous in keeping the law, he did not offend them by deliberately flaunting its provisions. He moved within its regulations. Once, while in Jerusalem, he acted upon the counsel of James to prove that he personally lived in observance of the law (Acts 21:24). When among Jews, Paul lived as a Jewish national; when among those under the law, he conducted himself as one subservient to the demands of the law.

"To them that are without law, as without law, (being not without law to God, but under the law to Christ,) that I might gain them that are without law" (v. 21). The term anomos, which would be properly rendered "lawless," does not apply to the conduct or character of the people. It refers to the fact that no law had been given them or enacted for them. There is a difference in being without law and being an outlaw. It is a tribute to the versatility and flexibility of Paul that he could fit into the daily life of non-Jews.

The apostle did not want the Corinthians to think that he was antinomian, that is, opposed to rules of life and conduct. He was not a scofflaw. Even while living among those who had not received oracles from God, he recognized the sovereignty of God over every facet of life. He acknowledged also the fact that all authority had been given to Christ. In fact, Christ was Paul's law, the life of Jesus being his example and pattern. None of this argues that the new covenant is another legal code or that the New Covenant Scriptures constitute a legal document rather than a disclosure of the nature of grace.

Perhaps one of the most interesting studies in this regard is the letter of James, addressed directly "To the twelve tribes in the Dispersion" (James 1:1; RSV). That these were Jews who believed in Jesus as the Messiah is quite clear from James 2:1, 2. The word "assembly" is from sunagoge rather than from ekklesia. James speaks to them of the "perfect law" (1:25), the "royal law" (2:8), and the "law of liberty" (1:25). That all of these expressions refer to the same thing is at once apparent to the careful reader.

James begins in 1:22 with the solemn admonition that men must be doers of what is enjoined by the Word of God, and not mere hearers. Hearers of the Word only serve to deceive themselves. They listen but do not learn. In common parlance they allow what they hear to "go into one ear and out of the other." The writer declares that such a person is like a man who looks into a mirror and immediately forgets what he was like. Such a man would not remove marks or blemishes from his countenance, because he has forgotten about them.

This is followed by a contrast, quoted from the Revised Standard Version, because this reading seems to best grasp the meaning of the original: "But he who looks into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and perseveres, being no hearer that forgets but a doer that acts, he shall be blessed in his doing" (v. 25). What is the "perfect law"? It could not be the completed New Covenant Scriptures, of which the letter by James is a part, because there was no such compilation at the time. It is probable that the addressees of "the Dispersion" never saw another apostolic letter. Some of them, scattered as exiles throughout Asia Minor, may have read the letter designated "the First Epistle of Peter."

The "perfect law" is not a designation for the completed canon of the New Covenant Scriptures. Those who received the letter from James would have been in their graves many years before there was such a collection of apostolic documents. The word "perfect" is applied to "the law of liberty" because of its origin. It is from God and was personified in Christ. It was personal rather than preceptual, providing a Savior rather than statutes. The perfect law was embodied in a Man rather than inscribed in a manual. It was the life of Christ rather than a list of codes. Christ Jesus has left us an example that we should follow in His steps (1 Peter 2:21). The perfect law is from the mind of a perfect God, and was lived out before us in a sinless life.

The "law of liberty" is also perfect because of its nature. It is the law of love, and this love is the very essence of God. God is love. Every commandment is summed up in love, so that the one who truly loves fulfills every demand for which law was intended. Love validates every gift and sanctifies every sacrifice. Without love the most gifted individual is nothing, and without love the supreme sacrifice is of no profit. Love is the highest attainment to which man can ascend. "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us" (1 John 4:12; KJV). In Christ love is life, and life is love.

That James had this in mind is evident from what he says in dealing with the problem of showing partiality toward those who are rich and influential. He describes the universal obligation of love as "the royal law," the king of all laws (James 2:8). This is the law from which all others derive their meaning and toward which all others are subservient. "If you really fulfil the royal law, according to the scripture, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself,' you do well. But if you show partiality, you commit sin, and are convicted by the law as transgressors" (2:8, 9; RSV). Love for any neighbor precludes the showing of partiality. Partiality violates the fundamental law of social well-being as manifested in the life of Jesus.

There is another thing about the word "perfect" we should not overlook. It is a translation of teleios, a word meaning "completion" or "perfection." In most cases it refers to perfection for a purpose or definite end. It was used for the attainment of the goal by a runner and his reception of the honorary wreath. It was used in the scholastic realm for one who had finished his course in the academy. Thus, James wrote a law combining all of the moral and ethical values Jesus taught and exemplified, and which were designed to make a man all that God intended for him to be.

No legal code can ever accomplish this. For man there must be an ideal so majestic that it will challenge him to transcend the fleshly and carnal life. As man identifies with that ideal he rises above the temptations that beset him and he becomes more than a conqueror. The revelation of God is a mirror reflecting the face and person of Jesus, making our shortcomings manifest by contrast.

The perfect law is one of liberty. This is interesting because law is a restraining and restricting force by its very nature. But the law of Christ, the governing principles of the Christ-life, frees one from debtorship to the flesh, from the slavery of passion and inordinate desire. It frees him to become his best as a son of God. But there is more to it than that, as will be seen by a study of the use of the same expression in James 2:8-13.

We must never forget that James was writing to Jews, who were familiar with the law as given by Moses. History portrays James himself as one who rigorously kept the law. The first part of the second chapter of his letter deals with the tendency to show preference toward the rich and affluent who visited the assembly of the saints. Such a practice might well be justified by a Jew who would say, "We were simply doing what the law enjoins in showing special consideration, for we were told to love our neighbor as ourselves."

To this James replies, "If you really fulfil the royal law, according to the scripture, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself,' you do well" (2:8). If that were the only motivation for showing politeness to visitors, there would be no distinction in the treatment of the rich and poor; but showing partiality is not obeying the law of God. It is a sin, and the one convicted of it is a transgressor. Remember that the Jews to whom James wrote had no New Testament Scriptures. When James talked about the "royal law according to the scriptures," he was quoting Leviticus 19:18.

To justify one's action by quoting one statement from the law while ignoring the remainder of it is to be guilty of inconsistency. The Jews had enumerated 613 commandments in the law. It was not conceivable to them that one could obey all of them. As a result they had developed the casuistic philosophy that one could total the commands he had kept during a certain period, and subtract the total of the ones he had specifically violated. If the result showed a favorable balance, he could feel justified. The rabbis taught that if one observed a command of the law, good was credited to him. His life would be prolonged and he would prosper in his inheritance. James insisted that what counts is one's attitude to the whole law, not the observance of an isolated commandment, which can then be quoted to gain credit.

The follower of Jesus is not under any written code enforced with police power or judicial authority. Therefore, writes James, "So speak and so act as those who are to be judged under the law of liberty" (2:12:RSV). We are not under statutory specifications, but in a spiritual relationship. We are to govern our speech and actions by the law of liberty, and this principle of behavior makes it possible for us to show mercy. Mercy is not required by one who lives perfectly, but by one who does not. It is the kind and compassionate treatment shown to an offender.

Law, as such, is interested in justice, not mercy. There is no justice in absolute mercy, and no mercy in absolute justice. One dies without mercy under the testimony of credible witnesses, when he is under a written code of authority. We operate under a law of liberty, and this provides for kindness or compassion. The one who shows no mercy will receive none. Our English word "mercy" is from the Latin mercedis, meaning payment, or reward. It refers to the heavenly reward to be given to the compassionate.

None of us will attain to glory except by the mercy of God. We simply cannot be saved upon the basis of our own righteousness. God will use the yardstick by which we measure others as the criterion for measuring us. If we show no mercy we will receive none. If we receive none we will be lost. The principle of liberty in Christ Jesus makes it possible for us to be compassionate. It distinguishes between love of law and the law of love.

The Commandments of Jesus

Contents

Many people have not yet grasped the greatness of a covenant inscribed by the Holy Spirit upon the chambers of the heart. It is difficult for them to see the difference between the requirements of a written legal code and the commandments voiced by Jesus. They reason that if a disciple of Jesus is obligated to keep His commandments, and if those commandments are now contained in the collection of documents called the New Testament Scriptures, those Scriptures must be a written code of laws or commandments.

In plain terms, this would mean that the law of Moses was a custodian to bring us to Christ, and that Christ has now placed us under another custodian. It should be a sufficient answer to this kind of rationalization to point out that it negates everything in the very apostolic letters, which are assumed to be the new written code. Nothing can be plainer than the statement of Paul, "But now that faith has come, we are no longer under a custodian" (Galatians 3:25; RSV).

Certainly the disciples of Jesus will keep the commandments of Jesus. This is the very essence of discipleship. But keeping His commandments is the response of love to Him as a person and not the observance of a code through fear of the consequences. A lawbreaker is subject to fear, but "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. We love him, because he first loved us" (1 John 4:18, 19; KJV).

Jesus did not come to place us under law but to reconcile us to God. He came that we might have life and have it more abundantly. He came to restore a relationship that had been shattered by sin and abrogated by alienation. Thus He said, "If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him" (John 14:23; KJV). There is no greater happiness than the recognition that one has the Father and the Son as his permanent guests.

Many people who read this would be flattered if the President of the United States chose to stay one night in their home. A far more tremendous honor comes to those who can live daily in the intimate companionship of the Creator of the universe and His only begotten Son. This transcendent experience does not begin with, nor result from, obedience to commands, as many people think. It begins with love for Jesus, and it is perpetuated and sustained by that love. Keeping the commandments of Jesus results from that love as a natural and effortless consequence. It is not conformity to a code, but the affectionate surrender to the embrace of a person in joyful recognition of acceptance.

One of the most outstanding declarations about the divine-human relationship which results from true discipleship occurs in John 15:9-15. Here Jesus is sharing His intimate thoughts with the apostles before His imminent torture and death. They were sorrowful in contemplation of the anticipated separation, but Jesus speaks of love, joy, and peace. He uses the terms "my love," "my joy," and "my peace," indicating that there was a quality about them that the world had not probed or understood. Indeed, He had said, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you" (14:27; KJV). He then declared that the Father is glorified when the branches He has pruned produce fruit commensurate with the care bestowed upon them. This is how men prove they are disciples of Jesus Christ. Fruit cannot be borne by branches detached from the vine, and the fruit is an indication that the branches are connected with and abiding in the vine. Abundance of fruit is proof of the response to the action of God upon the life. "Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit" (15:2).

In direct connection with the statement relating to that productivity as a proof of discipleship, Jesus goes on to say, "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full" (vv. 9-11). Keeping the commandments is here placed in a framework of divine love and joy.

Jesus was loved, so He was able to love. His love for the disciples was a projection of the love manifested toward Him by the Father. His keeping of the Father's commandment was a demonstration of His response to the Father's love. The statement, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall continue in my love" (v. 10), is not so much a conditional stipulation as it is an explanatory statement. Keeping the commandments is the way we exhibit love. The way Jesus manifested love for us is the way we are to manifest love for Jesus.

These guidelines and criteria were spoken, not to remind us of a law, but to remind us of the divine joy that results from union with Jesus. Joy is one of God's gifts to us. It is a fruit of the Spirit. What Jesus said about keeping His commandments was to guarantee that the delight and exultation that transcend sorrow and discouragement would remain with us and fill our cup of life with gladness and rejoicing.

Jesus continues with the statement, "This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you" (v. 12). It is noteworthy that several times in the New Covenant

Scriptures a switch is made from "commandments" in the plural to "commandment" in the singular. Each time it is asserted that the commandment of Christ is to love one another. The fact that the degree of our love is measured by the love of Jesus for men makes it a new commandment. The love that sums up all other commandments is defined, not by a legalistic explanation, but by a divine attitude and action. The one who loves in this fashion fulfills the whole law; that is, he exhibits the state of righteousness for which law was designed and to which it could never attain.

This will not satisfy one who is convinced that keeping the law is the real goal of human existence and the only hope of pleasing God. To such a person love is only one tenet of a legal system; it is not the ultimate response of a broken and contrite spirit that reaches up to God to experience love and reaches down to the needy in order to share it. Everyone must make a choice between love of law and the law of love, and his choice will determine whether he will exist in bondage or live in liberty.

What difference can there be between a legal system and the commandments of Jesus? This question is always posed by those who would channel and confine the grace of God until they can control it. If one is obligated by his relationship to Jesus to keep His commandments, even though he is gathered up in love, he still must be under a code of laws. But there are great areas of difference between law-keeping and the response to grace in love. We shall mention only four such areas, and these have to do primarily with the attitudes engendered by consciousness of law.

1. All written codes of law must have a recognized interpreter. The interpretation of law by such a recognized authority becomes the official one, and it must be followed, whether the individual agrees with the assigned meaning or not. The Constitution of the United States of America is the foundation of our republic, but the interpretations placed upon the provisions by the Supreme Court becomes the real law that the citizens must obey. In the two centuries since the Constitution was drafted, a great mass of material has been collected into books containing judgments, decisions, rulings, and precedents. The constitutional lawyer must consult the index for all of these in order to make an appeal or a case in court.

The Roman Catholic Church is a legalistic institution. It is a religio-politico power patterned after the Roman imperial system. At the head of this sprawling "empire" is a pope, a universal "father," whose ex cathedra pronouncements are deemed to be infallible. They must therefore be accepted without question as the official dogma of the members. All Protestant groups regarding the New Covenant Scriptures as a legal code have their own official interpreters, and these will differ from each other according to the authoritarian structure created by the various sects.

In religious parties that are congregational in form, a "presbytery," or eldership, may be vested with the power to decide upon the official interpretation. This becomes a dogma, and from this no appeal can be taken. The spirit of dogma is the same, whether administered by a universal pope or a local eldership. It differs in degree, but not in nature. It is inherent in any movement that regards itself as under law and not under grace, or which interprets grace in terms of law.

If we regard the "new covenant" as one in which God's laws are inscribed in our hearts and written in our minds, rather than compiled in a written code of jurisprudence, the individual conscience, enlightened by truth, becomes the supreme court. An institution does not have a mind. Although political, social, and religious movements operate in such a fashion as to try to produce a "mass mind" and "an organization man," this was never God's purpose. That idea runs counter to the divine design for our spiritual development. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Romans 14:5) is an expression of Heaven's purpose. Each individual makes the response of love to God and man according to his ability at the time.

2. Every legalistic system must create an enforcement agency. Laws not enforced are worse than no laws at all. A society based upon constitutional law must develop a police power charged with the responsibility of keeping the citizenry in line and in subjection to the law. In the Roman Catholic Church, the hierarchy is the enforcement agency. The inventions of purgatory and the confessional booth make it possible for the parish priest to entertain pleas of guilt and to assess the various penalties for infractions of the moral code.

In other religious legal systems, conformity is secured by investing the clergy or presbytery with special powers of enforcement. Under threat of expulsion from the community for any expression of opinion contrary to the established dogmata, silence is secured by coercion. Dissidents are thus kept in check. All of this is contrary to the grace-faith covenant in which an individual's relationship with God is based upon receiving Jesus as the Lord of life and continuing to abide in Him.

3. Regarding the new covenant as a system of laws contained in a written code automatically assumes that anyone who does not meticulously comply with every specification is a lawbreaker. The religious establishment will treat such persons as criminals or felons. They will be dealt with summarily, lest they influence others to engage in similar "illegal" actions. There is no room for a brother who is honestly mistaken because "ignorance of the law excuses no one."

In legalistic communities, every person who questions the status quo becomes a heretic or false teacher. Although the latter term is used only once in the New Covenant Scriptures, where it applies to one who denies the Lord who bought us, it is a general designation for those who disagree in modern sectarian parlance.

All of this is in contravention to our adoption into a divine family or household. In this concept, the children do not reach a common level of understanding at a given time, but continue in various stages of mental growth and achievement. Those who do not fully grasp the Father's will, or who are unable to freely carry it out, are not lawbreakers. There are those who are weak in the faith, but they still are to be received (Romans 14:1). There are members of the body deemed less honorable, but upon these we bestow the more abundant honor (1 Corinthians 12:23). All of us are to walk according to our present spiritual attainment (Philippians 3:16), even as we seek to grow in grace and in knowledge of the truth.

Involuntary ignorance is not a sin, although voluntary ignorance, which is a deliberate refusal to learn, is always a sin. We can keep the commandments only as we become aware of and apprehend them. To obey them as a response to the person of Jesus provides for our loving even while we are learning. It is our love and not our degree of knowledge that makes us worthy to be received. "If anyone fancies that he knows, he knows nothing yet, in the true sense of knowing. But if a man loves, he is acknowledged by God" (1 Corinthians 8:3; NEB). We are forbidden to judge a brother upon one hand or to hold him in contempt upon the other. "Each of us must consider his neighbour and think what is for his good and will build up the common life" (Romans 15:2; NEB).

4. Another characteristic of a legalistic system is to create a feeling of insecurity and doubt as to one's standing with God. No one can ever be sure at a given time that he knows as much of the law as he ought to know in order to be saved. No one knows that his obedience to what he does know is sufficient for his justification.

The keeping of the commandments as a response of love and a response to love places the emphasis upon love rather than upon the commandments. One does not love Christ because he keeps the commandments, but he keeps the commandments because he loves Christ. He does not keep the commandments in order to be received, but because he has been received he keeps the commandments.

There is always an element of fear connected with law, but perfect love casts out fear: "And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world. There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love" (1 John 4:16-18; KJV).

We have the assurance that God loves us. He proved it by sending His Son to be the atonement for our sins. We know that even death cannot be triumphant over us. God will give us victory over the last enemy through our Lord Jesus Christ. Even now we can cast our cares, concerns, and worries upon Him, because He cares for us. He has promised that He will never leave or forsake us. We are not foster children delivered to God's house by law. We are sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. He is our Father and we are His children.

We study the New Covenant Scriptures, not to prepare ourselves as lawyers, but to know better how to express love for God and our neighbors. We regard the love letters of the apostles as did those to whom they were originally written. We read them as letters from dear friends and not as a compendium of laws sent from a bureau of statutory requirements. Even those letters dealing with thorny problems use the word "brothers" repeatedly. The apostles were not writing to brothers-in-law, but to brothers in love.

There are warm and intimate communications that close with such words as "My love be with you all in Christ Jesus" (1 Corinthians 16:24; KJV). Why should we take these and convert them into cold, legalistic documents, thus building up walls of hostility between us? Did the saints in Philippi, who were addressed by Paul as "my brethren dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown" (4:1), subject the letter they received to laws of interpretation and hermeneutics, or did they read it with tears of gladness coursing down their cheeks? Did those to whom John wrote as "my little children" regard his letter as a legal document to be debated as in a tribunal, or as a letter to be read in the family?

When Paul learned from Chloe and her family of the crisis faced by the congregation at Corinth, should he have written, "Whereas an emergency exists for the immediate taking effect of this act, the same shall be in full force and effect from and after its passage"? As it was he wrote, "I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you" (1 Corinthians 4:14; KJV). He declared that Timothy and he had no "dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy: for by faith ye stand" (2 Corinthians 1:24). Why can we not regard these wonderful letters as a help and encouragement to our joy, rather than as documents written to exercise dominion over our faith?

"When you seek to be justified by way of law, your relation with Christ is completely severed: you have fallen out of the domain of God's grace. For to us, our hope of attaining that righteousness which we eagerly await is the work of the Spirit through faith. If we are in union with Christ Jesus, circumcision makes no difference at all, nor does the want of it; the only thing that counts is faith active in love" (Galatians 5:4-6; NEB).

Summary and Conclusion

Contents

Perhaps it will help us all to put into condensed form what was presented in the previous chapters. We can thus re-examine the points of emphasis and determine if they have validity in the light of God's revelation. Although no one likes to regiment thinking, in this instance it may be of some assistance to number the pertinent points for the purpose of studying them in more orderly fashion.

1. In His association with mankind, God has revealed himself as a covenant-making personality. He said to Noah and his sons, "I will establish my covenant with you" (Genesis 9:11; KJV). He said to Abraham, "I will make my covenant between me and thee" (Genesis 17:2). This means that God exhibited a willingness to enter into an agreement with men. He was willing to bind himself to perform certain things, based upon the immutability inherent in a divine promise and upon the integrity involved in His character and name.

Because of these things, our relationship to God must be a covenantal relationship. The nature of that relationship will be regulated by the covenant that creates it. In every case the covenant people will differ from those who are not under the covenant. They will be a special people because God has entered into a special agreement, the terms of which set them apart from other people.

2. There are two covenants in history that are of significance because of their relationship to Christ. The first of these two covenants was made with the twelve tribes of Israel, and it constituted them into a nation. That nation was to keep alive the concept of monotheism until Christ could be manifested in the flesh as the Son of God. This first covenant consisted of Ten Commandments, which were written on two tablets of stone. It was delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai and became the constitution of a nation composed of "the people of God."

The covenant inaugurated a legalistic regime, and was supplemented by laws, statutes, judgments, and commandments, all of which were compiled in a book. The book was sprinkled with the blood of a sacrifice and designated "the book of the covenant" (Exodus 24:7). In spite of severe penalties for violating this written code the people refused to be guided by its provisions. Finally, God announced that He would make a new covenant (Jeremiah 31:31-33). Unlike the one made when Israel was freed from Egypt, the laws and requirements of the new relationship were not to be recorded externally, but were to be internally inscribed and written on the hearts of men (v. 33).

The covenant made at Mount Horeb, or Sinai, was designated the "first covenant" (Hebrews 8:7) and the "old covenant" (Hebrews 8:13). The "new covenant," which created a personal rather than a national relationship with God, was declared to be "a better covenant, which was established upon better promises" (8:6). The apostle Paul introduces an interesting allegory, in which the covenants are likened to Hagar and Sarah, both of whom bore children to Abraham. The allegory points up the truth that those under the "first covenant" were in legal bondage, but those under the "new covenant" are free (Galatians 4:21-31). Regarding the law as a yoke of slavery, he encourages those under the new covenant to "stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Galatians 5:1; KJV).

The purpose of the legalistic covenant was to keep God's people under surveillance and strict control in order to bring them to Christ. The coming of Christ was designed to bring man into a completely new relationship with God, a relationship of faith. The type of relationship that was instituted through Moses stands in stark contrast to that which came through Christ. "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17; KJV).

There is as much difference between the relationship that was previously enforced and that which we now enjoy with God, as there is between a legal code and undeserved kindness. All law is a restraining and restrictive influence. Law is intended to define boundaries, to restrict liberties, and to provide penalties. Under law man is really under guard. So the apostle writes, "But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed" (Galatians 3:23; KJV). In this rendering by the King James Version the words "kept" and "shut up" are significant. The first is a term meaning to be under guard; the second is used of those who are confined in a stockade or prison.

In the next verse, the law is defined as a "child-conductor" or "custodian" (in the Revised Standard Version). The ultimate purpose was to deliver God's people to Christ. In Christ a custodian is no longer needed. Here we are kept by the love of God and are sharers in a life that no law could ever give (3:21). The glorious covenantal relationship now sustained is not based upon a written code at all. We ourselves become the letter of Christ. The new covenant is not written with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God. It is not written on tablets of stone or other external material but upon the tablets of the heart (2 Corinthians 3:3). The new covenant is not one of a written code, but of the Spirit.

There are but two approaches to justification, or righteousness, that is made available to man. Justification is a state of guiltlessness in the presence of God. It is regarded as righteousness because it restores a right relationship with the Father, a relationship that had been broken up by sin and transgression. Justification is available upon either of two conditions: law or faith. There is no other ground for hope.

While justification is available on these two bases, it is impossible to attain by law because of man's weakness in the flesh. Justification by law demands perfect conformity with law. Whatever law man regards as the basis of justification must be meticulously obeyed. The least infraction or deviation ends all hope of justification and spells disaster. The very principle of attempted justification by law is that one lives only as long as he does exactly what the law demands. "The man which doeth these things shall live by them" (Romans 10:5; KJV). Law as a means of life becomes away of death.

3. After fifteen centuries of dealing with man in a legalistic covenantal arrangement, God sent His Son into the world. He was sent to condemn sin in the flesh and to institute a new and living way under which man would be justified by faith. This Jesus accomplished through His own sacrifice on Calvary. It is the atoning blood of Jesus that makes possible the forgiveness of our sins, and removes the guilt and stain of sin under which we would otherwise rest. The faith that justifies is not faith in a system, a ritual, or a code. Faith involves trust, and the faith that justifies and restores the right relationship with God is absolute trust in Jesus' atonement. Every person has sinned and come short of the glory of God (Romans 3:23). No one can be justified in God's sight by deeds of law. Justification upon the basis of human law-keeping is an impossibility. Law produces knowledge of sin, but cannot produce a sense of righteousness. Therefore the righteousness of God is not based upon legal conformity.

Accordingly, the righteousness of God has been made known as available to man on other terms. It is "the righteousness of God which is by faith" (Romans 3:22). Under it we are "justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (3:24). To be justified is to be guiltless. None of us can attain to this state. All are guilty before God. But under the new covenant of grace, which reaches its apex in the atonement by the blood of Christ, God declares us guiltless. His declaration is made, not upon the basis of our deeds, but upon the ground of the sacrifice made for us by His Son who bore our guilt upon the cross.

Righteousness is not a state that we strive to attain by the laborious and self-defeating method of acquiring knowledge and implementing it by human effort. It is by divine declaration as a manifestation of marvelous grace and mercy. When one ceases to trust in his own righteousness, trusting absolutely and without reservation in "that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith" (Philippians 3:9), his faith is counted to him for righteousness. He is justified by faith, declared guiltless by the Father, and treated thus.

4. Galatians 3:22 reveals the fact that the Scripture "concluded all under sin." "All" includes the whole world, those who had the law of God and those who were without law. Everyone was in the same lost state, so that all could equally qualify for the right relationship God had conditioned upon trust in the righteousness of faith in Christ Jesus. The law was simply a custodian to bring those under its care to Jesus who is the justifier of all. With the coming of faith in Christ as the basis of righteousness, law was terminated as a system of seeking justification. "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Romans 10:4; KJV).

This means that our acceptance of the good news of the grace of God is not upon the basis of obedience to law. It is not by meritorious works performed in a kind of barter system. We do not trade our effort for a reward. We do not deposit our good deeds in a heavenly vending machine and await the desired result to come tumbling down. Paul tells us, "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Galatians 3:26, 27; KJV). Faith is not a work demanded by law, for if it were we would still be under a custodian. Baptism is not an act of law. It is simply faith activated. It is demonstrated and manifested in the only way that vital faith in Christ can be shown: by loving response to His example and will.

Here we have a great contrast between human reactions under the two divergent covenants of law and grace. We are conditioned in our social culture to a world of "law and order." The latter (grace) is seemingly dependent upon the former (law). Therefore, many sincere disciples of Christ are afraid to even think of our not being under a written code. To them it means that everyone must make the choice between law or lawlessness. But there is no spirit of lawlessness in Christ. Here the contrast is between law and love. There can be no anarchy in Christ Jesus for the simple reason that all of His subjects have surrendered their will to His, and He is Lord of all!

The very Scriptures that some would like to regard as law specifically declare, "The law is not made for the righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane,..." (1 Timothy 1:9). In Christ Jesus we are made partakers of the divine nature. We are in the world but not of it. We no longer walk according to the flesh but according to the Spirit. We are not under condemnation. We have been set free from the law of sin and death.

Our obedience is not to a written code but to a loving Savior. His commandments do not constitute "laying down the law" for us, but a lifting up to love. Our compliance is not conformity to a code but the response of love to a person. He said, "If a man love me, he will keep my words" (John 14:23). It is just that simple. I repent because I love Him. I confess my sins because I love Him. I ask forgiveness because I love Him. I do not want to hurt Him, I want to be close to Him. I want to be His, and I want Him to be mine. Our relationship would not be enhanced by law, but destroyed by it.

This brings us to the most difficult part in sharing my concept of our relationship with God created by the new covenant. It is that of my own experience. Most of us are aware of the fact that it is easier to deal with such a theme academically than to lay bare the inmost feelings of one's own heart. For years I struggled to please God on the basis of conformity to a written code. I regarded the apostolic letters as a compilation of judgments, statutes, and judicial requirements. I felt that these demanded perfect obedience under threat of eternal condemnation.

Since I had been taught that we were under "the new law," I began with that presupposition, and everything that was written I interpreted within that frame of reference. Accordingly, grace became merely another vehicle through which law was conveyed. Faith was to be used as the grappling-hook by which one scaled the steep side of the mountain as he agonized upward toward God. Present always within one who takes this mental route is the sense of his own failure. He is not righteous by his own makeshift criterion, and he knows that he is not.

In order to live with oneself under such a system it is necessary to engage in casuistry, and this amounts to self-deception. The person selects some items with which he can relate and invests them with an aura of importance, which really belongs to the total relationship. By emphasizing these and maintaining a degree of loyalty in their defense, he flatters himself that he is faithful to God. What this does, of course, is to lead him into a frightful state of self-righteousness. He becomes a worshiper of his own mental and moral powers, and demonstrates his insecurity by aggressive assaults upon others.

I have been delivered from the fears, inhibitions, and hostilities, which seem to be the natural result of confinement. I am free to examine the marvelous revelation of God in a new and open way. I marvel at the fact that God, sinless and perfect, was willing to enter into a covenant with me, as sinful and imperfect as I am. I rejoice in it, even though I can neither fully comprehend or explain it. The divine agreement by which I became a son of God is written in my heart by the Holy Spirit. My own heart is an "ark of the covenant." It is here God dwells through the divine Comforter or Helper.

I read the New Covenant Scriptures now with the eyes of my understanding being enlightened. They are more precious to me and I have a deeper sense of hunger for their content. I regard the letters of the envoys for what they are: letters of love written to those caught up in the human predicament. They were written to assure those people that they have eternal life. They are letters of correction, admonition, and exhortation. They were never intended to develop legal or technical specialists, but lovers of God and men. They speak to me with new depth and power.

I look at life with a new sense of its meaning, since I realize that eternal life was embodied in Christ Jesus, and through Him we share in that wonderful transcendent dimension of existence. He has put all history into proper focus for me, including the agony as well as the ecstasy. Eternal life is to know God and His Son, to experience a creative relationship with them, which, even though it entails suffering here, will result in glory.

I face death as the "great adventure," the final transforming and transferring event, the gateway to eternal rest, the door to peace in its ultimate. Hope becomes a greater comfort when one realizes that it never disappoints because the love of God is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. Perfect love casts out fear, and that includes the fear of death.

When I came to accept the reality of the indwelling Spirit as God's immeasurable gift to us during the absence of His Son, the significance of the covenant of grace, as opposed to a legalistic contract such as was given by Moses, became immediately apparent. I was no longer lonely. I never felt forsaken. I could rejoice in the face of calamity and triumph over adversity. My prayers became more intimate, my concern for others grew deeper.

The fact is that God has accepted and received me as I am, and I do not have to struggle for recognition. This truth has stifled any sense of rivalry with others. We do not need to compete for the favor of the Father. There is room for all of us under the umbrella of divine affection. All who have entered the family through faith are brothers and sisters. I am free to be as merciful toward them as God has been toward me. Each must be allowed to stand or fall to his own Master. Each must be fully persuaded in his own mind.

It is a blessing beyond compare to realize that we are "dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Romans 6:11). We are dead and our lives are hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with Him in glory. (See Colossians 3:3, 4). No wonder it is written, "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure" (1 John 3:3). It is all summed up for me in one glowing statement, as it appears in the *Revised Standard Version: "For sin will have no dominion over you, since you are not under law but under grace" (Romans 6:14). Praise God!

A book with such an odd title as "The Twisted Scriptures" may need an explanation, for no faithful Christian, including the author of this book, believes that "Twisted" is one of the characteristics of the holy Scriptures. The author is referring to the way some people treat the Bible. They do not use it as much as they abuse it. The author likened the way some people wrest the Scriptures to a sign in front of a machine shop that read, "All manner of twisting and warping done here." The author is saying that this is what too often happens to the Bible in pulpits and classrooms across the land.

That holy Scripture would be twisted and warped like a rod of iron in a smelting shop is bad enough, but when it is done to defend and perpetuate division among believers the evil is compounded. That is what this book is about. It lays bare not only "the horrid evil" that schism among Christians is, to quote an angry Thomas Campbell when he wrote of being "sick and tired" of partyism, but it exposes the sectarian spirit that seeks to enlist the Bible itself in support of dividing the Body of Christ over the opinions and doctrines of men.

This means that this book is really about hermeneutics or Biblical interpretation. Beginning in the late 1980's there has been more concern among Churches of Christ/Christian Churches about the way the Bible has been interpreted. A call for "A New Hermeneutics" has made its way into some of the more seminal books, especially by our younger scholars, as well as in workshops, lectureships, and the papers. The material in this book, originally written in 1965, anticipated this concern by more than two decades in that it recognizes that many of our problems, including a fractured Restoration Movement, are related to the way we have interpreted (or misinterpreted) the Bible, particularly the New Testament.

This book, however, is not a call for a new hermeneutics as much as it is a plea for a reasonable and responsible handling of Scripture that goes back to the best minds of our heritage. It is evident that the author would not insist upon a new hermeneutics, but would settle for the "Rules of Interpretation" laid down by Alexander Campbell, which do not allow the Bible to be warped and twisted for the sake of either party politics or party doctrines.

Carl Ketcherside would not mind being called a "Campbellite" insofar as Biblical interpretation is concerned. One only needs to read Campbell's seven rules to see that our people by and large have either been ignorant of such rules or have neglected them. They are the only hermeneutics we need, old or new. If we but heeded the wisdom of Campbell's Rule 1 it would go far in "untwisting" some of our handiwork. It reads: "On opening any book in the sacred Scriptures, consider first the historical circumstances of the book. These are the order, the title, the author, the date, the place and the occasion of it."

Campbell goes on in Rule 3 to lay down a hermeneutical principle that is as needed in our day as much as it was revolutionary in his: "The same laws of interpretation which are applied to the language of other books are to be applied to the language of the Bible." That is, the way we interpret a letter from a friend is the way we should interpret one of Paul's letters. Or the way we study European history is not all that different from the way we study Biblical history. Campbell was uneasy with subjective, mystical, allegorical, and existential approaches to the Bible. In this study Ketcherside follows in the tradition of Alexander Campbell.

Campbell's Rule 7, which he called "indispensable," is especially evident in Ketcherside's approach to the Bible. Campbell was far in advance of his day when he formulated this incisive hermeneutical rule: "We must come within the understanding distance." He is saying that we must have the heart as well as the mind to understand. We must want to understand what the Bible says. If we are "within understanding distance" we will not manipulate Scripture to make it mean what we want it to mean. And we may have to distinguish between what it meant (then) and what it means (now). The heart and conscience must be arbiters as well as logic, rules, and principles.

This approach to Scripture is evident now and again in Ketcherside's writings, causing him to formulate what might be seen as new rules. These lines from his publication Mission Messenger (1965, p. 177) are an example:

> These sacred scriptures, like any other communication between rational beings, are subject to interpretation and application by those who read them, and one criterion of accuracy in both areas is whether our view formulated by study is conducive to the reduction or increase of tensions among the disciples of Christ.

Notice how closely he follows Campbell's hermeneutics. The Bible is to be interpreted "like any other communication between rational beings." And how can one test his accuracy in interpretation? If said interpretation aggravates dissension between brethren and causes further division and does nothing to ease tensions, then it is suspect. That is because we are standing beyond understanding distance. We are not interpreting the Bible in a way that is consistent with the purposes of the Bible, which is to promote peace and brotherhood. If it satisfies the mind, it neglects the heart. Any interpretation that is in conflict with the Spirit of Christ must be rejected, however "logical" it may be otherwise.

This book is liberating in that it helps one to be a Christ-person rather than a party-person. It is rooted in the grace of God and the Spirit of Christ. It names sectarianism for what it is, a sin against God, and how shameful it is to use God's word to foster factionalism. It encourages one to turn away from the wooden and lifeless use of a few select proof-texts, which are themselves warped and twisted so as to fit some party line, to that view of the Scriptures that our Lord spoke of when he said, "They testify of me" (Jn. 5:39). This book shows us that there is a big difference between seeing our party in the Bible and seeing Jesus in the Bible.

Carl Ketcherside could finally write such a book as this only because he too was liberated from the party spirit. He was once a "wing commander," to use his term, of a little sect within the Restoration Movement. He was "on call" to debate those issues that were unique to his party. He had a narrow, sectarian view of unity and fellowship. The change came when he was alone one wintry night in a little Church of Christ building in Belfast, Ireland. Long weary of sectarian strife, he turned to the promise in Rev. 3:20, and for the first time in his life actually invited Jesus into his heart.

From that night on he embarked upon what he called his "Pilgrimage of Joy" which led him to become, as he put it, "a peacemaker instead of a piecemaker." He committed the second half of his life to restoring peace, unity, and love between people long separated by the scourge of schism. Multiplied thousands whose lives he touched through his long years as an editor and lecturer are thankful for what happened that night in Belfast 40 years ago. As he himself put it, when Christ enters sectarianism has to leave.

Out of that experience he often summarized his plea with two affirmations. The first was that we have no right to make anything a condition of fellowship that God does not make a condition for being saved. The second was that wherever God has a child we have a brother or sister.

The following lines from the first chapter of this book are not only vintage Ketcherside, but they also reveal the spirit of the man. They also underscore what responsible hermeneutics is all about, new or old:

> It is ridiculous to quote the scriptures to justify factionalism when they were given to forbid it. No honest opinion, no sincerely held doctrinal view, can ever be made the ground for rejection of one of God's children. It would be absurd for God to warn that the party spirit would debar from inheritance of the kingdom, and then make provision for the party spirit and enjoin it upon us.

Preface

A number of years ago, during an extended period of labor in Belfast, North Ireland, I regularly visited some of the many bookstalls in the city which displayed used volumes. While almost casually browsing one day, I spied a book of which I had frequently heard but had never seen. It was titled Union, or, The Divided Church Made One. The author was John Harris, and the original purchaser had inscribed his name and the date of purchase on the flyleaf. The date was March 5, 1867. I purchased the book for a shilling, which was then valued at twelve cents in our coinage.

It was a rare find and I read the book through that night, underlining statements which impressed me with their truth and factuality. I have since read the volume twice more and it is now quite marked up. One quotation I wish to share with you is found on page 21, where the author is writing about the cross of Jesus.

> His cross, like the ark in the wilderness, is the center around which his people are to encamp; so that they cannot separate into factions, or withdraw from each other, without retiring at the same time from the presence of the cross.

As you read my own book you will be constantly aware that this is the point I am trying to make. Our relationship with the Father of mercies is created and maintained through faith in Jesus as the Son of God. It was the cross which established beyond doubt how far God was willing to go to end alienation and pride and reconcile us unto Himself. And it is the cross which makes possible that marvelous sharing of eternal life which is called "the fellowship" in our English versions of the divine revelation.

Fellowship is not conditioned upon orthodoxy of opinion, uniformity in knowledge, or conformity in thought. The only unity possible to thinking men and women is unity in diversity. Conformity is possible only for robots or mechanical men, although slaves in their hopeless servility may approach unto it. Free men can be one only in Christ, and the deeper they go in their relationship to Him, the closer will be their relationship to one another.

To justify division in the family of God, which is never once sanctioned by the holy scriptures, those scriptures must be wrested, twisted and distorted. It has been my intention to honestly and humbly investigate some of the passages which have been cruelly misapplied and return them to their proper context where they will encourage us to produce "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" rather than the bitter and depressing harvest of heartache and sorrow which has been our lot for so long.

Much of what is said will be universally applicable to believers in Christ, regardless of the names on the signboards behind which they meet. But the perceptive reader will soon recognize that I have addressed my remarks primarily to conditions existing in a certain segment of a historical restoration attempt, listed in the United States Census Bureau of Religious Statistics under the denomination Church of Christ. The movement of which this is one of the branches was launched as "a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects." That it is now the most divided movement on the contemporary scene is not so much due to an abandonment of the scriptures as to the twisting of them to perpetuate "a System" which is confused with and substituted for the reconciling community purchased by the blood of Jesus.

"The right to be wrong in matters of religious belief must be accorded, otherwise we produce hypocrites instead of persons with an enlightened belief that is fully their own. If the truth be might and God all-powerful, His children need not fear that disaster will follow freedom of thought." — Francois De Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambrai.

One of the most interesting letters in that treasure chest which is popularly referred to as the New Testament, is the one designated as 2 Peter. Written by the impetuous fisherman who was called from his occupation by Jesus, the letter is robust and challenging, filled with stirring thoughts and emphatic language. It is from this depository of revelation that I have chosen the statement which will form the theme of this little volume and provide its title.

Near the close of his communication the apostle urges his readers to exert every effort to be found at peace with God and to remain unblemished and above reproach in his sight. He reminds them that God's patience exercised in our behalf will result in our salvation, and mentions that Paul also endorsed this thought when he wrote to the same people.

> Bear in mind that our Lord's patience with us is our salvation, as our beloved brother Paul wrote to you, out of the wisdom he had received, speaking of this matter as he does in all of his letters, some of which contain certain difficult and obscure statements, which those who are untaught and unstable, distort as they do the other scriptures, to their own destruction (2 Peter 3 :15,16).

There is no message, divine or human, which is proof against distortion by men who are ignorant or unscrupulous. But while such wresting of a communication given by men may not evoke consequences of a serious nature, destruction may result from misinterpreting or misapplying God's revelation. In this volume I am going to concern myself with the use of scripture to divide and fragment the family of God, and to excuse and justify the very schism which the Word deplores and condemns. But first let us look at the rendering of our passage in two other versions.

As indeed our beloved brother Paul has written to you, out of the wisdom vouchsafed to him, speaking of this as he has done in all his letters— letters containing some knotty points, which ignorant and unsteady souls twist (as they do the rest of the scriptures) to their own destruction. (Moffatt)

Our beloved brother, Paul, from the wisdom that God gave him, also wrote to you about this. In his letter to you, as in all his letters, he speaks of these things. There are some things in them that are hard to understand, that is true, and there are people lacking knowledge and steadfastness who twist his words to their own destruction, just as they do the rest of the Scriptures. (The Simplified New Testament— Norlie).

The scriptures can be twisted, distorted and slanted. When this happens they may be used to undo the very purpose of God who gave them. When the written word is so wrested as to defeat the purpose, plan and prayer of the Living Word, something is indeed seriously wrong.

I do not think that we must infer from the statement of Peter that every person who wrests a scripture from its context is wilfully ignorant or purposely unsteady. No doubt men can do this while innocent of any evil motive and with a firm persuasion that their application is the will of God. If they are ignorant, it is involuntary, and not deliberate. Such men, when shown a more excellent way, will at once amend their thinking. It is because of my firm conviction that the good and honest heart will receive the seed of the Word, and not reject it, that I address myself to those of my brethren who are shivering the kingdom of heaven into fragments under the delusion that by so doing they best serve the interests of our King.

Ignoring the Context

Perhaps it would be well for us to contemplate some of the ways in which the scriptures may be twisted. Immediately, most of us will think of the practice of lifting a passage out of its context or setting, and interpreting it in isolation and detachment. This is always a malpractice, but it is even more grievous when the purpose is to justify or defend a presupposition or arbitrary position.

Our word "text" is from the Latin textus, to construct or weave. It is found in such words as textile and texture. It is related to technical, which was originally applied to the art or skill of constructing or weaving. Thus context refers to the discourse or writing produced by the weaving together of words in language, and specifically to "the part or parts of a written or spoken passage preceding or following a particular word or group of words, and so intimately associated with them as to throw light upon their meaning."

The sacred scriptures occur in three contexts— time, place and revelation. If properly understood, they must be studied in the light of all of these. The word of God was not delivered neatly packaged and tied with a ribbon. It was the divine response to human situation. It did not create needs and then proceed to meet them, but circumstances existed and the will of heaven was revealed to relate to them. We are obligated to determine as nearly as we can the situation which gave rise to the revelation, and study it in the light of the circumstances.

As we prosecute our search for meaning it will become evident that strife and division have actually been promoted by ignoring the immediate purpose for which a thing was written. In anticipation, let me refer to 2 John 9, 10, where the aged apostle warned.

> If any man come and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.

Factional proponents have made the term "this doctrine" refer to every traditional teaching around which a party has rallied. We shall learn that John was writing to combat Gnosticism, one of the most dangerous philosophies to threaten the Way in all of its history. It was an attack upon the very foundation of the faith. To apply a statement designed to preserve and protect the faith against an invidious doctrine which would cut the very heart out of it, to every minor divergent view and opinion, is as absurd as directing cobalt rays intended to check the spread of grave malignancy against every pimple or welt induced by a bee sting.

When we study Amos 3:3, where the King James Version has the prophet asking, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" we will see how failure to consider the immediate and remote context has trapped men into taking a position which would make all fellowship impossible and cooperation a futile gesture. It will also become apparent that any contention which must depend for its validity upon the rendering of a single and specific translation, and which is not sustained by other versions, must always be under suspicion.

Altering the Vocabulary

Another way by which the scriptures can be twisted is by assigning an acquired meaning to a word and then proceeding as if this was the meaning accredited to it when used by the Spirit. In order to communicate the divine will to mankind in understandable fashion, God employed the method used by men in communicating with one another. And the highest form of such communication is through language.

This may appear in oral or written form. In spoken form language makes use of certain sounds, and to these, singularly or in combination, assigned and understandable values are attached, so that concepts or images may be transferred from one mind to another. In written form, certain characters are used for the various sounds and the eye serves to flash the message to the brain as the ear does in audible discourse.

Words are not ideas. At best they are symbols of ideas. Simple people require but few words and all of these originally have a confined or limited usage. But as those who use them develop new skills and multiply their relationships to the world around them their words take on new connotations. Words are like those who use them, they acquire new breadth and significance. The currency of thought is like the coin of the realm. It becomes polished through usage in the marketplace. Sometimes it is a difficult thing to determine the value of a coin which has passed through many hands. And the same thing holds true with words.

The revelation of God through the Spirit was given some two thousand years ago, in a land foreign to this and in a tongue alien to the one with which I am conversant. It was first announced by a voice and then written down. But since the time when the envoys of Christ lived and spoke, their words have been subjected to all of the changing fortunes of history. Too, they have been submitted to the shock of translation, in which the ideas they sought to convey have been fitted into new outer garments, some of which were borrowed and others tailored for the occasion.

The result is that many of the words we read in our translations of the scriptures no longer convey to the popular mind the ideas with which they were originally invested. It is not an exaggeration to say that almost every word in the English versions of the Bible has been hammered and pummeled by theological and ecclesiastical usage until it no longer communicates the will of God as at the beginning.

It is not our purpose here to deal at length with this phase of distortion, but a few examples may serve to illustrate the point I wish to make. Take, for instance, the word "minister." As used in the sacred scriptures it meant "servant" and any service rendered to the community of saints or its members was recognized as ministry. In our day the term has taken on a specialized and professional meaning, and a majority of the saints would disclaim that they were ministers. They use the word rather as a title to be bestowed upon a certain class of functionaries. This caused Alexander Campbell to write:

> But in this appropriation of the title, the ministers of Christ, there is a variety of error, and of arrogance. The term *diakonos,in Greek; *minister, in Latin; and *servant, in English, are expressive of the same character or standing, are titles of the same import. The term *minister, a general or unappropriated title, designates any servant, and belongs to every obedient disciple of Jesus Christ. In the general sense of the term, it belongs to sister Phoebe, as well as to any apostle or bishop. And indeed, the widow who cast in her two mites, was a much greater minister or servant of God, than any of the Westminster clergy, who were servants of God and the long parliament. To call the clergy the ministers of Christ, is, therefore, a pious robbery of the obedient disciples of Christ, who are ministers of God as well as they, to speak in the most humble terms. (The Christian Baptist, 2, page 193).

Or, consider the word "sanctuary," which comes from sanctus, holy, and is used to designate a holy place. Professed followers of Jesus often use it to label the place for the general gathering of the saints to engage in corporate expressions of praise, as opposed to Sunday School rooms, educational wings, or social halls. This demonstrates a kind of ignorance wholly unbecoming to those who aspire to be "a guide of the blind, and a light of them which are in darkness."

Jesus came to do away with such distinctions, and with a concept of worship dependent upon being within a "sacred confine," marked out by ceremony and dedicatory exercises. All such belonged to the adolescent age of Judaism, and had no place at all in the life of mature sons of God. In Christ there are no holy places, no holy days, and no holy things. There are only holy people. The Most High does not dwell in temples made by the hands of men. He is not worshiped with men's hands as though he needed anything. The only sanctuary God has upon earth today is the consecrated heart of the follower of Jesus. This is the temple of God. It is the place where he dwells through the Spirit.

Now all of this is taken lightly by many in our day. Even in the seminaries where men seek to prepare themselves to instruct less enlightened followers in the will of God, it is tossed aside as of no particular consequence. It becomes a matter for levity and is made the butt of jokes. And the result is, that those who claim to teach the revealed will of God actually perpetuate the errors of the past and ignorantly pass them on to another generation to become a part of an unwarranted tradition, further obscuring the truth of heaven.

Although I feel very deeply about this matter, and am thoroughly convinced that we will never accomplish the will of God on earth until we recapture and restore the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit, I am going to allow another to say what I feel needs to be said. I am reluctant to present this lengthy quotation, for experience has taught me that we have produced many superficial readers and shallow thinkers in our day. There is a tendency to skip over quotations as a dragonfly skims over a body of water, scarcely getting the gossamer wings wet. In this instance, however, I implore my readers to give consideration to every sentence of the following rather lengthy statement. I have chosen to share with you these words of Alexander Campbell because they express my sentiments far more forcibly than I could enunciate them in my own words.

> There must be, and there shall be an abandonment of the new and corrupt nomenclature, and a restoration of the inspired one. In other words there must be an abandonment of the Babylonish or corrupt phraseology of the dark ages and of modern discoveries, in the fixed style of the Christian vocabulary. This is a matter of greater importance than may, at first sight, appear to all. Words and names long consecrated, and sanctified by long prescription, have a very imposing influence upon the human understanding. We think as well as speak by means of words. It is just as impossible for an adult to think as to speak without words. Let him that doubts make the experiment.
> Now as all correct ideas of God and things invisible are supernatural ideas, no other terms can so suitably express them as the terms adopted by the Holy Spirit, in adapting those supernatural truths to our apprehension. He that taught man to speak, would doubtless adopt the most suitable terms in his language to reveal himself to his understanding. To disparage those terms, by adopting others in preference, is presumptuous and insolent on the part of man. Besides when men adopt terms to express supernatural truths, it is not the truths themselves, but their ideas of them they communicate. They select such terms as suit their apprehensions of revealed truth, and hence the terms they use are expressive only of their conceptions of divine things and must just be as imperfect as their conceptions are. It is impossible for any man, unless by accident, to express accurately that which he apprehends imperfectly.

From this source spring most of our doctrinal controversies. Men's opinions, expressed in their own terms, are often called Bible truths. In order then to a full restoration of the ancient order of things there must "a pure speech" restored. And I think the Lord once said, in order to a restoration, that he would restore to the people "a pure speech." We know that the ancient order of things amongst the Jews, could not be restored, after their captivity in Babylon, until the law of the Lord, containing the primitive institutions of the Jews' religion, was read and understood by the people, and the dialect of Babylon abandoned as far as it corrupted the primitive simplicity of that religion. Hence the scribes read them the law from morning to evening, gave them the sense and made them understand the reading. This became necessary because of the corrupt dialect they had learned in Babylon, on account of which their religion was unintelligible to them until the language of Canaan was purged from the phraseology of Ashdod. It will, we apprehend, be found precisely similar in the antitype, or in the return of the people of God from the captivity of Babylon the great, the mother of abominations" (The Christian Baptist, Volume 2, pages 222, 223).

Disrespect for Authority

The problem with which we are dealing arises from lack of respect for the authority of the sacred scriptures. Nothing is clearer than the fact that we are enjoined by the written word to live in harmony with the brethren. From a positive standpoint we are commanded to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. This command is not to be made the basis of cavilling or casuistry. It demands obedience and compliance.

Its requirement is reinforced by other passages which encourage togetherness among the saints and forbid them to divide or to engage in strife. "We who are strong ought to bear with the feelings of the weak and not to please ourselves" (Romans 15:1). We are told to "welcome one another, therefore, as Christ has welcomed you, for the glory of God," and this is specifically said to be for the purpose of encouraging harmony with one another, accord with Christ Jesus, and glorification of God with one voice.

We are not to "set at nought" a brother, that is, pass judgment upon him, or declare him unworthy because of his opinions, scruples or rationalizations. Quarreling and jealousy are in a list of things which are said to be unbecoming (Romans 13:13), and anger, selfishness, dissension, and the party spirit, are works of the flesh (Galatians 5:20). Those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God.

Not one time is division in the family of God ever recommended as a means of resolving differences or doctrinal disagreements. Every time division of God's children is mentioned it is condemned. Division is the work of the unspiritual and not of those who are led by the Holy Spirit. Speaking of scoffers, Jude writes, "It is these who set up divisions, worldly people devoid of the Spirit. But you, beloved, build yourselves up on your most holy faith; pray in the Holy Spirit; keep yourselves in the love of God; wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

It is ridiculous to quote the scriptures to justify factionalism when they were given to forbid it. No honest opinion, no sincerely held doctrinal view, can ever be made the ground for rejection of one of God's children. It would be absurd for God to warn that the party spirit would debar from inheritance of the kingdom, and then make provision for the party spirit and enjoin it upon us. Strife and division are the characteristics of those who are carnal and immature (1 Corinthians 3:1-4).

Unity in Christ is not conformity but community. We are one because we share a common faith, and not because we hold the same opinions. The only passage which declares there is one faith informs us that in our calling we must live "with patience, forbearing one another in love" (Ephesians 4:2). Patience and forbearance are not qualities of robots, but of thinking men and women. God made us to differ mentally as we differ physically. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike.

We are not in the fellowship because we see everything alike, or because we like everything we see. We are together because God has called us all, and received us all when we responded to his call. God did not call angels, but men! We are human before we are called and we are human after we are called. We are not changed into the perfect image at once, but "we all, with unveiled face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another, for this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit" (2 Corinthians 3:18).

Being human, there is only one type of unity possible for us, and that is unity in diversity. If we do not accept this form of unity there is no other for us. Fellowship results from a mutual sonship; brotherhood from a common Fatherhood. We are not one because we have all attained to the same degree of spiritual growth, but because we are all in the same family. We are not one in opinion, but one in Christ Jesus. To interpret the word of God to fragment those who are in the Son of God, and thus to justify their carnality and immaturity, is to do despite to the Spirit of grace.

The living Word was made flesh to bring us together in the Lord. His was the task of reconciliation and recovery. The written word is the account of how He accomplished this magnificent and divine purpose, and is provided so that we may know how to enter into it and become a part of it. It is cruel to turn the sword of the Spirit against those who have been born of the Spirit. It is insane to take the weapon given us to battle the forces of darkness and use it to spill the blood of the soldiers of light.

It will be our task in the chapters which lie ahead to show how a misunderstanding and misapplication of the written word has been the means of sowing discord among brethren. We shall seek to recover the spirit of God's revelation in the revelation of God's Spirit. The prayer of Jesus for the unity of the believers will be our watchword as we attempt to untwist the scriptures and place them in proper order and context. Ours will be an honest attempt to let the word of God speak for the God of the word!

Except They Be Agreed

Contents

Amos was the farmer who turned prophet at the insistence of God. He did not know when he did so that he would become the chief oracle of the traditional party of the "unity by conformity" advocates in the Christian Dispensation, almost three millennia after his death. It really was not his fault. The whole thing came about because of the semantic quirk of a group of translators appointed by a king who wanted a Bible he could authorize to be read in the pulpits of the Episcopal Church.

When the eminent linguists came upon a list of questions proposed by the prophet to account for his intrusion upon a rather hostile area, they unfortunately made him say, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?" The roving eyes of the text-seekers and sermonizers glimpsed this inadvertent question and it was thereupon made the basis for numerous dissertations intended to prove that no two people can walk together unless they are agreed.

Obviously, no two of the proponents of this peculiar and unworkable philosophy agree upon everything, so with the true, casuistic rationalization which is part and parcel of the party spirit, agreement was limited only to the opinions upon which the party was arbitrarily founded and which gave it grounds for perpetuity. We propose to examine this statement of Amos in full context and show how it has become one of the twisted scriptures.

Solomon was the last monarch of the twelve tribe kingdom in its undivided state. In the days of his son and successor, a revolt occurred because of the oppressive taxation required to maintain the opulent splendor of the regal family. Ten of the tribes seceded and set up the Kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam. He immediately introduced calf-worship at Dan and Bethel and plunged his domain into idolatry from which it never recovered. In 220 years nine different dynasties succeeded each other to the throne as a result of suicide, conspiracy and assassination.

If the reign of Jeroboam II in the fifth dynasty seemed an exception because of outward prosperity, it was deceptive. The undercurrent of degeneracy continued unchecked beneath the surface. Because of it God called a prophet to denounce the open and flagrant sins of the people. The man whom he selected was not a recognized prophet. He had not attended one of the schools of the prophets which had flourished since the days of Samuel to train young men in the prophetic role. He was a simple farmer living in the wilderness serenity surrounding the little village of Tekoah, six miles south of Bethlehem and twelve miles south of Jerusalem. His livelihood was derived from the rustic pursuits of herding cattle and caring for his orchard of sycamine figs.

Since he lived in Judah, the commission to go to the king's court in Bethel, was a call to invade a hostile region. The message he was to deliver was calculated to make him even more unpopular. He was to denounce the corruption which was so prevalent, but he was also to foretell the captivity and exile of the people at the hands of a rapidly growing alien power. Amos went as God had instructed him and he lifted up his voice against the immorality, injustice and intemperance which characterized the lives of the people, with such effectiveness that something had to be attempted to thwart his effort.

The local priest was Amaziah. He was a fawning sycophant on the payroll of the King. He began his attack by telling Jeroboam that Amos was a conspirator. He implied that he was an infiltrator who was collaborating with the Davidic regime in Judah, commissioned to come up north to create unrest and dissension. He then confronted Amos and ordered him off the royal property and out of the country, closing with the words, "Don't you ever again prophesy at Bethel, for it is the king's sanctuary, and it is a temple of the kingdom." He did not mention that the temple was dedicated to calf-worship!

The country preacher was not easily frightened. He pointed out that he was not a professional making his living out of the trade of prophesying and was not even a seminary graduate. He was actually following the flock at the very time the Lord said, "Go, prophesy to my people Israel." He then informed Amaziah that his sons and daughters would be slain, his wife would have to become a prostitute in the city to support herself, his real estate holdings would be parceled out to strangers, and he would become a captive and die in a foreign land.

Because of the fearlessness of Amos we think the first part of his prophecy deserves some attention, especially since the "scriptural scrap-doctors" as Alexander Campbell always referred to them, have abused one of his statements to make the prophet mean something that he never implied. The passage to which we allude is found in Amos 3:3 but we will start at the beginning of his book. Chapter 1 begins with a specification of the time when the prophecy was uttered. It was "two years before the earthquake," a tremor of such magnitude that the people in Jerusalem fled from it as they would the day of the Lord (Zechariah 14:5).

To begin with, it is important to note that the Lord is referred to as a lion whose den, or place of abode, is Jerusalem in Zion. This metaphor is not farfetched when you recall that to the ancients the lion was the very symbol of strength and power. And it is affirmed that the voice of God is so powerful, and his predictions are so certain of fulfillment, that the very pastures dry up and the dew-covered summit of Mount Hermon withers. The roar of God is expressed through his prophets.

It is apparent that when God roars as a lion it betokens his judgment upon the nations. The time has come that he will rend them as prey. So there follows in swift and regular succession pronouncements against Damascus, in Syria; Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon and Ekron, in Philistia; Tyre, in Phoenicia; Edom, Ammon and Moab. After this list is completed, the prophet comes to the two kingdoms which have sprung from the seed of Abraham, Judah and Israel.

The utterances against these last two bring the prophet to the place where he addresses all of the tribes as a whole. They are more responsible than any other nation for two reasons. First, God personally formed them as a nation by delivering them from the womb of Egypt; secondly, he claimed them for his own out of all the nations of the whole earth. Now he speaks against them because the day has come when their iniquities and judgments have met. Throughout all denunciatory prophecy runs the thread of certainty that God will bring to judgment every evil work. The divine appointment is that inevitably the sin and its punishment must meet.

Since this is the very nature of divine justice the prophet appeals to natural reactions to illustrate it. He exemplifies it by two people walking together because they had made a previous appointment to meet, a lion roaring because he has captured prey, young lions snarling in a den as they tear their food, a trap or snare springing shut because a victim has hit the trigger, or people in a city running for shelter when the official trumpet signals an alarm. His argument is simply one of cause and effect. He reasons that for every effect there is a cause and you may determine the cause by observation of the effect.

He concludes by pointing out that God does not visit his wrath upon a city without revealing his secret to the prophets. When the prophets speak it is the voice of God and the populace should react accordingly. The prophet cannot resist speaking the word of God; the hearers should not resist obeying it. "The lion has roared; who will not fear" The Lord God has spoken; who can but prophesy? With this introduction we are prepared to look at the prophetic message itself. Here it is as found in the King James Version.

> Can two walk together, except they be agreed?
>
> Will a lion roar in the forest, when he hath no prey? will a young lion cry out of his den, if he have taken nothing?
>
> Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is set for him? shall one take up a snare from the earth, and have taken nothing at all?
>
> Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid? shall there be evil in a city, and the Lord hath not done it?
>
> Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets.
>
> The lion hath roared, who will not fear? the Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?

The art of sermon-making, a skill wholly unknown to the new covenant scriptures, has led its practitioners far afield in their ardent quest for texts. When one is found which seems to suit the propaganda purpose of the hour, they operate and remove it from the contextual body, and by copious injections of their own intellectual distillate seek to make it develop into a new body of its own. No creation of homiletic fantasy better illustrates this than the use of Amos 3:3 by modern advocates of unity based upon conformity. The proponents of the cult of the rubber stamp have seized upon this passage as the one stone which will grind their grist, and wherever they speak the sound of the millstone is heard in the land.

As any person of even the slightest scholarly bent can ascertain for himself, this is an absurd abuse of the prophetic intent. Not only was Amos not providing a text for a sermon on unity but the passage is not even remotely connected with the use made of it by solemn clerics who weave from this one little filmy thread a gossamer web to cover all of the saints in all of their association with each other.

Can two walk together unless they be agreed? Do two people have to agree upon everything in the world before they can walk together? If so, no two people on earth will walk together, or ever have done so. Shall we interpret God's word to forbid and make absolutely impossible the very unity which it repeatedly commands? But I am told that this does not mean they must agree upon everything. This surrenders the whole argument. Either two people must agree upon everything in order to walk together or else two people can walk together who are not agreed, and you will need to find a new text for the ridiculous doctrine based upon conformity.

The utter absurdity into which people are driven by forced exegesis to sustain a presupposition and partisan position was observed not long ago in the home of a certain preacher. He contended that two could not walk together unless they were agreed. His wife challenged his statement. She mentioned that she had never agreed with her parents on their attitude toward her brother but they still all continued to walk together as one family. She and her husband then got into an argument and could not even agree upon what it meant to be agreed, but the last I heard they were still walking together— and arguing as they walked.

The Meaning of the Passage

But what did Amos mean? We will be helped in our understanding by consulting other versions. First, I shall refer to the translation by Robert Young, who was the author of various works in Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, Syriac, Greek and Latin, and who is best known to most of us as author of an Analytical Concordance. Dr. Young was quite critical of the King James translators for laxity in translating and compiled a lengthy list which he designated "Lax Renderings," and which I have found most interesting. He translates Amos 3:3, "Do two walk together, if they have not met?"

Many of our readers will possess, or have access to a Revised Standard Version, and can easily ascertain that it renders the passage, "Do two walk together unless they have made an appointment?" It will readily be seen that if these are correct, the use of the passage as descriptive of the nature of unity is forever barred to honest men who walk in integrity and do not "handle the word of God deceitfully."

The original word for "agreed" is yaad. This is a primitive Hebrew root which is defined by Strong's Exhaustive Concordance thus, "To fix upon (by agreement or appointment) by implication to meet (at a stated time), to summon (to trial), to direct (in a certain quarter or position), to engage (for marriage).

The word translated "agreed" has not one thing to do with the attitude, purpose or nature of two people while walking together. The agreement is to meet and walk together, and is not related to walking together in agreement. The agreement or appointment precedes the walking together as the cause precedes the effect. The word yaad is not marriage, but engagement to marry. It is not occupying a position, but directing one to it. It is not a trial, but the summons issued to appear for trial. It is not the state of walking together, but a prior appointment to meet and walk. Men might make an agreement to meet and walk together to debate their differences.

The word occurs in the same form and tense 19 times in the Hebrew scriptures. It is translated "meet" nine times of which six (Exodus 25:22; 29:42,43; 30:6,36; Numbers 17:4) refer to God's appointment to meet his people in the tabernacle. In Joshua 11:5 it relates to meeting together by appointment of a number of kings at the waters of Merom to fight against Israel. In Nehemiah 6:2,10, it refers to the attempt of Sanballat, Geshem and others, to meet with Nehemiah, to work mischief. The meeting never occurred.

Even more revealing is the usage of the word in Job 2:11, concerning Job's three friends who came every one from his own place, "for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him." The boldface words are the translation of *yaad. Any student of the book of Job knows that these three men did not agree. They argued with each other, accused Job, and attempted to speak for God. When they had finished, a youthful companion who was standing by listening, became so angry at their replies he pitched into the debate and told them all off. The three friends of Job did not meet to agree, they simply agreed to meet.

The fact is that the only unity possible on this earth for thinking people is unity in diversity. Unity by conformity is a unity of puppets or automatons. It is the unity of those who surrender their right to think and reason. And it is not really unity at all, but a mere sublimation of one's faculties and rational powers and a bowing to tyranny or dictatorship.

In a very perceptive statement, Ralph Waldo Emerson labeled groups requiring conformity, as "communities of opinion":

> Most men have bound their eyes with one or another handkerchief, and attached themselves to some one of these communities of opinion. This conformity makes them not false in a few particulars, authors of a few lies, but false in all particulars. A man must consider what a rich realm he abdicates when he becomes a conformist.

When Thomas Jefferson was defending the "Virginia Act for Religious Freedom," he said:

> Subject opinion to coercion: whom will you make your inquisitors? Fallible men; men governed by bad passions, by private as well as public reasons. And why subject it to coercion? To produce uniformity. But is uniformity of opinion desirable? No more than of face and stature.

But it was Alexander Campbell in his chapter on "The Foundation of Christian Union" appearing in his volume called Christianity Restored who pointed out that conformity in opinion has been the real basis of all sectarianism. His statement deserves earnest study.

> But men cannot give up their opinions, and, therefore, they can never unite, says one. We do not ask them to give up their opinions— we ask them only not to impose them upon others. Let them hold their opinions; but let them hold them as private property. The faith is public property; opinions are, and always have been, private property. Men have foolishly attempted to make the deductions of some great minds the common measure of all Christians. Hence the deductions of a Luther, and a Calvin, and a Wesley, have been the rule and measure of all who coalesce under the names of these leaders. It is cruel to excommunicate a man because of the imbecility of his intellect. We never did, at any time, exclude a man from the kingdom of God for a mere imbecility of intellect; or, in other words, because he could not assent to our opinions. All sects are doing, or have done this.

Unity in the domestic realm is unity in diversity. A man and his wife become one flesh, not because they are alike, but because they are not. It is their unlikeness, their diversity, which makes physical unity possible. They are not uniform in their mental and intellectual attainments. Differences arise and arguments ensue in the very best of families. We do not assume that because a husband and wife differ as to which is the best brand of coffee that they no longer have a united home. We do not think the family ties are severed because a teenager prefers a stick-shift sports car while his mother insists on buying a large job with automatic transmission.

There never was a family in which every member thought alike and there never will be. Families stay together because their love for one another as persons transcends every other consideration. Their need for each other is greater than their need to be right on every matter of opinion. When a man and woman promise to love, honor and cherish each other as long as the two of them live, they enter into a covenant to receive one another as persons in love. They certainly do not pledge that they will always see everything alike.

Unity in the governmental realm is unity in diversity. I am thrilled indeed to be a citizen of the United States of America, but I am not so foolish as to think that all fifty states are alike, or that every citizen is agreed with every other citizen. I know there is a great difference between the elected representatives of Alaska and those of Alabama. Missouri is not like Montana, and Vermont differs from Virginia. It is our very diversity which makes it possible for us to exist in unity. Our national unity was born in the heat of debate and the constitutional convention which acted as a ramp for launching the Ship of State almost came apart before the vessel hit the water and unfurled her sails.

Those who postulate there can be no unity except upon the basis of absolute conformity ought to cross their fingers and "take King's X" every time they salute the flag and murmur, "One nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." We are not agreed upon tariffs or taxes, legislative programs, executive powers, or supreme court prerogatives. We never have been. We have survived two hundred years, not because of our agreements, but in spite of our disagreements. We are held together by an ideal we have never reached, and by a conviction that every man is endowed by the Creator with certain unalienable rights and that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Unity in the spiritual realm is unity in diversity. Unity upon any other basis would make it impossible for us to share in fellowship with God. There is a great difference between the creator and the created, the potter and the clay, the shepherd and the sheep. If God had waited until I understood everything as He did before He accepted me, I would never have been able to share in His blessed fellowship. He did not receive me because I was like Him. If I was like Him I would not need acceptance. I would have been God.

The fact is that God took me as I was, in my ignorance and arrogance. He accepted me not because I was worthy but because I was not. And He did it because, in His infinite grace, He was able to love me in spite of myself. The divine-human fellowship is one which spans vast areas of human ignorance. It makes it possible for the Maker to receive into His bosom those who cannot read or write, those who are not only ignorant of fine-spun, and even rough-hewn doctrinal distinctions, but who may not even be able to spell doctrine. The unity proposed by the Father is predicated upon faith, and that faith is simply trust in a person, a trust so great and powerful as to motivate the believer to commit his whole life and being to that person as Lord and ruler.

The word of God is quite plain as to the basis upon which we must receive one another. "Wherefore receive ye one another, as Christ also received us to the glory of God" (Romans 15:7). It would seem fairly obvious, I think, even if the apostle had not stated it so bluntly, that we should receive each other on the same basis as God received us all. The divine grounds of acceptance ought not to be improved upon by mere mortals.

This means we will need to receive those who do not see a lot of things as we do, and never will. We shall have to receive them upon the basis of their faith in Jesus and in spite of some of their immature ideas and peculiar notions. The community of saints will never be a "united notions" complex.

When men respond to the good news about Jesus by their acknowledgment of the proposition that He is the Anointed One, the Son of God, and by being baptized as an acknowledgment of His Lordship over their lives, we receive them, for it is upon this basis God receives them. We no more assent to all of their opinions, ideas or concepts than God does. We do not receive them because of the number of things upon which they are right, but because they have been set right with God, being justified by faith!

It is tragic that men, searching for a text and a prooftext as a peg upon which to hang a sermon outline, would fasten upon Amos 3:3, and abuse and misuse it in such a way as to destroy the very fellowship which they profess to proclaim. One need not be a scholar of Hebrew to avoid the mistake of thinking that Amos made a journey to Israel to lay a foundation for unity in Christ upon the basis of doctrinal agreement. An examination of other translations would save him from such an error.

Robert Young renders it, "Do two walk together if they have not met?" The Revised Standard Version reads, "Do two walk together unless they have made an appointment?" This is a good place to point out that any proposition which depends for its proof upon one version, and which can be sustained only by appeal to such a unique rendering should be regarded as suspect. It must be recognized that all subsequent translators could be mistaken and those selected and appointed by the King of England could have been right, but there is at least room for doubt when the later translators, looking at the original and having the King James Version before them, revised the rendering.

In our day of mobility and rapid transportation facilities it is easy for people to meet by chance and converse together. Every person who reads this will recall "running into a friend" unexpectedly at a shopping mall and engaging in an exchange of ideas. It was not that way in the time of Amos. When you saw two men walking across the open plain or desert you could be reasonably certain they had made an appointment, and it was no chance occurrence. So the version referred to above recognizes the circumstances of carrying on a conference as the result of a previous engagement to meet. "Do two walk together unless they have made an appointment?"

In Christ Jesus I walk together with men with whom I seriously disagree about a number of things. The truth is that I have never met a person with whom I fully agree upon all matters of understanding. If I must walk only with those who see everything as I do I will never walk with anyone. But I respect the right of others to read the Word of God for themselves, to make their own deductions and form their own conclusions. I do not want anyone else to impose his opinions upon me so I refuse to impose mine upon him. The same scripture which allows me liberty of judgment will allow it to all others who eagerly search for truth.

This is not, as some foolishly assert, merely "an agreement to disagree." Rather, it is a calm recognition of reality while we are imperfect beings in the flesh. As I investigate more fully I may be led to concur with the divergent views of my brother, or, upon the same basis, he may come to agree with mine. At least twice in my life I have differed with brethren in the Lord and both of us have changed. As a result we still differed but had merely shifted sides in our discussions. This did not affect our personal relationship in Christ, because it was not based upon conformity of opinion or understanding. We differed in Jesus, and not about Jesus. And there is a lot of room in Jesus for honest differences. The divine umbrella of love is not as narrow as are the hearts of a lot of those under its protection. It shades a lot of people who do not think alike or see alike. That is why it is important that we are to be judged by the Lord and not by men.

It is an interesting observation that those who head for Amos 3:3 for a text of unity, actually are not trying to promote unity at all. They are searching for grounds on which to justify their separation from others. Everyone of them postulates unity upon agreement with himself or the party or faction for which he is the front man. Each should make Amos say. "Can two walk together toward glory unless they agree with us?" Even if two were perfectly agreed after long and arduous study they would not be considered as faithful or loyal unless they agreed with the speaker. There have been occasions when as many as three different men used Amos 3:3 as a text on the same day in the same town, and no two of them could even agree on what they had to agree upon to walk together.

It is time for men to grow up and free themselves from traditional explanations and expositions which have long since been proven to be invalid. Men can walk together in Christ and not agree upon a host of things if they put Jesus above all else in their lives. What we need to do is to agree to walk together regardless of the attempt of Satan to fragment us into warring tribes and belligerent factions.

Another Gospel

It was my lot to grow up in one segment of a religious movement which, like many other such historical attempts to recapture the ideal of the first century community of the saints, had become fractured into rival factions. It had been inaugurated chiefly by earliest Presbyterians, with the assistance of a few worthy thinkers from other backgrounds, who were, as one of them phrased it "tired and sick of the bitter jarrings and janglings of the party spirit." Accordingly they launched a program to unite the Christians in all of the sects."

It was not the only project begun for this purpose at that particular period of time. There were a number of "restoration movements" whose adherents pleaded for men to "return to the original pattern as set forth by the apostles," and a favorite title for sermons was "Seeking the Old Paths." It is not essential to my present purpose to detail all of the tributaries which converged to form the rushing river of "The Second Great Awakening." It is sufficient to say that under its influence hardy thinkers began to proclaim to a frontier people that unity in Christ Jesus was attainable in the wilderness of a fresh new world, provided that all men would search the scriptures and "restore the ancient order of things."

All of these movements without exception, eventually became both divided and divisive, contributing to the "jarrings and janglings" which they started out to eliminate. The particular movement with which I was directly affiliated, and of which I became an ardent defender, was doomed to become one of the most fragmented upon the contemporary American scene. It ended up with more than one division for every decade of its turbulent existence from the day of its beginning until the present.

It is not difficult to assess the causes for the disturbing result. On the other hand, given such causes, the result was inevitable and should have been predictable. But hindsight is often better than foresight. One can more readily read the signs of the times by looking backward than by trying to scan the future. Frontier peoples, who are often deprived of those amenities which a stable society takes for granted, tend to define their learning and goals in capsule form. In this form they are easily remembered. Significant happenings are memorialized in simple ballads, wisdom is reduced to pithy proverbs, and life purposes expressed in slogans.

The real danger in this is that men repeat the slogans until they become a substitute for thinking. They remember the slogan and forget the purpose. In the particular movement with which I was identified one of the earliest proponents coined the expression, "We will speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where the Bible is silent." This worthy resolution became the watchword of the movement and when it did, was translated by attitude and action into a weapon rather than into an instrument of righteousness.

More than anything else it tended to develop a prooftext approach to the sacred scriptures and men became "scrap doctors" as Alexander Campbell referred to them. The tendency developed into a way of life and men searched the scriptures to validate presuppositions, and to find justification for what they already thought and did. A generation arose which spoke where the Bible spoke, but was not concerned in speaking as the Bible speaks.

When division in the family of God, which is always condemned by the Holy Spirit in the divine revelation, began to be sanctified by quoting passages to justify it, the flood-gate was opened. Every faction, fragment, splinter and sect could "prove" that its exclusiveness and separation was the will of God, sanctioned by heaven and authorized by the new covenant scriptures. Each sect froze knowledge at its own level, each established its own plateau, and each made additional discoveries above and beyond the partisan norm a crime punishable by banishment and exile.

As absurd and ridiculous as it may seem to the real scholar of the divine disclosures, every minor detail of difference and debate was branded "another gospel" and the unfortunate soul who had not stopped thinking when he reached the partisan plane was accused of "preaching another gospel." He might be, and often was, the most spiritual person in the group, humble, prayerful and loving, but this counted for nothing if he could not conscientiously bring himself to remain confined in the partisan straitjacket of orthodoxy.

If he held a different view about the millennium, music, or missionary methods, he was guilty of "bringing another gospel." Even though he accepted every word about Jesus as recorded by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, and literally steeped himself in their testimony, if he could not concur with the party position as to the time and meaning of "the thousand years" in Revelation 20, he was preaching "another gospel" and he was expected to be accursed by God after having been excommunicated by the sect.

As a kind of mitigation of the hardness and rigidity which settled down like a pall to halt further movement, it cannot be forgotten that it was alleged "respect for the authority of the Word" which created the sectarian status. A number of factors contributed to the condition. Basic to the entire system was the mistaken concept that we are still under law rather than grace, and that the love letters of the apostles constituted a written code of divine jurisprudence, the terms of which had to be enforced by certain men invested with the power to determine the conditions of union and communion for each developing party.

As a corollary to this false foundation there was an undermining of the real purpose of the new covenant which was to create an association of free men and women, joined to each other only because they were joined to Jesus. New yokes began to be hewn out to replace the one delivered to Moses and each party whittled and shaped its peculiar yoke to fit the cast of its leadership and recognized interpreters. Divine distinctions were obscured in the fog of factional debates, and men began to defend their novelties as ardently as their fathers once opposed them.

It is not easy to assess the relative importance of fundamental errors in the rise of any system of thought, because, with the passing of time, they become intertwined and matted together. In the movement in which I grew up I think one of the principal mistakes consisted in confusing the gospel of Christ with the apostolic doctrine addressed to those who had obeyed the gospel. Many forgot that the gospel was the good news of what God had done for men in Christ Jesus, while the doctrine consisted of instruction as to what men in Christ Jesus must do to walk worthy of their vocation. Eventually the term "the gospel" became the equivalent of the whole of the new covenant scriptures, and one who held a divergent view about any passage was adjudged as being unfaithful to the gospel.

Since we will be pursuing the subject in our next chapter we propose now an investigation in context of the term "another gospel" as used by Paul in his letter to the Galatians. Here are his words:

> I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel:
>
> Which is not another; but there be some that trouble

you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ.

> But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.
>
> As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed (Galatians 1:6-9).

It is my conviction that none of the troublesome issues which create problems among those who are firmly convinced that Jesus is the Anointed One and God's Son, the Lord of life, constitutes "another gospel." Certainly when controversy arises over such matters as the millennial reign, or the nature of the work of the Holy Spirit in our day, someone is wrong, and all may be. But neither side is proclaiming another gospel, and the accusation that either is doing so may be far more dangerous and damaging to the cause of Christ than the error under dispute.

One has not "left the gospel" or "deserted the gospel" who "through the Spirit waits for the hope of righteousness by faith." He may be ignorant of the meaning of many things in the apostolic letters, and wrong about a lot of things he thinks he understands, but he does not "preach another gospel" when he expresses his views about his deductions and opinions. If we are to "speak as the oracles of God" and if we accept the letter to the Galatians as a part of those oracles, it is important that we determine what Paul said and what he meant by what he said.

Historical Background

Galatia was a district located in the great peninsula called Asia Minor, the region we now know as Turkey. It was populated by the Gauls, a rude and boisterous people from the land of the Rhine who migrated into Greece, and about 280 B.C.

went on into Asia where they carved out a home for themselves which came to be called Galatia, "the district of the Gauls." Julius Caesar, who made their name familiar to every high school Latin student, described them as volatile, restless and changeable. The apostle apparently found the description accurate.

It appears that when Paul proclaimed the good news to them the first time it was because of a physical condition. It has been suggested that because of some weakness or illness he could not travel further and, rather than consume the time in idleness he preached the gospel to the inhabitants of the area (4:13,14). Characteristic of their enthusiasm they received him "as an angel of God." Borrowing a phrase from the Grecian games the apostle told them "Ye did run well."

He was not gone from the region very long after visiting it the second time until disturbing reports reached him. Judaizing teachers had entered the area and were spreading the propaganda that one could not be justified by faith in Jesus. He must be circumcised and come under the law, or be lost. To further their nefarious course they sought to discredit Paul. They denied he was a true apostle, and contended that he was inferior to Peter and the other apostles whom Jesus called. They implied that whatever he proclaimed was a secondhand message, having been learned from the other apostles at Jerusalem. In view of this they contended, all must look to Jerusalem for the fullness of the gospel.

In that portion of his letter with which we are directly concerned Paul met their accusations head-on and without cavilling. He was not an apostle of men, neither by man. He was not commissioned by any man or set of men nor was he selected by human agency. He was an apostle sent forth by Jesus Christ under the authority of God the Father (1:1). He said, "The gospel which was preached of me is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ (1:11,12). He did not confer with flesh and blood, nor go up to Jerusalem to counsel with the other apostles, when he was called (1:16,17)

Since the good news he declared was given to him by revelation of God and not by repetition of men, the apostle was astounded that those who had been introduced into the grace of God by that gospel, could so soon be lured away and seduced by another gospel, which was actually not another gospel at all, for it was not good news. It was at this juncture the apostle wrote, "But though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed."

What is the gospel? Before one can designate a thing as "another gospel" he must be able to identify the original gospel. The gospel, by etymology, is good news. It is not a system of doctrine, a philosophy of life, a compilation of laws, or a code of ethics. It is good news about a person and what that person has done for us in our hopeless, helpless and hapless condition. It is not a message for the saved but for the lost. It is never addressed to saints but to sinners. It is never proclaimed to the church but to the world.

The gospel is designed to make believers. It is intended to create citizens out of aliens. The word is our translation of *euangelion. It is an evangel and you do not evangelize saved persons. It is sadly amiss to talk about preaching the gospel to the church unless the church is composed of those who have never come to Christ, that is, who have never obeyed the gospel.

The gospel which Paul proclaimed in Galatia did not originate with man (1:11). It was not the presentation of borrowed "sermon outlines." It was the "gospel of Christ" (1:7), the good news about Jesus. It consisted of preaching Christ among the Gentiles (1:16). It was "preaching the faith he once tried to destroy" (1:23). What was that faith? "And I said, Lord, they themselves know that in every synagogue I imprisoned and beat those who believed in thee" (Acts 22:19). It was belief in Jesus which Paul sought to destroy. It was faith in Jesus which he later proclaimed.

The careful student of the Galatian letter will at once see that the good news was a proclamation that we are justified by faith in Christ and not by works of law (2:16). There was no good news in a reign of law. Those who rely for justification upon works of law are under a curse (3:10). No man can be justified before God by law (3:11). If justification were through law, Christ died to no purpose (2:21). If inheritance were by law it was not by promise (3:18). The utter futility of law lies in the fact that it must leave men dead. "For if a law had been given which could make alive, then righteousness would indeed be by law" (3:21). There is no such law, either human or divine.

Law confines and keeps under restraint. It binds but cannot free (3:23). It makes a person under it "no better than a slave" (4:1). Men had to be redeemed from it before they could even receive adoption as sons (4:5). It is impossible to be justified by faith in Jesus and try to be justified by law at the same time, because one binds while the other frees. One cannot be both a slave and a son, because the adoption as sons frees from the bondage of law. One who seeks to be justified by law, or by legal conformity, severs himself from Jesus. "You are severed from Christ, you who would be justified by the law; you are fallen away from grace" (5:4). Nothing is plainer than the statement, "You are not under law, but under grace." You cannot be under both at once. The attempt to be will make of us schizophrenists in the spiritual world.

Salvation is a state of right relationship with God. Jesus did not come merely to keep us out of hell but to keep hell out of us. He came to reconcile us unto God. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." We do not enter this relationship by bargaining with God. We cannot earn it, purchase it or deserve it. We cannot bid on it or for it. It is not what we do for God that brings us into this relationship but what He has done for us. We are saved by grace through faith. It is not of ourselves. It is not of works. Study Galatians 4:1-7. "We were slaves . . . but . . . God sent forth his Son . . . God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." We could not adopt ourselves into His family. We had nothing by which to purchase our redemption from the slave pen. "So through God you are no longer a slave but a son."

Our response to the grace which sent a person to become sin for us, and to reconcile us, is faith in that person. This is what justifies. Justification has to do with freedom from guilt. We are not justified because we are guiltless for all of us are guilty. We are not justified because we have done something to free ourselves from guilt for no one can ever undo an act he has committed. Not even God can do that! We cannot "take back" what we have done. But Jesus is guiltless. He is the sinless one. If we are in Jesus we are not in a sinless state but in a sinless person. If we trust in his righteousness, that faith or trust is reckoned unto us as righteousness, or justification. Justification must always be a gift of God. We cannot give anything to God to meet a need of His. We must be always on the receiving end.

To one who works, what he receives must be counted as wages. It is not a gift. One who works has something coming to him, but no man has anything coming from God. He cannot be placed in our debt. We cannot keep books on God or "figure our own time." "To one who does not work, but trusts him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned as righteousness" (Romans 4:5). To be in Christ does not mean we have not sinned. It does not mean our sinful acts have been undone. It does not mean that we are guiltless. It simply means that in Christ Jesus God can treat us as guiltless. He can, through Jesus, reckon our faith as righteousness and not reckon our sins.

The gospel is the good news, the glad tidings, the joyful announcement of that justification by faith in Christ Jesus. It is the welcome communication from heaven that by trusting in Jesus in complete surrender and commitment, God will regard us as if we were without sin, since we are in one who is in that state. This is the gospel which Paul proclaimed in Galatia. It was the good news that Jesus was not as powerless as Greek wisdom and Jewish legalism. Salvation was not hinged upon arriving at wisdom or coming under the law, but coming into a person! God has made Him "our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption" (1 Corinthians 1:30).

The gospel is Jesus Christ, the Son of God. He is the good news, the greatest good news in all the history of sinful man. Paul declared that the message brought to Galatia was "Jesus Christ publicly portrayed (or placarded) as crucified" (3:1). The truth of that gospel, that is, the essence, the basis, the central theme was justification by faith in Jesus Christ. Truth is reality, stripped of all extraneous matter and naked of all artificial covering. The glad tidings to the world consisted of announcement of the most tremendous, magnificent and earth-shaking principle in the universe— that justification is by faith in the Son of God. This is the core of the message. This is "the truth of the gospel."

Shortly after Paul had gone from Galatia, members of the circumcision party came and told those who had heard the good news that something else was required, that faith in Jesus was not sufficient. No doubt their message was the same as that which they promulgated in Antioch, "Except ye be circumcised according to the custom of Moses, you cannot be saved" (Acts 15:1). When the controversy waxed hot in Antioch, Paul and Barnabas went up to Jerusalem to consult the apostles and elders. They took Titus along as a test case. They encountered "false brethren secretly brought in, who slipped in to spy out our freedom which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage— to them we did not yield submission even for a moment, that the truth of the gospel might be preserved for you"

(2:4,5). Paul was not here talking about the veracity of the gospel. If he yielded on this occasion, the principle of justification by faith, the truth of the gospel, would have been washed down the drain by the flood of legalism.

When Peter went to Antioch he ate with the Gentiles, until certain men came from James at Jerusalem. "When they came he drew back and separated himself, fearing the circumcision party" (2:12). This was a repudiation of the principle of justification by faith in Jesus and an adoption of the tenet of the party— you must believe in Jesus and something more to be in the fellowship. Peter caused a division with his unwritten creed. Others were drawn into the faction, including Barnabas. Paul saw that "they were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel." Do not be mistaken. Peter still believed in Jesus. So did Barnabas. But they lent their influence to those who insisted that this was not enough to be justified.

Paul proceeds to define the truth of the gospel in one of the most sublime passages in the Galatian letter. "We ourselves, who are Jews by birth and not Gentile sinners, yet who know that a man is not justified by works of the law but through faith in Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Christ Jesus, in order to be justified by faith in Christ, and not by works of the law, because by works of the law shall no one be justified" (2:15,16). To profess this as the marrow, or kernel of the gospel, and then, under partisan pressure, tack something else on to it as a condition of salvation, is to act insincerely and to be "not straightforward about the truth of the gospel."

Those who were in Christ in the days of the apostles were in error on many points. They were mistaken about a lot of things, but they were not charged with "preaching another gospel." Freedom from error is not a condition of salvation else all men would be damned. We are not saved by attainment to a certain degree of knowledge but by faith in Christ Jesus. It is by belief of facts related to Him, and not by grasp of abstract truth, that we are justified before God. Certainly it is not by performance of meritorious deeds nor by legalistic conformity. When we postulate a program of justification by knowledge we hang ourselves on the gallows we have constructed to rid ourselves of others, unless we are prepared to make ourselves even more ridiculous by affirming that we know as much as God.

No honest opinion held by one who is in Christ Jesus and who respects His Lordship, is "another gospel." Since it is the gospel which forms the basis of the fellowship with the Father, the Son, and with one another in Christ, such an opinion can never be made a test of union or communion in Jesus. A man may hold a view as to the perseverance of the saints, the manner of the resurrection, or the second coming of our Lord, and he may prove to be as wrong as one could be, but he cannot be debarred from citizenry in the kingdom of heaven by the other subjects, any more than one can be disenfranchised in the United States because he disagrees with the government space program or the approach to overseas help.

No man "preaches another gospel" simply by being mistaken about some aspects of the will of God, otherwise one would need to know perfectly the divine will or he would be a perverter of the gospel. It is common in our day for some to level the charge at their brethren who disagree with them over some means or method for implementation of God's will that they are "preaching another gospel" and "apostatizing." Those who do this, regardless of motive, reveal their ignorance of what constitutes both gospel and apostasy.

We need to give serious thought to the problem of "another gospel" because there is a grave danger that those who are most vociferous in their accusation that others are preaching "another gospel" are treading on thin ice. They may be guilty of the very thing of which they accuse others. Actually there is no such thing as another gospel and cannot be. The gospel is the good news that we are justified by faith in Christ Jesus. Anything else is just not gospel. That is why Paul said, "I am astonished that you are so quickly deserting him who called you in the grace of Christ and turning to a different gospel— not that there is another gospel, but there are some who trouble you and want to pervert the gospel of Christ."

To offer justification, or right standing with God, upon some other basis than trust in Jesus, may appear to those who hear it to be "a gospel." They may regard it as such and even accept and designate it as such. Ultimately they will learn it could not deliver what it offered, and that there is only one basis for a right relationship with God. Then that which appeared so plausible and convincing, which seemed so rational and documented, will be shown to be empty and frustrating, and not good news at all.

When men make a test of union or communion out of some method, mode or machinery for accomplishing God's will and refuse to recognize as in the fellowship those who do not concur in their special brand of orthodoxy, they hinge justification upon faith in Jesus Christ and something else. The "something else" is agreement with their understanding, inference or deduction from the scriptures as regards that thing. Their creed is no longer simply Christ but conformity with a factional pattern. Whatever any party makes a test of fellowship is its creed. Whatever one must accept to be regarded as loyal is a creed.

To make one's right standing with God depend upon standing right upon other things rather than upon surrender of himself in trust to Jesus, is dangerously near to perverting the gospel. This was the mistake of the circumcision party in the days of Paul. Let it be understood that Paul did not regard circumcision or lack of it as of any avail in establishing that relationship. "For in union with Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor lack of it counts for anything; but only faith that is spurred on to action by love" (Galatians 5:6). Many quote

Galatians 1:6-8 and apply it to others when they are actually the ones who set up other unwritten creeds and pervert the gospel with their partisan terms of fellowship and justification.

Not every divergent view is another gospel. Not every area of disagreement makes the one who disagrees with us a perverter of the gospel. There are some questions which are in order and to which we should face up. Why do those who profess to love God seek so eagerly to brand their brothers and apply hurtful and prejudicial epithets? Why are they so anxious to set at nought their brothers for whom Christ died? Why are they so bent on smiting their fellow-servants while the Lord is absent?

Is this the "more excellent way?" Is this the royal road to unity? Will this accomplish the purpose for which Jesus shed His blood? Will it answer His prayer for the oneness of all believers? If God deals with us at the judgment in the same cold legalistic fashion in which we deal with His other children, will any of us be saved?

I would like to urge my readers to carefully consider a quotation from The Declaration and Address, written in 1809 by Thomas Campbell at Washington, Pennsylvania.

> That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God's holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive edification of the Church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the Church's confession.

It is a lack of discrimination which has been responsible for most of the tragic divisions among the children of God. Their zeal has been misdirected because of the lack of discernment and the inability to distinguish between things which differ. They have confused the good news which brings men into a relationship with the doctrine or teaching upon which they are to be nourished and nurtured in that relationship. They have confounded that which produces our very being with that which is essential to our well-being, and which belongs to our after and progressive edification or spiritual growth.

In closing I will provide another quotation which should give us all pause, when its content soaks into our consciousness. It is from the pen of Alexander Campbell, the son of the man who wrote the previous citation.

> The present partyism is a disgrace to our profession. It is fatal to the progress of piety and truth . . . The key of knowledge is virtually taken away, and ages of darkness are again spreading sable wings over a slumbering world. We must awaken from this sleep of death— this fatal lethargy that has seized the body ecclesiastic. Men are fighting about chimeras, loving and hating, approbating and disapprobating one another for reasons they do not comprehend, and, if comprehended, they would blush to see the illusions and phantoms that have bewildered them.

Gospel and Doctrine

Contents

> And he said unto them, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned (Mark 16:15, 16).

Incredible as it may seem, this has become one of the "twisted scriptures." As a result, that which was ordained to save the world is used to divide the church. That which was designed to be glad tidings to hungry sinners has become sad news to harassed saints. All of the confusion stems from the fact that many have lost the scriptural distinction between the gospel, the Message to lead men to believe in Jesus as the Son of God; and the doctrine, which is a course of instruction for the training, development and growth of the children of God.

There is as much difference between the gospel of Christ and the apostolic doctrine as there is between the sperm from which a child is begotten and the food which he eats after he is born. The purpose of the gospel is to enlist men in the army of Christ; the doctrine constitutes a manual of arms and book of discipline to develop the soldiers into a fighting force. The first is an announcement that the school of Christ has been opened and eligible scholars will be accepted for enrollment; the latter is the curriculum for daily study by the students, or disciples.

Before we deal with the scriptural connotation involved let us understand why, what has become a traditional interpretation, is conducive to division and destructive of unity. The common fallacy assumes that all of the apostolic epistles are part of the gospel of Christ and any exposition of the doctrine contained in these letters is preaching the gospel. Since Jesus makes salvation contingent upon believing the gospel, and superficial students generally confuse belief with knowledge, it is further assumed that those who do not subscribe to the orthodox interpretation placed upon every passage thereby "reject the gospel." Each sect, party or faction, thus makes its traditional explanations and deductions "the gospel" and we end up with as many "gospels" as we have parties.

It is easily understandable that the ones who so reason will conclude that only those who are allied with the party will be saved, and all others are outside the pale since they have not "obeyed the gospel" (that is, subscribed to the unwritten partisan creed). But we learn from observation, experience and the sacred scriptures, that we do not all have the same degree of knowledge. God has made us all to differ in the intellectual realm as we do in the physical. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. No two of us on earth attain to the same identical degree of knowledge about everything at the same moment. As Will Rogers remarked, "We are all ignorant, but just about different things."

Any attempt to secure unity upon the basis of uniformity of knowledge or conformity in deductive or inferential processes (i.e., doctrinal interpretation) is doomed before it begins. It must inevitably end in dividing that which it seeks to unite. For this reason, those who make such attempts must always resort to creation of external authoritarian power structures in order to compel conformity. This is generally done by investing a person or group with an aura of infallibility so that all non-conformity with the orthodox creed can be equated with rebellion against God. To dissent is to "deny the authority of the scriptures." Every individual who desires to be regarded as "loyal" must surrender his right to reason and think upon God's revelation to the "power bloc" and "unity" is maintained by legislation handed down, as well as by fear of social rejection by the group accompanied by reprisal for dissent.

Power Structures

In one sect the power structure is invested in a "universal father" whose pronouncements when made ex cathedra (from the chair) are accepted as dogma. This means that this one individual decides for all other individuals in the group what God meant by what He said or did not say, and such decision must be accepted as the will of God. Other sects, finding it repulsive to their Christian concept to exalt one man to such cosmic importance, reduce the power structure from a universal to a diocesan level, where the bishop becomes the final court of appeal.

Still other sects set up a parochial or congregational "power bloc," often consisting of a board of elders. Members of such groups are taught that to differ with the elders is to differ with God. The motto is "Vox presbuteros, vox Dei" (The voice of the elders is the voice of God). Every sect which confuses community with conformity is forced to recognize either an infallible interpreter or an infallible interpretation. Of course the procedure is not always as systematized and clearly recognized as those we have mentioned. Sects are like those who compose them and are inclined to be systematic or slipshod according to the nature and temperament of their constituents. Thus, in some cases, the editor of a recognized journalistic mouthpiece may arrogate to himself the mantle of infallibility and be allowed to wear it by default. His office becomes the clearing-house for all problems and his decision must be accepted as final.

The attempt to make conformity to the party norm the basis of unity is further complicated by the fact that the rational processes cannot be stopped at a given level. Men who are capable of doing so will continue to investigate and will reach conclusions differing with their own orthodox views of the past. When they refuse to succumb to threat or coercion they will be driven out and division will result. Since it is only the more eager students and researchists who labor to improve their intellectual grasp it is evident that the thinkers will be excluded, while the guardians of the status quo will be retained to man the party machinery. Every faction seeks to freeze knowledge at an arbitrary partisan level, and every such faction does it by skimming off the brains from the top.

It is an outstanding achievement of divine wisdom that salvation is made contingent upon belief of facts incorporated in news, rather than upon knowledge of abstract reasoning or deductions drawn from doctrinal truths. The gospel is a unitive force because it consists of facts proclaimed by credible witnesses. These facts must be accepted or rejected. If accepted at all, they must be accepted as facts. All who so accept them are brought together in the one to whom they relate, regardless of ignorance about matters, immaturity, or lack of understanding of what will be further entailed. No subject should challenge a divided church more than the nature and content of the gospel. We propose to examine the word from the standpoints of etymology, scripture and scholarship. We make no apology for the length of our treatise because of the tremendous importance of the theme.

Meaning of the Word

Our English word "gospel" is from the Anglo-Saxon "gode spel," good news, and was chosen as the best equivalent of the Greek euangelion. This was formed by adding the prefix "eu," good, to a root meaning "message, tidings, or news." The gospel is an evangel and one who proclaims it evangelizes. One cannot evangelize saved persons, for the evangel is an announcement to the lost. Its purpose is to lead men to a state of salvation or righteousness. One who believes the gospel and is baptized will be saved from his past sins, his unregenerate state or lost condition. The gospel precedes faith and produces it. It is not a fruit of faith but the seed of it. The gospel is addressed to unbelievers and not to believers.

The difference between the gospel and the apostolic doctrine is readily seen by application of simple logic. Jesus said, "Go into the world and preach the gospel unto every creature." The gospel is to be taken to the world. It is to be proclaimed unto every unsaved person. But the apostolic doctrine was addressed to churches composed of the saved, or to individual believers. Not a single epistle was addressed to the unsaved in the community, although the obligation to take the gospel to them was referred to in one instance (Romans). The apostolic doctrine was to "the church of God" (1 Cor. 1:2), "to all the saints in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:1), and "to the faithful in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 1:1). The apostolic doctrine was not to lead men to believe and be baptized but to tell them "how to behave themselves in the house of God" (2 Tim. 3:15).

One of the clearest passages showing the difference between the gospel which begets as a precedent to birth into the family, and subsequent instruction given to the sons is found in 1 Corinthians 4:14,15. "I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. For though you have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." The gospel is the spiritual sperm, the seed. The one who deposits it in the heart is the father, on the basis of principal and agent. Those who are born are sons. Others may teach or instruct them, but they receive life through the evangel, or gospel.

This is borne out by another apostle, Peter, who writes, "You have been born anew, not of perishable seed but of imperishable by the word of God which is living, and indestructible." The writer identifies the seed thus, "This word is the gospel which was proclaimed unto you" (1 Peter 1:25). The King James Version leaves the wrong impression by translating, "This is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you." The Revised Version is more accurate. The gospel had been preached unto them before the new birth and in order to produce it. The gospel was for the world, the apostolic doctrine for the church.

With that keen sense of discrimination which characterized many of the pioneers who sought to unite the Christians in all of the sects, Alexander Campbell wrote:

> There was teaching, there was singing, there was praying, there was exhortation in the Christian church, but preaching in the church, or to the church is not once mentioned in the Christian scriptures!
>
> Paul once, in his first letter to the church in Corinth, said he would declare to the Corinthians that gospel which he had preached to them, which also they had received and wherein they stood. We preach, or report, or proclaim news. But who teaches news? Who exhorts news? We preach the gospel to unbelievers, to aliens, but never to Christians, or those who have received it (Millennial Harbinger, April, 1862).

William Hurte, a sincere and humble student of the word of God, was laboring among the fishing villages along the Banffshire coast in Scotland in 1879, when he saw the need for an expository work which would help the villagers to understand more fully the revelation from heaven. He began work on A Catechetical Commentary which was finished in October 1884. In this volume the author presents four thousand questions on the new covenant scriptures and his answers thereto. Here are his remarks about Acts 5:42:

> The apostles rejoiced and went on with their work; but why does Luke use the two words "teach and preach Jesus Christ?" The words simply indicate the two classes to whom they were daily ministering. To the unconverted they preached, and to this class this word is strictly applicable, while believers were taught all things needful for life and godliness. To the former it is, and always must be, proclamation— i.e., preaching— while to the latter it must always be instruction concerning the Lord's will.

The Scriptural Usage

Every kingdom must stand in two relationships to the people of the earth. There are aliens and citizens. The kingdom of heaven is no exception, since it is the design of heaven to enroll as many aliens as possible into citizenry, and to train those who are inducted to become worthy citizens, there must be two separate and distinct messages from heaven. Both messages will be the word of God, but they will differ as to subject, content and aim. The first will be proclaimed to all men who have not entered into Christ and it must consist of such facts as will motivate the world to accept His sovereignty over their lives. The second must be a course of methodical instruction calculated to develop those in Christ from spiritual infancy to maturity.

The word of God informs us that there are such distinct messages and there are specific terms used by the Spirit to designate them. Since the messages are distinctive the bearers of the message are also distinguished by terms growing out of the nature of the messages. The announcement of news in the Greek world was made by a herald. The word for such a proclaimer was keryx and his message to the public, that is, the thing proclaimed, was the kerygma. This simply means a public announcement or declaration, as by a town crier. A herald might announce either victory or defeat. The news might be either good or bad. Thus, there is nothing in the word kerygma which indicates the nature of the tidings.

But the kerygma of the followers of the Messiah was universally and uniformly good news. It was a joyful message. God had done something out of love for humanity and that something was a powerful demonstration of the riches of His mercy. So an additional term had to be used to describe it. That term was euangelion, which means "glad tidings." The bearer of this message was called euangelistes, that is, a bringer of good news. This good news proclaimed (or preached) by the herald was an announcement of victory in Jesus. It must be remembered that news has to do with facts and facts must be preceded by acts to which the proclaimer bears witness, or of which he has knowledge. In view of this, the kerygma took on a definite form. It was "the thing proclaimed" and that thing was called the gospel, or good news.

The chosen envoys of Christ had a special message for the alien world. That message was a proclamation of victory in Jesus. It consisted of the news of what God had done for those who were His enemies. Since it was contingent upon authority vested in Jesus, it could not be announced until the heralds had proof that He had been "Christed" (that is, anointed) and elevated to a position of universal lordship. The proof came visibly, audibly and experientially on the Pentecost following His ascension. Immediately the message was proclaimed! The gospel was fully and completely announced on that occasion. It was fully obeyed by all who accepted it. This was not a partial seed and those who were begotten were not born deformed or malformed. They were fully formed as God's children, although immature, as are all children at birth.

Nothing else was ever added to the gospel after that date, although doctrinal truths were revealed as required or when circumstances demanded. These truths were not part of the gospel and no one whose life was corrected or enhanced by understanding them was ever said to have obeyed the gospel again. Obedience of the gospel is an act once for all while partaking of the bread of life is a daily performance. The gospel produces life, the doctrine is for the training and discipline of the children after they are born.

Careful study of the historical accounts of the proclamation indicates that it was a specific message as to content. It did not depend upon rationalization, deduction or inference. It was not a compilation of laws, a code of ethics, or a collection of abstract propositions. It was not a course of study or a curriculum. It was a simple recounting of facts, of acts performed in behalf of enemies of God, which, taken together, formed the kerygma. At this juncture we may correct a mistaken view of a familiar passage. We refer to 1 Corinthians 1:21, where the false concept is created by the rendering in the King James Version, "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe."

That this is important is evident from the fact that our hope of salvation depends upon it. Many interpret the word "preaching" to be the act of proclaiming. But God has not offered to save those who believe in the act of announcing something. The word for preaching at this place is kerygma. It has to do with the message and not with the action of the messenger. God has chosen by the thing preached, which appears as foolishness to the worldly-wise, to save those who believe. The later translations are more accurate in conveying the thought.

> It pleased God through the folly of what we preach to save those who believe (Revised Standard Version)
>
> He in his wisdom chose to save all who would believe by the simplemindedness of the gospel message (J. B. Phillips).
>
> God decided to save those who believe, by means of the "foolish" message we preach (Today's English Version).

Content of the Message

What were the constituent factors of the gospel? There were seven of these as follows: the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification of Jesus of Nazareth. All of these are facts centered around the person of Jesus. All are designed to bring joy to suffering humanity through faith in Him. Jesus is the gospel. He is the good news. To preach the gospel is to announce Jesus. Thus the apostle says, "We proclaim Christ— yes, Christ nailed to the cross" (1 Cor. 1:23). Again, "I resolved that while I was with you I would think of nothing but Jesus Christ— Christ nailed to the cross" (1 Cor. 2:2). It was by this message God chose to save those who believe and those who believe these facts and demonstrate the lordship of Jesus over their lives by obedience in baptism are saved.

The gospel is epitomized in the three saving facts— the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. There was no saving virtue for the world in the life of Jesus upon earth, sinless as it was. The ascension, coronation and glorification were essential to His acquisition of authority. It was the ransom and redemption purchased by His blood which made salvation possible, and it was the resurrection which brought life and immortality to light. By His death upon the cross He proved that He was willing to share our lot to the ultimate, by His resurrection from the dead He proffered us the opportunity to share His glory to the fullest. His death on the cross proved that He was the Son of man; His resurrection from that death proved that He was the Son of God. Accordingly, the apostle, in reasoning with the Corinthians about the resurrection, reminds them of the gospel which they had heard and which gave them life. The resurrection was a vital part of it.

> Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel which I preached unto you, which also ye have received, and wherein ye stand; by which also ye are saved, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you, unless ye have believed in vain. For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; and that he was buried, and that he arose again the third day according to the scriptures (1 Cor. 15:1-4).

An analysis of this passage will show that the gospel had been preached, received, believed, and that it constituted a foundation upon which the brethren stood. It was now a matter of memory, something to be recalled. It is observable that the Corinthians were saved by the gospel. The saving facts which Paul enunciated were three in number. Certainly the first epistle to the Corinthians was not part of the kerygma— the gospel. It was a letter written to those who had already received the gospel and were saved by it. The letter was not an evangel but a course of instruction. It was not for sinners, but for saints. It was not to make believers but to make believers better.

Of course not all who had believed the gospel were equals in knowledge. Some still thought there might be something to idols (1 Cor. 8:7); some thought there was no resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. 15:12); some were men of knowledge (8:10); others were weak brethren (8:11). There were those who were feeble, less honorable and uncomely. There were parts that lacked (12:23,24). Paul hesitated to visit the saints because he wanted to spare them from personal censure (2 Cor. 1:23). He was afraid he would find "debates envyings, wraths, strifes, backbitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults" (2 Cor. 12:20). Yet all of these persons had been begotten by the gospel, and Paul mentioned the catalog of things to which we have just referred with the expression, "We do all things, dearly beloved, for your edification." Those who confuse the chastisement of a child with begettal and cannot distinguish between conception and correction are in a sad predicament, yet that is the very condition of those who confuse the gospel by which we are made alive with the doctrine by which we are kept alive, through daily feeding our hearts upon it.

To this reasoning and the abundant findings of scholarship, the orthodoxy of our day, developed by debaters and concretized by tradition has but one pat objection of any consequence. An appeal is made to Romans 1:15, which reads, "So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel unto you that are at Rome also." Assuming that the apostle intended to proclaim the good news about Jesus to those who had already heard it and long since accepted it, this is taken as positive proof that the good news is designed for saint and sinner alike and includes everything which should be taught to the church. It is hardly that simple and those who reach such a conclusion demonstrate that they are much more interested in justifying their preconceived notions than they are in unbiased exegesis. We propose to face up to this passage so glibly parroted by many who have never thought below the surface and who have fallen into the grievous error of searching only for a prooftext.

The Letter to the Romans

Simple logic will demonstrate that the letter to the Romans was not part of the gospel because Paul personally desired to go to Rome to preach the gospel. This would not have been necessary if it was to be preached to the church and if this letter was the gospel. It would seem strange indeed to write, "I am ready to preach the gospel unto you that are at Rome," if he was doing it at the very moment with his pen. Moreover, in Romans 10:16, he says, "But they have not all obeyed the gospel." If the letter to the Romans was part of the gospel, none of them had obeyed it, for it was just then in the process of being written. Yet before the Holy Spirit had revealed to him the content of the Roman letter, Paul had already "fully preached the gospel of Christ" from Jerusalem to Illyricum (Romans 15:19). Did he give each of these places a copy of the Roman letter before he wrote it to Rome? If not, one can fully preach the gospel of Christ without reference to, or inclusion of the Roman letter.

Did Paul intend to preach the gospel, that is, to evangelize the saved in Rome? Careful analysis does not indicate any such intention. In the first place, this letter was not addressed to the congregation, or church, in Rome, but to the saints as individuals. In this respect it differs from the letters to Corinth, Galatia, Thessalonica, and other places. In his Commentary on Romans, Moses E. Lard says:

> In other words, and briefly, it was written to all Christians living in Rome at the time. But it was written to them as individuals, and not as a body or church. This is a remarkable difference between the present letter and some others written by Paul. They are addressed to churches as such; this is addressed to individuals as such. Indeed, church unity or organization is not once alluded to or recognized in the letter, unless it be implied in chapter 16:17.

These individuals were addressed from two aspects: as saints in Christ and as citizens in Rome, as the called of God and as Gentiles. Paul expressed a desire to visit Rome for two different reasons. He wanted to impart unto the saints some spiritual gift and share in the comfort derived from mutual faith (1:11,12). But he had also purposed on numerous occasions to come "that I might have some fruit among you, even as among other Gentiles" (verse 13). There can be little doubt that the "fruit" Paul sought consisted of persons won to Christ, and he wanted this "among you" on the same basis as "among other Gentiles." Christ wrought in Paul "to make the Gentiles obedient, by word and deed" (Romans 15:18).

One purpose of the Roman letter was to inform the saints at Rome that Paul was specifically called to bear the glad tidings to the Gentiles. He wrote boldly about it so they would not forget his special mission.

> I have written to refresh your memory, and written somewhat boldly at times in virtue of the gift I have from God. His grace has made me a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles; my priestly service is the preaching of the gospel of God, and it falls to me to offer the Gentiles to him as an acceptable sacrifice, consecrated by the Holy Spirit (Romans 15:15,16).

Then why had Paul not come to Rome to win Gentiles? This would certainly be an important question to the struggling saints in the capital of the Empire. The answer is given:

> It is my ambition to bring the gospel to places where the name of Christ has not been heard, for I do not want to build on another man's foundation, but as Scripture says, "They who had no news of him shall see, and they who never heard of him shall understand." That is why I have been prevented all of this time from coming to you. But now I have no further scope in these parts, and I have been longing to visit you many years on my way to Spain; for I hope to see you as I travel through, and be sent there with your support after having enjoyed your company for awhile (15:20-24).

Paul wanted to bring the evangel to the Gentiles in Rome. He was not so ignorant as to try and evangelize the saved. He wanted to have fruit among the inhabitants of Rome as among other Gentiles. He said, "I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the Barbarians; both to the wise, and to the unwise. So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are in Rome also."

Why did the apostle use the expression, "To you that are in Rome also"? There is every indication that he intended for the recipients of the letter to share its contents with their unsaved neighbors— both Jew and Gentile. This would be a natural reaction to an apostolic letter in an area where no apostle's voice had ever been heard. This will also serve to explain the nature of such portions as the entire second chapter, which is addressed to the Jews who make their boast of God and rest in the law, and yet dishonor God by breaking the law. It will also explain the inclusion of matter found in the last half of the first chapter. This portion of the letter was written to convince the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles of the need for justification by grace rather than by philosophy or law, both of which always end in a blind alley. Surely no one is so foolish as to think these portions are addressed to the saints of our Lord Jesus Christ.

This is not a mere personal opinion of the author. It is shared by many who are more competent and eminent theological scholars. Space would not permit us to cite many of these, but one is very pertinent and needs to be read. Dr. James Macknight was the author of Apostolical Epistles, and so universally known and highly regarded was his profound work that Alexander Campbell selected his translation for inclusion in his "Living Oracles" as he designated his translation of the new covenant scriptures. In the preface to his work, Dr. Macknight writes on page 51, as follows:

> From the pains which the apostle took in this letter, to prove that no Gentile can be justified by the law of nature, nor Jew by the law of Moses, from his explaining in it all the divine dispensations respecting religion, as well as from what he says in chapter 1:7,13,14,15, it is reasonable to think that it was designed for the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles at Rome, as well as for the brethren; who therefore would show the copies which they took of it to their unbelieving acquaintance. And inasmuch as the apostle professed to derive his views of the matters contained in this letter from revelations, and from inspiration, it certainly merited the attention of every unbeliever to whom it was shown, whether he was a Jewish scribe, or a heathen philosopher, or a Roman magistrate, or one of the people; some of whom, I make no doubt read it.

It was not only in his preliminary remarks about the nature and purpose of the letter that Dr. Macknight expresses this thought. In dealing with Romans 1:15, to which we have already made reference, he makes the following observation.

> In regard that Paul, after acknowledging he was bound to preach the gospel both to the Greeks and to the barbarians, adds, I am "ready to preach the gospel even to you who are in Rome," the idolatrous inhabitants of Rome were certainly included in the expression "you who are in Rome." This verse, therefore, as well as the following, is a proof that the epistle to the Romans was intended, not for the Roman brethren alone, but for unbelievers also, to whom copies of it might be shown.

The Righteousness of God

But we will be asked about Romans 1:17, which says of the gospel, "For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith." Does not the righteousness of God include all God has revealed, and does not this embrace the whole of the new covenant scriptures? If so, does not "the gospel" refer to everything in the new covenant scriptures? It is a common resort of orthodoxy to quote, "For all thy commandments are righteousness" (Psalm 119:172) and then take this passage from the old covenant scriptures and apply it to the letter of Paul, and reason that the gospel includes every commandment of God, regardless of nature or intent.

This is a good example of what happens when men scrap the scriptures and become hooked on the prooftext method of exposition. Aside from the honesty and integrity involved in such devious maneuvering of isolated passages as pieces on a chessboard, there is another factor involved in this instance which must not be overlooked. Those who make such an argument to bolster their presuppositions must rely solely upon the King James Version for the validity of their logic.

The Revised Standard Version reads, "For all thy commandments are right." The New English Version has it, "For thy commandments are justice itself." Again, let me suggest that it is a fairly safe rule that any argument which must depend for its whole strength upon the rendering of only one version should not be given much prominence, to say the least. The fact is that David was not even dealing with the same theme in his lengthy psalm, as Paul had in mind when writing to the Romans.

What does Paul mean by "the righteousness of God" which is revealed in the evangel and is the subject of the good news? The Greek word here is dikaiosune, and it is a favorite of Paul. He was versed and grounded in the old covenant scriptures, having been at the head of his class in the rabbinical school of Hillel in Jerusalem. He knew that the old covenant scriptures constituted a primary and elementary school to provide a vocabulary for the school of Christ. The Hebrew terms which corresponded to dikaiosune were all derived from a verb—tsadhaq. The idea most frequently contained in these terms is that of vindication or justification. The meaning of the words does not imply that a righteous person is one who is right about things, but that he is "in the right," that is, in a state of righteousness, or justification. He is not infallibly right because of his actions, but wholly in the right by an act of God. That is why it is called "the righteousness of God."

Remembering that this is the word for "justification," we can readily see that no sinner can ever justify himself. He can never undo a single act nor recall a single word in order to become guiltless. He can never be justified by law because this would entail perfect conformity in every minute and meticulous detail, and the least infraction would mean death without mercy. Justification is an act of divine clemency, accorded not because of worthiness, nor because of anything that the guilty person may do to earn or deserve it. It is a manifestation of grace, a divine act of undeserved kindness.

We can now begin to appreciate what Paul meant in the memorable passage before us. In the gospel, that is the Good News about Jesus, is revealed the ground of God's righteousness, or justification. It is shown to be by faith in the Person of the Message. Indeed the Person is the Message. And the reason for revealing in the Message that God's righteousness is by faith, is simply to produce faith in us, for even the prophet had declared that the source of life is faith— not law! Those who are justified are those who are in contact with the source of life. Righteousness is a state of right relationship with God, and God is the fountain of all life.

We are not justified or in God's righteousness because of superior knowledge, or because we have figured out all the riddles and solved all the problems of life. Salvation and sophistication are not the same. We are not justified because of intellectual powers or theological attainments. We could never know all there is to know if our lives depended upon it. We can be thankful that it does not. Our life depends upon being in the only person from whom all life comes, and our being depends upon sharing His life. Years before Christ came, the prophet had declared, "The just shall live by faith." Paul contends that this life is now available. It has come. It is revealed in the Good News of Jesus. It is no longer future. It is present. The age of which the prophets spoke is a reality. I want you to bear with me now as I paraphrase for you Romans 1:15-17.

> Brethren, I should like to have you know that I frequently planned to visit you at Rome so that I could gather in converts to Jesus as I have done among other Gentiles. Because of my indebtedness to all tongues and classes, I am eager to preach the gospel to those of you who are in Rome also. For I am not ashamed of the Good News concerning Jesus; seeing that it is God's dynamic to produce salvation in all who believe the News, to the Jew first and also to the Greek. For in this Message God has revealed that justification is by faith, and this revelation is made to produce faith as our only hope of life, for even the prophets declared that faith was the key to life for those who are justified.

Certainly this is a "free translation" but, after years of study in the implication of these words of the Spirit, I am convinced that it best conveys the mind of God as I understand it to be revealed. It will also be observed that it preserves the basic core of the gospel which is justification by faith. This is what Paul calls "the truth of the gospel" (Galatians 2:5,14). The glad tidings about Jesus constitute a revelation that justification is by faith, in the full meaning of "faith" as Paul uses the word. It is only the apostolic usage with which we are concerned. All else is useless to one who wishes to understand the revelation of God

The Gospel Dynamic

The careful student will also detect at once the connection between Romans 1:16 and Mark 16:16 with which we began this chapter. In the commission Jesus sent the apostles into all the world to proclaim the gospel to every creature. He declared that those who believed the Message and were immersed would be saved. Now, Paul affirms that the Message is God's dynamic unto salvation to all who believe, whether Jew or Greek. Thus, the gospel is God's unitive force for mankind. It is the gospel which brings Barbarians and Greeks, wise and unwise, together in one body.

It is a tragedy to interpret the apostolic epistles in such a manner as to negate the apostolic gospel. It is a travesty on the spiritual walk to interpret the apostolic doctrine in such a way as to divide those who are united by the gospel of Christ, and thus make the cross of Christ of none effect. Orthodoxy has exacted a fearful toll on the body of our Lord, and will face a frightful responsibility for hacking the body to bits with the axe of partisan animosity.

It is belief of the facts about Jesus by which all of us are saved, if saved at all. This belief acknowledges His lordship over our lives, and thus commits us to acceptance of all the truths by which we grow as we become aware of them. No man will be saved who deliberately rebels against any doctrinal truth which he understands and apprehends. No one will be lost because of merely mistaken views or human inability to grasp all of these doctrinal truths. The basis of our hope lies in sustaining a right relationship with God through Christ Jesus. If one is right about Jesus he may be wrong about a lot of things and still be saved; if he is wrong about Jesus he can be right about everything else and still be lost. The gospel is the Word of life put into words of life!

Many in our day are not actually proclaiming the gospel of Christ as the hope of salvation. They are projecting a system composed of traditional interpretations, opinions and ideas, often conflicting with each other, and demanding conformity to this system as the gospel. Such a course will always be divisive and schismatic. It contains the germ of strife implanted within it. It is non-unitive and disruptive by its very nature.

This is not to say that apostolic doctrine is not important. It does not argue that we should not seek to agree upon interpretation. It does mean, however that our hope of life is not contingent upon arriving at such harmony of understanding, and that it is, and always will be, an ideal toward which we must strive. Our differences about doctrinal matters that do not relate to the facts of the gospel, are occasions for discussion, and not for division. Until we learn what is the content of the gospel we shall lose the learned and confuse the unlearned.

Not one of the apostolic letters was written to bring men into the fellowship. They were all addressed to those who were in it. Never an admonition to live in harmony or to be of one mind was written to bring men into the fellowship. Indeed, it was because they were in the fellowship that these exhortations were invariably given. Harmony is not essential to entrance into fellowship, but fellowship is essential to any satisfactory striving toward harmony. It is because we have a common relationship that we labor toward a better understanding.

To condition fellowship upon conformity in all of these phases is not to encourage unity, but division. To attempt to force conditions of growth as conditions of family relationship is to defeat the purpose of the Son of God and to disturb the peace of the one body. This is the indictment of that species of orthodoxy which blinds men and makes them think they are loyal to Jesus when they are chipping, chopping and carving His body to bits.

Our brethren need that gift of grace which enables them to "distinguish between things that differ." The cause of pure Christianity suffers among the masses because men who pose as teachers, and even would-be theologians stand before audiences and make disparaging remarks about any distinction in such words as "gospel" and "doctrine." If the only harm done was to prove the immaturity and mediocrity of their own scholarship one might keep still and allow them to bask in the feeble glow reflected and diffused through the veil which they wear in their reading of the Word, but they hinder the progress of reformation and remove the contest from the arena of universal thought to confine it to their own restricted corrals where none dare question and all must conform. It is for this reason that an examination of the scriptures in objective fashion is long overdue. There is a difference between the authority of the sacred scriptures and the authority of human interpretations placed upon them to maintain a traditional pattern and to perpetuate a partisan program.

The time has come to summarize what has been written. It is my conviction that God has designed and revealed two related but distinct messages, adapted to the needs of two divergent groups as pertains to the kingdom of heaven— aliens and citizens. The first is called "the gospel of Christ," the second "the apostles' doctrine." Both are of divine origin. Both consist of the words of God. Both are authoritative because of the author.

The word gospel is our English equivalent for a transliterated term, the Greek evangel. It means good news, glad tidings. The gospel is composed of seven historical facts about Jesus of Nazareth. It was fully proclaimed upon Pentecost. Nothing was ever added to it afterwards. The same identical message was heralded or announced to every creature under heaven. The intent of the good news is to convert aliens into citizens. It is a message to the unsaved and never to the saved, for the simple reason that the saved have already fully embraced its every requirement and demonstrated obedience to its every demand, and are no longer aliens. Only the lost are subjects of an evangel, and saved persons cannot be evangelized.

The "doctrine of the apostles" consists of a course of instruction designed to bring citizens of the kingdom to a constantly increasing sense of maturity and responsibility. It is those who have been immersed in obedience to the claims of Jesus upon their lives who continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine. Fellowship results from the gospel, growth within the fellowship is the aim of doctrinal development. The gospel brings men into Christ, the doctrine helps them grow up in Him.

So long as men seek to make fellowship in Christ Jesus contingent upon conformity of opinion, deduction, understanding and apprehension of apostolic doctrine, rather than upon faith in Him through the facts of the gospel, that long will they be purveyors of partisan loyalties and fomenters of factional strife. The gospel needs to be proclaimed to the whole world, the doctrine needs to be taught to the whole church, and every truth should be accepted as it becomes known.

Conformity or Diversity

Contents

Because of the divisions which men have created to separate believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, many of you who read this chapter will be affiliated with religious movements utterly different than the one with which the author is affiliated. For that reason apology should probably be made for the special allusions to the "Church of Christ" which will occur. However, it must not be overlooked that there is a kinship in our state which makes what is said about one fragmented movement relevant to all of the others. We may not all be in the same boat but we are all in the same ocean.

Too, it is important that all of us look with serious concern upon the problems which plague others. Because of our basic trust in Jesus none of us are wholly unrelated. Even though the doctrinal disagreements in one party have little relationship to those in another, at the center of our faith all of us are closer than we sometimes admit. It is as the spokes get farther from the hub they tend to become farther apart. The matters which create such a furor in one camp are looked upon with disdain and designated as sheer trivia in another. Every faction regards its traditions as having tremendous importance, while denigrating those of others. Few in these days place any emphasis upon eating of meats and keeping of days, yet these were questions of grave magnitude to the primitive saints.

Some of those who mistake conformity for unity appear to be startled when they first learn that we suggest there may be unity in diversity. Actually we go much farther than that. We assert that if there is any unity at all it must be unity in diversity, if it is to be enjoyed by free men. There is no other kind of unity except for slaves. Our opponents themselves are proof of this. Not one of them is a member of a congregation where every person understands each scripture alike. Each party agrees upon the factional test which it has singled out and made the supreme issue. Upon every other matter the greatest latitude is permitted. Conformity does not make for better Christians, but for greater hypocrites.

Every group which contends for conformity of every member is inconsistent. Those who quote scriptures urging the saints to live in harmony under the delusion that unity and harmony are identical, misunderstand both human nature and the scriptures. There is a widespread notion that because the primitive saints were together and had all things common, and because they were of one heart and one soul, this means they all had exactly the same opinions and views of everything related to the Christian walk. Nothing could be more remote from the actual facts.

God made men so that as long as they are in the flesh they will be divergent in opinions. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. There is as much variety in our mental, as there is in our physical makeup. This is not an evil. It is good. It stimulates study and research. It is the soul of all discussion and investigation. Without it forbearance would be an unnecessary virtue and patience would become a lost art. Of even greater significance is the fact that if unity came by intellectual agreement rather than as a grace-gift from God, it could never produce a peace that passes understanding. No one will deny that our human understanding is frail, fallible and faulty. Peace that originated with it would always be imperfect. A stream cannot rise above its fountain or source.

Our unity is in a person, not in our personal opinions. We are one in Christ. Ours is the unity of the Spirit. Nothing is more clearly taught in the word of God. The Spirit of God dwells in every child of God. There is but one Spirit and every one in whom the Spirit dwells is one with every other such person. Of course every one in whom the Spirit dwells will exert a conscious effort continuously to promote harmony and good will. He will be a peacemaker because only such can be called the children of God. But he will also recognize that harmony is a fruit of unity, and not the reverse.

God no more expects all of His children to be exactly alike than I do my children. Nor does he "tighten the screws" on them to enforce conformity any more than I would twist the arms of the members of my physical family. The truth is that His revelation teaches us we are different from each other, and it is because of this we are able to fulfill His purpose and carry out His will upon the earth. Mere likeness in every detail would make this impossible. A man is able to be one flesh with his wife, not because they are alike, but because they are not. Oneness is not exact likeness. Harmony cannot be produced by harping on one string but by blending the sounds from various instruments.

Areas of Diversity

1. In the primitive community of saints there was a diversity of gifts (1 Cor. 12:4-6). "Now there are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit; and there are varieties of service, but the same Lord; and there are varieties of working, but it is the same God who inspires them all in every one." The variety is in the saints, the sameness is in the Godhood. To eliminate the variety among the members would make the purpose of God of none effect. It is only when they recognize the source of their oneness that they can achieve a common purpose. "To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good" (verse 7). What was said of gifts bestowed supernaturally will also be true of gifts derived naturally.

2. There is a diversity of functions. "For as in one body we have many members, and all members do not have the same function, so we though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members one of another" (Romans 12:4,5). There is one question proposed by the Spirit which we need to face. "If all were a single organ, where would the body be?" (1 Cor. 12:19). The divine arrangement is expressed in the next verse. "As it is there are many parts, yet one body." Our very diversity in function makes it possible to have unity in an entity.

3. There was a diversity in understanding. Some had to be addressed as babes in Christ (1 Cor. 3:1). Their grasp of truth was elemental. "I fed you with milk, not solid food; for you were not ready for it; and even yet you are not ready." Others were mature. "Yet among the mature we do impart wisdom" (1 Cor. 2:6). The impartation of wisdom was always on the ability to grasp what was taught. There was a difference from person to person and from congregation to congregation.

4. There was a diversity in knowledge. The apostle Paul pointed out that all knowledge was relative (1 Cor. 8:2). God's revelation is perfect for the purpose for which it was given. Man's knowledge of it is not perfect. In the community of saints at Corinth there were those who were fully aware that "an idol has no real existence" and "there is no God but one." There were others who were not so positive. "However, not all possess this knowledge. But some, through being hitherto accustomed to idols, eat food as really offered unto an idol; and their conscience, being weak is defiled." Thus the saints were divided into "men of knowledge" (verse 10) and "weak men" (verse 11). Yet they were both men for whom Christ died and to sin against one of these brethren was to sin against Christ.

5. There was a diversity of customs. It was true that in Christ Jesus there was neither Jew nor Greek, but it was also true that there were Jews and Greeks in Christ Jesus. These statements are not contradictory. The gospel did not require a Jew to become a Greek, nor a Greek to become a Jew, in order to be in Christ Jesus. It was only in Christ they were one. This required adjustment to local conditions upon the part of one who traveled from one area to another visiting the saints (1 Cor. 9:19-23; 10:31-33).

Ragnar Bring writes,

> They were all one in Christ. Their unity was far more profound than a fellowship between those who hold similar views, or who think alike, or who are brought together because of social fellowship and equality. The unity in Christ Jesus was a unity which remained in spite of external inequalities, just as the unity of Christ with God remained and did not in any way become less when Christ emptied himself and became man, "born of woman born under the law" (Commentary on Galatians, page 187).

The nature of the unity in the early Christian communities was what made them so effectual. The world of that day was accustomed to a unity of exclusiveness which existed in fraternities and burial societies. In these people were brought together through mutual regard for each other and because of common secular interests. There was nothing strange about a synagogue composed of Freedmen, even in Jerusalem (Acts 6:9). But to find a congregation made up of men of different habits, customs, racial origins, etc., laboring as a unit because of a common love for Jesus this was impressive indeed. The deepest unity can never be that of conformity. It must always be unity which exists in and transcends diversity.

6. There was a diversity in opinions. The apologists for "the cult of the rubber stamp" can never successfully negotiate the depths of Romans 14. Here is a chapter deliberately designed by divine direction to tell us how to maintain unity in actual diversity. It forbids contempt on the part of one group for another, and forbids censorship on the part of the other. It begins with a fiat statement that we must welcome men who differ with us about matters of opinion, and not for the purpose of involving them in disputes or debates about the differences. "As for the man who is weak in faith, welcome him, but not for disputes over opinions."

The very next verse shows that those whom God has welcomed need not see everything alike. There is room in Christ for men to believe different things and still be one. One believes he may eat anything, while the weak man eats only vegetables. What reply is made to this by defenders of orthodoxy. One man in Colorado who is the champion of a legalistic code of conformity as God's ideal for His family, declared in print that there was no room for varied beliefs among those in Christ. He asserted that the only believer was the man who could eat anything, while the weak man acted through lack of faith. His predicament only becomes greater for he has God welcoming men who act through lack of faith, or without faith. The record says, "He also who eats, eats in honor of the Lord, since he gives thanks to God; while he who abstains, abstains in honor of the Lord and gives thanks to God" (verse 6). Will our brother have people honoring God through their lack of faith?

Note the expression "in honor of the Lord." This is the key to many of our problems. When men cease to regard the Lordship of Jesus over their lives, what they do is not acceptable. But those who act "in honor of the Lord" may differ greatly and may be exactly opposite in their views about many things and still be accepted. No legalist can ever grasp this! He will argue that "one of them has to be wrong." Granted! Perhaps they are both wrong. Then how can they be accepted? The answer is that the basis of our acceptance is not that we are right about everything. This would require no grace to save us. Why is this not the basis of our acceptance? For the simple reason that the kingdom of God does not mean being right about such things. It is in a wholly different sphere and upon a different plane. Being correct or mistaken about such things as observing days and eating meats does not affect our standing in it. There can be "diversity of opinions" about all those things in which the kingdom does not consist without affecting the constituency of the kingdom. "For the kingdom of God does not mean food and drink but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (verse 17).

When I think of the implications of this revelation from God, I am startled to realize how we destroy the work of God over matters wholly irrelevant to the kingdom of God. What we are doing, of course, is trying to make the kingdom after our own image. By seeking to become lords over the faith of others we end up being our own God. Each conformist uses himself as a criterion. Men must know as much as he knows, see things as he sees them, interpret passages as he explains them, hold the same opinion that he holds. Divergency is a sin, not because of disagreement with the party, for the party is but a projection of the partisan. It is a sin because it does not recognize his infallibility. To question him is to question God.

When another "infallible leader" arises in the party there must be a division. The party is the world, the religious universe of the factionalist, and there cannot be two infallible interpreters in the same world while they differ with each other. In case of difference each must have his own world. Every factional leader thinks of his party as the one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God on earth. This is the position of the Roman pope as respects his party. It is also the position of all the lesser papas in all of the orthodox parties of our day. True, in the changing climate of our day the pope has had to reluctantly refer to others as "our separated brethren" as do lesser popes refer to "brethren in error." Yet there comes to all of us in the controversies over means, methods and measures, the solemn warning, "Do not for the sake of food, destroy the work of God" (Romans 14:20). Does this principle apply to that which sustains a factional body as well as to that which feeds the physical body?

One Voice

We want to refer to one matter in connection with this which is so apparent that only those who are blinded by prejudice can fail to see it. Let us remember that when Paul wrote to the Romans the questions relating to eating of meats and observance of days were of tremendous importance and significance. They seem inconsequential to us now because they are not our problems. They have been displaced by other issues which will some day seem as trivial to others as questions about eating of meats seem to us now. But brethren were destroying each other over these matters when Paul wrote. The church was being shattered. These matters were made tests of fellowship and communion. If one had told the first century saints that the time would ever come when these would no longer trouble the body they would not have believed it. It will help us to remember the conclusions of the apostle.

The entire chapter (Romans 14) is given over to showing that men should respect and treat each other as brethren in spite of differing personal convictions upon these issues. The word "brother" occurs over and over and the expression "your brother" is of special importance. The theme is that brotherhood is a relationship created when God receives us (verse 3) and we need not agree with each other upon everything either to become brothers or to continue as such. After showing that we may maintain our divergent views and emphases, and be answerable only to God for them, the apostle concludes, "May the God of steadfastness and encouragement grant you to live in such harmony with one another, in accord with Christ Jesus, that together you may with one voice glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (15:5,6).

Harmony with one another, and accord with Christ Jesus, are not contingent upon seeing everything alike. We do not have to settle all of our differences to be in harmony with one another. Harmony does not consist of seeing everything alike on the understanding level, but of welcoming one another on the faith level. This is a higher level upon which peace that passes understanding is created by the death of Jesus. He did not die to create a union of philosophers but a family of brothers. To predicate unity upon understanding is to sublimate faith to human knowledge, that is, to destroy the greater with the lesser. This makes the cross of Christ of none effect. Those in Christ do not have to settle all of their differences. All they need to do is to settle their differences in Christ, that is, to make the relationship He created by His blood greater than anything about which they differ.

Notice again the expression "one voice." It would be foolish for the apostle to devote a whole chapter to proving that men did not have to hold the same views or express the same ideas about a great many troublesome things, and then end up by saying they must all speak the same thing about every point of controversy in order to please God. We conclude a community of saints can with "one voice glorify God" even while holding various opinions. The King James Version reads, "That ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify God." To be of the same mind and to speak the same thing— as Paul uses the terms— cannot possibly mean to think alike or talk alike about every issue arising to trouble the saints, else the apostle made a serious mistake in writing the chapter of which this statement is the actual conclusion.

The harmony of mind is on the faith level, and so is the harmony of speech or testimony. It is "the faith of the gospel" which produces our oneness of thought and speech, not faith in our understanding or interpretation of doctrine or dogma. Men may strive together in the clouds who would strive against each other in the valleys. The battle of faith must be fought on higher ground than that of opinion, speculation, or mere human acquisition of knowledge. The tragedy of our age is that we have been so busy hacking each other to pieces on the lower slopes that we can never gather enough united strength to storm the ramparts. "Only let your manner of life be worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I come and see you or am absent, I may hear that you stand firm in one spirit, with one mind striving side by side for the faith of the gospel." I have resolved to fight by the side of any child of God who battles for that faith. I shall not stop to kill my brother before I attack the enemy.

Basis of Conformity

Since every faction in the Christian spectrum exists on the basis of a special emphasis, either upon a particular scripture or a specific idea, what is the basis for the cult of conformity and order of orthodoxy in the "Church of Christ" to which I have alluded? I think it can be said without fear of denial that the basis of operation centers around 1 Corinthians 1:10. It is a twisting, warping and wresting of this scripture which leads them astray. It is astonishing that a passage written to offset and overcome division should be given an interpretation which can only produce and promote division, and which will open and aggravate numerous festering wounds without ever closing a single one.

> Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.

What does this mean? To what did the Holy Spirit refer by the expression "all speak the same thing?" What is it to be perfectly joined together? What is it to be "in the same mind and in the same judgment?" The quest for truth demands objective research into this language. We dare not evade it regardless of where it leads us. We must not color or shade it to justify sermon outlines in our portfolio. We can begin, then, by observing that when Paul admonished the Corinthians to "speak the same thing" he was not plotting sermon outlines or planning Sunday school lessons.
